As it turns out, Feb. 14 in Italy isn't much different from any other day. The only people I noticed carrying embarrassingly large bouquets of flowers were American students, and only when I went inside a small candy store did I see little displays of red paper hearts. In fact, if we had wanted to, we could have altogether forgotten that it was a holiday. I guess you could say the same thing is true here if you are willing to lock yourself in your room without TV or Internet for an entire week.

I didn't understand it. Why, in a country that puts so much importance on love, do they not even celebrate the saint who represents it?

Well, the answer is that they do. But in Italy, everything that we squeeze into one "special" day is spread out into the other 364. Every day is a day for appreciating beauty and expressing emotion so they don't need to make a big fuss on the 14th. And whether it's June, November or February, when an Italian uses the word "love," you know he or she means it.

In Italy, everything that we squeeze into one "special" day is spread out into the other 364. Every day is a day for appreciating beauty and expressing emotion so they don't need to make a big fuss on the 14th.

The Italian verb for "to love" is "amare" and its definition is very specific. "Ti amo" is only used in reference to lovers or significant others. For family and friends there is an entirely different phrase which doesn't really translate, and for everything else they simply say "mi piace molto" or "I like it a lot."

In our language, we toss around "love" like those dollar coins no one wants to carry. We love our parents, our siblings, our closest friends. We love our pets. We love hockey or football or golf. We love a certain Ben & Jerry's flavor, those sneakers we got for Christmas and the latest Scarlett Johansson movie. Oh, and of course, our partners too.

It's amazing that one word can have so much flexibility: the most powerful emotion in the human spectrum can describe feelings for both our soul mates and a pint of ice cream.

And therein lies the problem.

How do we distinguish between "I love you" in the truest sense and "I love you" in all other senses when the language is exactly the same?

With cards and candy and flowers, of course. With heart shaped balloons. With expensive jewelry. With neat red wrapping paper and cute pink bows. We don't need a special word in English; Hallmark, Hershey and Hannoush have provided us with alternatives to fill the gap our vocabulary leaves. Lucky us.

Call me crazy, but I think I prefer the Italian way. If we saved "love" for when we really meant it, then we wouldn't need a special day, a special flower, a special color to explain what we mean. Just like in Italy, Feb. 14 would just be another day to appreciate life, beauty and true "amore."

Maybe it's too late to reverse the trend in our language, but lucky for me, I speak another one. So instead of trying to create a new word and put it to use, I'll just continue to love everything and everyone that is important to me. And when the time comes and I'm looking for the right words to express that other emotion that gives us so much difficulty, I'll know exactly what to say: Ti amo.

'THE PINK PANTHER' FAILS TO LIVE UP TO THE ORIGINAL

By Jeffrey Horowitz
Collegian Staff

"The Pink Panther" begins with an animated sequence of the pink panther cartoon. He is doing what he always does: slapstick. Slapstick is the essence of all the "Pink Panther" movies. The cartoon at the beginning usually provides a preview of what to expect, but here the Pink Panther cartoon character inhabits a sequence with an animated Inspector Clouseau — a Clouseau that looks strikingly like Peter Sellers. Then the film begins and Steve Martin appears, sadly, throughout the whole film, as an impostor.

Sellers immortalized the role and elevated slapstick to brilliance in the original "Pink Panther" movies, but he played Clouseau as a character that was dignified, yet hopelessly unlucky. He did not intend to cause accidents; he was just too incompetent to avoid them. Catastrophe always seemed to find him, even though he was confident and sure of his abilities as an officer. Martin, who is at home in comedy, plays the role as a born klutz; he looks for trouble and when it doesn't find him, he creates it. He enters rooms attacking the window shades in case there is an ambush waiting. He fidgets with a giant spinning globe until it breaks loose of its hinges and barrels down the street, like that giant rock that chased Indiana Jones. He throws the siren atop his roof so carelessly that when the car makes a sharp left it is hurled from its place into the head of an innocent old lady.

This is hardly entertaining; it is childish comedy at best. An essential part of the Panther character is the accent and Martin even botches that. He reaches far and wide for laughs in his mere pronunciation of words. One pointless running joke involves his mispronunciation of the word hamburger, which he pronounces "darmberger." In an airport interrogation he attempts to explain that he is smuggling hamburgers onto the plane, not weapons, and when he reaches for his pockets, police dogs attack and lunge not for him but for his pockets. What is the point?

The plot, which gets lost among gross miscalculations of comedy, involves the murder of a French soccer coach (Jason Statham) and the theft of his pink panther diamond ring. Why the man that played "The Transporter" would walk around wearing a pink diamond ring on his finger is beyond me. Why someone would steal such a ridiculous-looking ring, which has an uncanny resemblance to the blow pop rings, is beyond the writers. The ring's value and importance is never explained. Chief Inspector Dreyfus (Kevin Kline) assigns the case to Clouseau, who he hopes will distract press while he secretly cracks the case himself, fires Clouseau and saves the day.

For some reason, he's sure this will win him the Medal of Honor. The film follows Clouseau through his investigation with his new partner, Officer Ponton (Jean Reno).

They interrogate the deceased coach's former girlfriend, Xania (Beyonce Knowles), who seems to be hiding something. They also follow Laroque (Roger Rees), the player that hated his coach. When he turns up murdered, his last words as heard from a witness are, "Oh, it's you." Clouseau rounds up all the residents of France with the first name "You." He gets 27,000 suspects, all Chinese. What is the point?

All of this moves along slowly and predictably, most scenes with uncomfortable interruptions of slapstick done in a tradition that does not fit with the "Pink Panther" comedy we all knew and loved. It is simply a misinterpretation by Martin. The Panther was not meant to be done like this. This kind of slapstick is intentional, not accidental. Martin is trying too hard, and Sellers was confident enough to just let it happen and play it straight. Well, at least a whole lot straighter than Martin.

When the murderer is discovered, through a plot that crosses and turns in so many more ways than is necessary, we have already stopped paying attention and marvel at a scene where Clouseau is visiting Chief Dreyfus in his hospital room, starts playing with the remote control and causes the bed to open and close on his casts. Comedy rarely gets as unimpressive as that.

There is a cameo by Clive Owen, who is such a welcome presence in this dreadful atmosphere. He plays agent 006, who, as Clouseau notes, is one step short of the big time. He delivers the only laughs in the movie, and makes us yearn for a new 007 that would be nearly as good. That cameo was perfect here, because the "Pink Panther" is, in all its foolishness, originally a spoof of the Bond movies. It has the musical score brimming with mystery and intrigue, but an agent that lacks both. In one scene, Martin lays in bed with his partner because the only room left in the hotel is a single with a queen-sized bed.

They are uncomfortably lying under the covers saying nothing, and I was silently praying for Martin to deliver those three words that would make everything all right: "Those aren't pillows!" The reference never came, because, alas, that was a different Martin from a different time playing a different type of comedy that worked for him. This type of comedy was useless. What was the point?

Eight classic movies to fit your situation this Valentine's Day

By Kahlen Burgwin
Daily Evergreen (Washington State U.)

PULLMAN, Wash. — Take a look at our movie reviewer's picks for quality movies for the holiday. For the perfect movie on Valentine's Day, the spectrum ranges from creepy to campy. Choose the perfect one for your romantic situation and enjoy it by yourself or with that significant other.

"Eye of the Beholder"

If you like your romances creepy, this is the tale for you. Ewan McGregor plays a British agent obsessed with a woman named Joanna who just happens to be a serial man-killer.

His growing obsession leads him to act as a sort of guardian angel, protecting her from the law and criminals alike without ever revealing himself.

Plus, it's just a damn cool movie with great cinematography. Oh, and an appearance by Jason Priestley to up the camp factor.

"Sixteen Candles"

"What's a happening, hot stuff?" And with that, the legend of Long-Duk-Dong was born.

"Sixteen Candles" is one of the greatest teen comedies ever made. A John Hughes masterpiece featuring the two big guns of '80s teen angst, Ringwald and Hall, "Sixteen Candles" only improves with age.

Who could forget Ringwald's little brother pretending to smoke a pretzel stick? The Donger's romantic rendezvous on an exercise bike? Ringwald's birthday cake from super-stud Jake?

It's chock-full of '80s humor and major bonus points for appearances by the Cusacks Joan and John.

"Eternal Sunshine of the Spotless Mind"

If you prefer quirky over creepy, you can't go wrong with this little gem. Jim Carrey plays a broken-hearted man who learns his ex-girlfriend has undergone a radical procedure to erase any memory of him from her mind.

Looking to ease his own pain, he seeks out the procedure as well, only to realize midway through the process that he wants to remember her.

A great ensemble cast that includes Mark Ruffalo and Tom Wilkinson brings this Charlie Kaufman-penned tale to life and Michel Gondry's direction is mind-blowing.

A good choice if you've just been dumped.

"Say Anything"

Cusack's free spirit courts Skye's bookworm as their senior year of high school comes to a close. Well known for its boom box blastin' Peter Gabriel scene, this is one of the few films of the genre that is hard to classify as a teen flick. Cameron Crowe's script hits all the right beats as Cusack and Skye meet, fall in love, break up and try to figure out what's next.

Perhaps a meeting with Jeremy Piven at the Gas and Sip?

"Punch Drunk Love"

Paul Thomas Anderson gets a stellar performance out of Sandler, who effectively twists his frat-boy persona to great effect as an insecure businessman. When he meets the love of his life, things start to turn around for him. If you're a Sandler fan and haven't seen this one, give it a shot.

It has some wonderful Sandler freakouts to go with a sweet love story.

"13 Going on 30"

I used to not be able to stand Jennifer Garner. But after "13 Going on 30," I changed my tune. One of the most enjoyable movies I've seen in the last few years. It's just pure fun with an award-worthy performance from Garner as a suddenly grown-up girl.

"Grosse Pointe Blank"

A shamefully overlooked mini-masterpiece featuring Cusack as a hitman off to his 10-year high school reunion hoping to reunite with an old flame. Wackiness ensues when he finds out his next target is her dad. This is a delightfully dark comedy that mixes violence and romantic regret for a surprisingly affecting little love story.

"When Harry Met Sally"

The best romantic comedy ever. Billy Crystal and Meg Ryan are brilliant. 'Nuff said.

Meg Ryan and Billy Crystal star in "When Harry Met Sally," a classic romantic comedy, and one of the best films to watch on Valentine's Day.

'Love Sucks' album leaves out a few important anti-love tracks

By Ben Wener
The Orange County Register

Remember how I've mentioned that every December, a bunch of us newsroom geeks form a band and stage a show, much to the dismay of our fellow reporters and editors, who patiently listen without laughing while still working?

Right. That.

Well, last year, after mangling Leonard Cohen's "Hallelujah," I strapped on my guitar and flubbed my way through another tune with too many chords for me to handle, "Up the Junction" by Squeeze.

It's a story song: Boy meets girl, boy wins girl's heart, boy moves into a shabby basement with girl, boy gets a meager job to pay the bills, boy impregnates girl, boy loses both girl and daughter to a soldier and finds himself permanently blotto and in debt to gamblers.

The End.

"Leave it to Ben to capture the spirit of the season" was what columnist Frank Mickadeit more or less quipped.

He's right. Christmas is entirely the wrong time of year to be sharing that witty ditty.

It's much better suited to Valentine's Day.

No, I'm not the Grinch who stole Cupid's quiver of arrows. I've got nothing against love songs — no more than I've got anything against a mostly fabricated holiday primarily designed to enrich greeting-card companies and florists.

But for as much as love can be that beautiful thing googly-eyed swooners feel when that first flush of l'amour smacks 'em across the kisser, love is also elusive and fragile, confounding and confusing, irrational and reckless, doomed and darn hard work — and, on good days, if you're lucky, simple and unspoken. The searing highs and subzero lows most of us experience at some point aren't the norm; unconditional but conventional love is what the rest of us live with.

There are very few songs that illustrate what that feels like, nor many (like John Legend's remarkable "Ordinary People") that grapple realistically with the difficulty of healing trampled hearts.

Instead, every winter comes a slew of roses-wrapped compilations meant to cash in on some poor sap's need to have something sweet playing in the car on the way to a dinner reservation. The love songs of John Denver, of Air Supply, of Dionne Warwick, of Chicago and the Bee Gees and Heart.

Dozens upon dozens fill the racks. How many counter that attack this year? Just one.

It's from Rhino Records. I can't really print the title — my overseers frown upon the expression — but the first word is "love" and the second word is what a vacuum does.

It contains 12 spiteful, bitter, anti-love greats: the J. Geils Band's "Love Stinks," naturally, and "Love Hurts" (by Gram Parsons, not Nazareth), but also cuts from the Cure and Joy Division, Linda Ronstadt's wicked take on "You're No Good," 10cc's holding-back-the-tears classic "I'm Not in Love," the Velvet Underground's "Who Loves the Sun" ("who cares what it does since you broke my heart?") and the Replacements' "Answering Machine" ("how do you say I miss you" to that?, Paul Westerberg wonders).

It effectively responds to "a century of catchy lies," as liner notes writer Cory Frye puts it, which has merely left us with "10 generations desperate to achieve in life what a pop song captures effortlessly in three glorious minutes."

But while it's a fine start, it hardly goes far enough. In addition to "Up the Junction," I suggest Rhino license any of the following for future volumes. If you're feeling down or just want to thumb your nose at Valentine's Day, you could do worse than look these up.

"Fascination," Everything but the Girl — "makes us ask for more than we'd like to know." From the duo who brought us "And I miss you, like the deserts miss the rain" comes this portrait of a woman trying to trust again after a betrayal.

"Hello It's Me," Todd Rundgren

One of the most realistic love songs ever. "Maybe I think too much but something's wrong/There's something here that doesn't last too long."

"Caught Out There," Kelis — "I hate you so much right now!" shouts the woman whose milkshake brings all the boys to the yard. Hell hath no fury ...

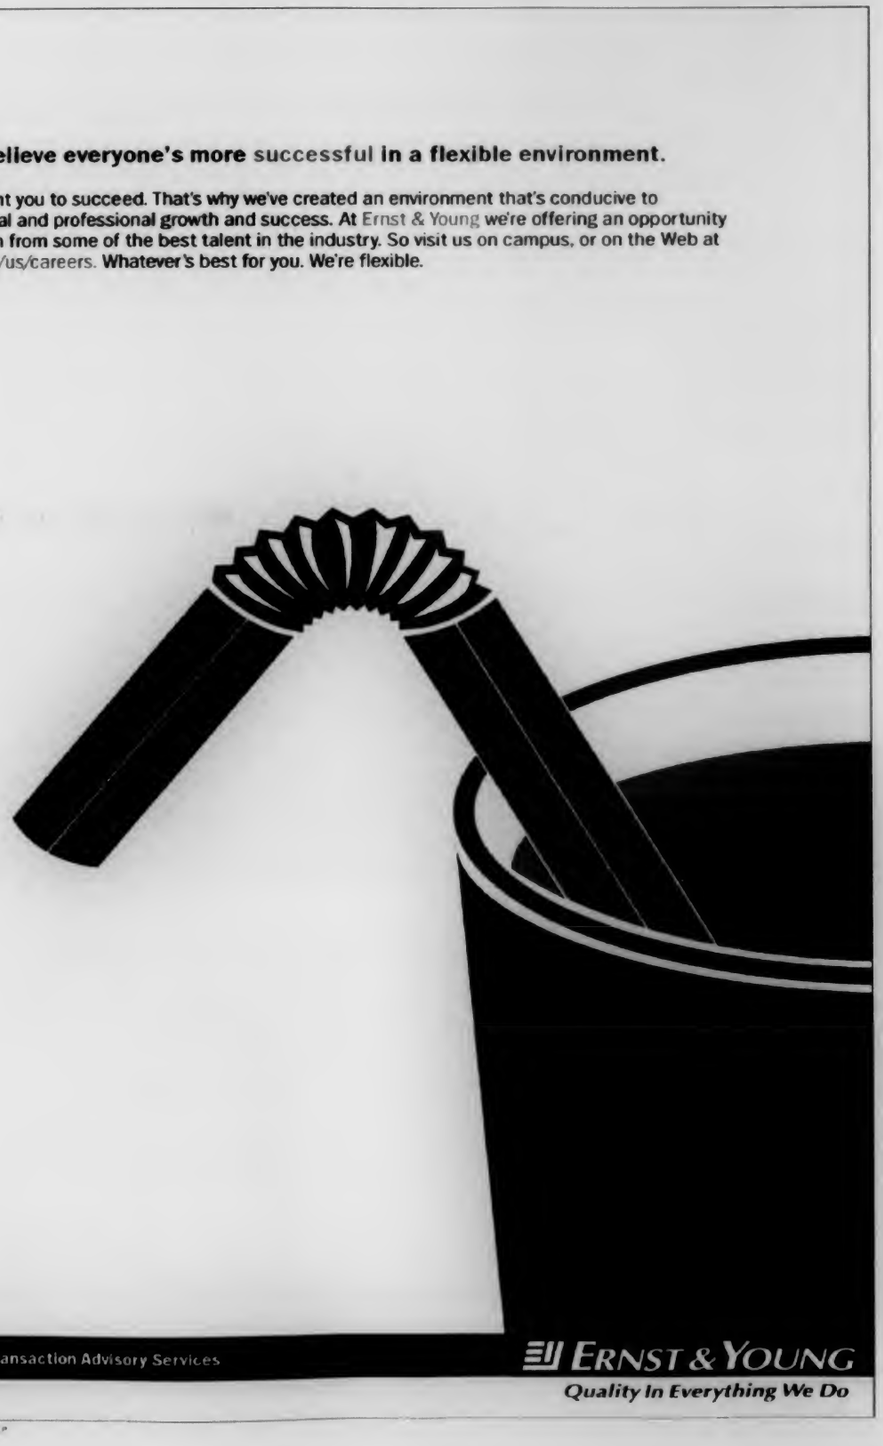
The Beatles — For every three romantic odes, there's a cruel kiss-off, usually written by George ("Think for Yourself") or John ("You Can't Do That"). Best downer: George's solo epic "Isn't It a Pity?"

Sinatra Spin "Only the Lonely" if you dare, but I find his rendition of "In the Wee Small Hours of the Morning" every bit as heartaching.

Tom Petty is very talented at describing breakup bruises. His "She's the One" soundtrack is littered with 'em. "I hope you never fall in love with somebody like you," he sings in one. Standout: his vicious version of Lucinda Williams' seathing "Change the Locks."

Elvis Costello — Where to begin? "Baby Plays Around," "Deep Dark Truthful Mirror" (the one that will "tell you things that I still love you too much to say"), "Tears Before Bedtime." His reputation rests on withering attacks on love.

"Baby Did a Bad Bad Thing," Chris Isaak — Actually, you'll need everything on this crooner's "Forever Blue" album.



"It Makes No Difference," the Band — If your lover has gone and you need a good cry, this'll make you weep until Easter. Every painful line rings true.

"Since I've Been Loving You," Led Zeppelin — "I'm about to lose my worried mind." Sometimes getting the girl doesn't bring sweet relief.

"Get Yourself Another Fool," Sam Cooke — And quick.

"I have a great faith in every generation's ability to come up with its own music." — John McLaughlin

Week of 2/14 to 2/21

Ennio Morricone 9/10

Crime and Dissonance
Ipecac Records

Ennio Morricone is one of the most important and prolific artists of the past 40 years, but his work has never entered the mainstream, his songs have never been released as pop singles and most consumers perusing the aisles of their favorite record store probably have not even seen his albums.

Morricone is a composer of scores for films — over 500, in fact — and while he often deals with orchestras and tools typical of most score-writers, his music is galaxies away from the bombastic classical orchestrations that makes up standard — sometimes even exceptional — movie music. He is by no means completely obscure; film students and indie rockers alike are sure to know of some of his most famous scores, such as the oft-imitated Spaghetti Western compositions he wrote for "The Good, The Bad, and The Ugly." However, the music he makes is light years away from the most famous composers of modern film, people like Hans Zimmer and John Williams.

Morricone is an avant-garde experimentalist of the top order, quite possibly one of the best of the second half of the 20th century, with an impressive and diverse resume to show for it. Those that are aware of this fact couldn't be more eager to hunt for every morsel of his work and those that have never delved into his body of work cannot fathom what they are missing. For both of these demographics, rock-based experimental icon Mike Patton and his record label, Ipecac Records, have assembled a two-disc collection of some of Morricone's most impressive and least known work.

"Crime and Dissonance" lives up to its name; a collection taken from various film-works (mostly from the '60s and '70s) where the listener wanders through a seedy underbelly of music and sound. Often extremely dark with forays into psychedelia, "Crime and Dissonance" is far more gripping than difficult, which makes it an intriguing and listenable foray into the avant-garde. Over the course of 30 tracks, funky guitar, jazzy drums, slinking horns, crying strings, terrified breathing and sitar arise out of smoke only to eventually fade away. The album is ordered in such a way that it flows nicely, but the air of unpredictability from track to track (and often within the compositions themselves) can mean the listener can go from floating on clouds to bouncing around inside a lunatic's mind almost instantly.

Since Patton and song selector/curator Alan Bishop have assembled "Crime and Dissonance" from Morricone's least known material, it is almost guaranteed that the listener will be faced with scores from films that are unfamiliar. What are often backings of on-screen action get the benefit of having free reign over the audience's minds. Most of "Crime and Dissonance" conjures up images of radical 1960s art house pictures, dirty, raw and mysterious. The scenes that are bound to play out in the listener's head only reinforce how potent Morricone's music is. Every track is curious and powerful, with everything from minute-long segues to the amazing, breathtaking climax, the 11-minute "Un Uomo Da Rispettare (Fitoli)" which plays out like a short film of its own.

Fans of Morricone's scores already know that this is an essential collection of brilliantly inspired, groundbreaking work. Those that have never listened to Morricone but are intrigued by the prospect of a different kind of film score — a different kind of music altogether — should dive into "Crime and Dissonance." For those with open ears and a taste for the unique, "Crime and Dissonance" is one of the most rewarding collections of music to arrive in recent years.

Sunny Side of the Moon: The Best Of Surfdog Records

Richard Cheese is back with a greatest hit album that's one of the funniest things to come out in some time. For those of you not familiar with Cheese's style, he covers some of the most popular songs of the past years with a lounge vibe, i.e., piano, standup bass, etc. "The Sunny Side of the Moon: The Best of Richard Cheese" contains some of his best material, with new spins on old favorites such as "Baby Got Back," "Sunday Bloody Sunday" and "Closer."

The CD starts off with Nirvana's "Rape Me," but Cheese puts his own spin on this classic and amps it up with an all-new big band version. It continues on with other favorites such as "Girls Girls Girls," originally by Mötley Crüe. Next is a new big band version of "Closer" by Nine Inch Nails. This is one of the funnier songs on the CD, as the controversial lyrics are heard in a new, light manner. I'm sure Nine Inch Nails lead singer Trent Reznor never expected to be parodied in general, let alone on this song.

More old favorites continue, such as U2's "Sunday Bloody Sunday," Limp Bizkit's "Nookie," Van Halen's "Hot for Teacher" and Radiohead's "Creep." Mixed in are a few new tracks such as Young MC's "Bust a Move," Korn's "Freak on a Leash," and Pink Floyd's "Another Brick in the Wall." These are hilarious, in true Richard form, and generate as many laughs as ever.

However, this CD still feels like more of a remix collection than a new CD or a greatest hits collection. The best element of Cheese's act was the relaxed feel of his band. Yet on this disc, the big band versions seem to take away from the overall delivery. This CD would have been a better listen if he simply stuck to the old lounge style of things and added the few new tracks. Overall, diehard Cheese fans would definitely want to add this to their collection. For those not yet familiar with Richard's distinct sound, I suggest you pick up one of his older albums, such as "Aperitif for Destruction" or "Luxicity." These are where his sound and humor truly shine.

The 88 6/10

Over And Over
EMK/Mootron Records

LA alterna-poppers The 88's self-released "Kind Of Light" was, in its limited release and surprising success, a slap in the face to legions of sound-alike indie-pop. More directly influenced by the greats — from the Beatles to the Kinks — and more intelligent than the average band-of-the-week on "The OC", The 88 had the sunny harmonies, clever lyrics and unique arrangements that made for a record that was equally smart and fun.

Singer Keith Slettedahl's voice — a little sprinkle of John Lennon and a larger dose of Spoon's Britt Daniels — was a pleasure to listen to, and the band's instrumentation, while not incredibly complex, showed clear talent.

After getting some radio play and featured spots on late-night talk shows, though still relegated mostly to the West Coast, The 88 returned to the studio to record a follow-up. "Over and Over" bears all the same qualities that made "Kind Of Light" such a delight, but stretches them thin over of the course of the 12 songs contained therein. Whereas every song on "Kind Of Light" was a strong composition, "Over and Over" feels like half of a great album and half of a stale follow-up. The opening pair, "Hide Another Mistake" and "All 'Cause of You" are clever twists on sunny, catchy pop-rock. "Bowls" feels grandiose, not bloated, with a big melody and excellent use of slide guitar.

As the album progresses, however, "Over and Over" appears to be recycling the same tricks, well, over and over. The second half of the album is bogged down by songs that are bland, lacking even a catchy melody to hold on to, let alone truly inventive songwriting. And while Slettedahl's voice always relied on a healthy amount of rasp, there are at least a few songs where he recalls Rod Stewart in a most unpleasant way. The track that is the biggest offender of all of the above complaints is the acoustic guitar-based ballad "You Belong to Me." Treading water for three-and-a-half minutes, "You Belong to Me" isn't even necessarily a bad song, it's just lackluster for a band with so much promise.

And such seems to be the credo of "Over and Over." It's not a sophomore slump, it's just a flame that burns out a little too quickly. The band sounds tight, but it is often the kind of tightness that is bragged about by the over-produced, under-written pop-rockers that The 88 were supposed to be the antidote for. "Over and Over" sounds like it was written by a band that knows what they are doing, but many tracks possess a sterility that signals a band chasing a pre-formulated idea of "perfection," all the while forgetting the passion that is supposed to go into songwriting. Or perhaps the pressure of being a band on the brink of national success just snuck its way into the songs in an unfortunate way.

Whatever the cause, "Over and Over" is lacking some of the spark that made The 88 a band to watch. There are still plenty of bright moments and it is overall a solid record, but hopefully next time The 88 will push themselves creatively a bit more.

Valentine's Day set for release of 'Saw II'

By Daniel Fienberg
Zap2it.com

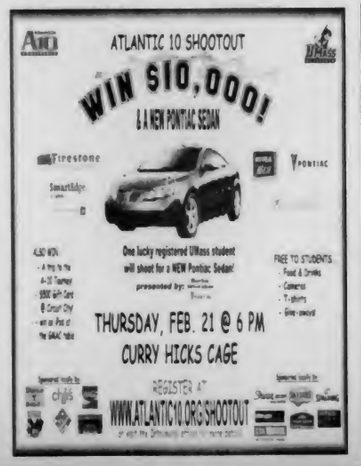
LOS ANGELES — This Valentine's Day, there will be flowers. There will be boxes of chocolates. And, oh yes, there will be blood. So goes the marketing strategy for Lionsgate, which is releasing "Saw II" on Tuesday, a day typically reserved for cuddlier pursuits.

"It's excellent," laughs "Saw II" director Darren Lynn Bousman. "You've got hearts, you've got blood. It goes hand-in-hand."

A lot has changed for Bousman since "Saw II" opened in the fall and parlayed a production budget of less than $5 million into a worldwide gross of nearly $125 million, but he has yet to move into a new apartment or purchase a new car. In fact, his only new indulgence is downright adorable.

"I bought a puppy," he admits. "That was probably the only thing that I've done. It was a very, very expensive puppy, so I guess I'm OK there. Every time she runs around, I'm like, 'That's 'Saw II' right there.'"

Yes, the man behind the wrist-slashing, blood-coughing, needle-poking, flesh-burning smash is the proud owner of a new goldendoodle. Bousman hasn't gone soft, though. He's excited for the "Saw II" DVD release, but he's already envisioning a second, unrated version of the film to inevitably hit stores next fall, shortly before "Saw III" appears in theaters.



"There is a much more graphic version of the movie," he notes. "We really lucked out with the MPAA. A lot of the good stuff made it into the film. There were only two or three sequences we cut that I'd love to put back in. The fire scene was a lot more graphic at one point and the needle scene was just a different type of scene — we re-edited to try to make it less intense."

Bousman swears that "Saw" fans aren't just watching to find out what kind of sadistic torture Jigsaw (Tobin Bell) will enact on his victims. They also appreciate the killer's lessons about learning to better appreciate life.

"We hook them in with the gore and it's more than that which makes them stay and see it again," he says. "The great thing about 'Saw' and 'Saw II' was the repeat viewing that people had. I think if it was just gore, they wouldn't go back. You'd get people there for a big opening weekend and they'd laugh and see the movie and they wouldn't go see them again. It's the other part that keeps them alive for the second weekend and the third weekend."

In addition to working on "Saw III" in some capacity, Bousman has lined up several potential follow-up projects, efforts that he anticipates will continue a shift in horror films.

"I think that as an audience, the boundaries are starting to break down from these PG-13 horror films that have been polluting the market," he predicts. "Yeah, you're going to start seeing a lot more graphic type of movies, more graphic horror. I guarantee you the next thing I'm doing is going to make 'Saw' look like a Disney film."

want to be biased but ... he knows and thinks he's going to nail [his dives]," he said. "I'm just there to have fun and to compete, you know? Work hard, just like everyone else there.

"[Isajan] goes in expecting to be the winner, and that's not cool," he added. "Arrogant is a good word [to describe him]. He's a real arrogant guy. I used to try and just talk to him, but he's always blew me off, so I don't even bother anymore. I just go and have my good time, you know?"

And let's not forget those superstitions, either. Rappe considers himself to be very superstitious, from the way he dries off the pennies he finds (they must be face-up).

"I'm superstitious. I'm really superstitious," he said. "Finding a penny heads-up, stuff like that. Usually my rituals are like, where my shammy [towel used to dry off] is, how I dry off, how I go through every dive before I do it. Then there's listening to music, everyone does that."

Sophomore diver R.J. Rappe was the only diver representing the Massachusetts diving team at the NCAA regionals last March.

Rappe's got his own playlist on his iPod, mainly consisting of the Beastie Boys. His favorite song, appropriately, is entitled "Body Movin'" and comes off their "Hello Nasty" album.

And when the day is done, he'll be relaxing again — calm, cool, poised as ever, always ready to take it to the next level.

including prescription painkillers or alcohol. The university said it would not comment on the DUI citation because of privacy and legal reasons.

Sutton was traveling to the Stillwater airport to fly with his team to College Station, Texas, when the accident happened.

According to a police report, Sutton's sport utility vehicle went left of the center line on a Stillwater street, corrected and then struck another SUV from behind at about 60 mph.

Witnesses told police that shortly before the accident, Sutton was unsteady on his feet and struck his head after falling in the parking lot of Gallagher-Iba Arena before entering his vehicle. Stillwater police said Saturday.

Sutton resigned in 1989 from a Kentucky program placed on four years' probation and arrived at his alma mater in 1990 with a chance to rebuild the Cowboys. At his introductory news conference he said he recognized three years earlier that he had a problem with alcohol, and said "I've dealt with it." He received treatment at the Betty Ford Center.

At Oklahoma State he added to his record of 15-straight seasons of at least 17 wins. He has taken the Cowboys to the Final Four in 1995 and 2004.

He entered this season — his 16th at Oklahoma State and 36th overall — with a chance to reach 800 wins. If he fell short of the mark, Sutton said he'd consider retirement.

With six regular-season games remaining, Sutton ends the season with 794 wins. The Cowboys are 13-11 and 3-7 in the Big 12. The coach recently criticized his team's mental and physical toughness, calling it the "softest team in 16 years that I have ever coached."

"The season has not gone as we wished; but we have a talented and fine group of young men and I look for them to finish the season strong," Sutton said in Monday's statement. "I won't be on the bench, but I'll be with them."

Assistant coach James Dickey, who took Sutton's place on the Big 12 coaches' conference call Monday, said Sutton addressed his players twice by phone Sunday.

"I'm sure they were disappointed," Dickey said. "As you can imagine, the players listened intently. But they all wished him the best, told him they loved him. He told them he loved them, to stay on the books and play hard and do their best."

Kwan bowes out with groin injury brought to the games in the first place.

Outside of dressing Chad Hedrick in sequins and teaching him a quick triple-triple, though, options were limited.

Things got worse Monday when America's gold medal hope in the women's downhill, Lindsey Kildow, crashed horribly at high speed and had to be airlifted to a hospital. Later in the day, American luger Samantha Retrosi suffered a concussion and short-term memory loss when she crashed on the ice.

Hedrick may turn into the star that saves this team. He won the first gold for the United States in speed-skating, will be favored in two other races and has a chance to medal in yet two more.

Get used to speed-skating. The Dutch do it a lot, and they seem to enjoy it.

Don't get used to seeing the United States near the top of the medal standings, as it was when Americans won a record 34 medals on the home ice and snow of Salt Lake City. There's a reason athletes win more medals at home. It's because it's, well, home.

Turin, if you hadn't noticed, is a lot different than Salt Lake City.

United States figure skater Michelle Kwan withdrew from the 2006 Winter Olympics because of a nagging groin injury.

Sure, the pizza's better. And Miller and Hedrick can get a beer pretty much any time of the night.

But the beds in the Olympic Village are hard and there's no room service. That alone may be enough to throw figure skater Johnny Weir off his game.

Of course, Weir dresses as a swan for his short program, so he doesn't look at things quite the same as the average athlete.

Better than an ugly duckling — because that's more like the American team so far in these games.

gating gambling activity, attorneys said.

Jim O'neal, the Coyotes' head of security, said he received a call from Gretzky last Monday afternoon saying authorities showed up asking to speak with his wife, who was at the couple's Los Angeles home.

"He was totally surprised," O'neal said. "He said they told him, 'We're not here to see you. We just need to serve her with something.'"

Gretzky's attorney and O'neal denied reports that New Jersey authorities surprised Gretzky and Jones at their Arizona home on Super Bowl Sunday, as a New York newspaper reported.

Tocchet also learned of the criminal investigation last Monday, O'neal said, when he was served with a criminal complaint by New Jersey detectives at a Scottsdale restaurant. O'neal said he helped broker the meeting between Tocchet and authorities.

"I filled Wayne in. I said I was meeting the two investigators ... to serve Rick Tocchet with a summons," O'neal said." Wayne called me back and asked Rick to give him a call."

A handful of NHL players have been implicated in the ring, authorities say, but none have been identified or charged. Strictly speaking, it is not a crime to place a bet, but NHL players would be violating league rules if they wagered on hockey games. There's no evidence of wagering on hockey, according to the former federal prosecutor investigating the allegations on behalf of the NHL.

The New Jersey Attorney General's Office and state police said Sunday the agencies wouldn't comment on a pending criminal investigation

Bucknell ranked for first time

We didn't know enough about ourselves and then lost a couple more when we came back home.

"Looking back now if those young kids had had a lot of success early they wouldn't have been tough enough to sustain what they have. The one blessing is what we went through helped this team get to where it is now."

Kansas was in the preseason poll every year since 1991, and was out of the top-10 only three times in that span. The Jayhawks had the second-longest streak for consecutive poll appearances to Duke, a run of 93 polls dating to the preseason poll of 2000-01.

Self wasn't sure how this team would react to returning to the Top-25.

"I don't know because everything with this team is new," he said. "So far they used our nonranking as a motivation. It hasn't affected them any way but positively."

Connecticut received 67 first-place votes and 1,795 points from the national media panel. Duke (23-1) was second with four No. 1 votes and 1,635 points. Memphis was third and Villanova, which hosted Connecticut on Monday night, received the only other first-place vote.

Gonzaga and Texas remained fifth and sixth, respectively, while George Washington moved up one place to seventh. Tennessee jumped three spots to eighth and was followed by Pittsburgh and Florida.

West Virginia, which lost to Pittsburgh and beat Georgetown last week, dropped from No. 9 to 11 and was followed by Ohio State, Boston College, Illinois, UCLA, Michigan State, Georgetown, Iowa, Oklahoma and Washington.

The last five ranked teams were North Carolina State, Kansas, North Carolina, Bucknell and LSU.

The other newcomer this week was LSU (16-7), which was ranked for one week twice this season. The Tigers come in having lost two of three, the most recent loss at Florida on Saturday.

Michigan (16-6) dropped out from 22nd having lost three straight, including losses last week to Ohio State and Purdue.

Indiana (13-8), which had been ranked all season and got as high as No. 9, dropped out from 24th after losses last week to Wisconsin and Iowa. Northern Iowa (21-5) fell from 25th after losing at home to Missouri State on Saturday.

Bucknell's Chris McNaughton, a Preseason Player of the Year in the Patriot League, leads the Bison to the first national ranking the in school's history.

Rappe making splash

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

Behind the doors in the Boyden athletic center's wrestling room, a gathering of mats occupied by a dozen students dripping in sweat not more than a half-hour prior to this meeting. Meanwhile, a kid is just sitting there, taking it all in with a cool, collective air about himself.

Diving coach Mandy Hixon holds these weekly meetings to have her players "visualize" their dives and get a little bit of inspiration. On this particular day she's brought in footage of the 1992 Barcelona Olympics, perhaps to provide some guidance.

Meanwhile, the kid's got a grin on his face, shaggy hair tucked under a ski hat, bare-chested and all, and he's clearly at peace. The vibe in the room is very free-spirited.

Hixon calls this team the best she's ever coached. He's a big reason why.

A year ago, though, it was not this easygoing for sophomore diver R.J. Rappe, who says he was "all nervous" despite being the lone swimmer or diver to represent the University of Massachusetts at the NCAA Regionals last March.

"Last year was just a learning experience, straight up," the Farmington, Minn., native said. "I had to learn so much; I was a scared freshman, I'm not going to lie, I mean, I was intimidated."

For the record, Rappe became the first Atlantic 10 diving champion in school history as a "scared freshman" when he placed first in the one-meter dive with 304.30 points at last year's A-10 Championships in Buffalo.

He also set a school record in the three-meter with a 488.75-point performance at the A-10's, good enough for second. On top of those two merits, three season victories and 13 top-5 finishes aided in getting him a chance to compete at the NCAA Zone A Diving Regionals, where he finished 15th overall.

So, tail between his legs or not, he showed some real poise and promise as a rookie.

Fast forward 11 months to today, and he's on the other end of the stick. He's confident. He's bold. He's cooler than the 18 inches of snow that blanketed Boston on Sunday, and it's put him through the roof.

"Things are really picking up for me right now, they're really going well," he said. "I'm getting a lot stronger. I'm doing a lot harder dives than I did last year. I mean, we're really mixing it with some really big dives. It's really picked up this year."

Rappe has taken first four times this season, three times in the one-meter and once in the three-meter, and second twice, once in each event. He also appears to be a favorite heading into tomorrow's A-10's.

Speaking of A-10's — and it's what the swimmers and divers have been anxiously waiting for all season — Rappe's coolness has a few words to spit about some of his competitors, too.

Typically, Hixon's divers are selfless. They cheer on their teammates, and consider themselves to be louder than any other team in the A-10's, further saying that other teams are sometimes "wowed" by the camaraderie. Rappe is no different from this mentality, and often likes to try and be friendly to his competitors.

But divers like LaSalle's Karo Isajan, according to Rappe, will have none of it. Both seem to have similar skill level and, in Rappe's words, "really duke it out" — Isajan was last year's A-10 three-meter champ, while Rappe won the one-meter — but share different mentalities.

"I'm going in there to have fun and do my best. I don't

U.S. olympians struggle in Turin

By Tim Dahlberg
Associated Press

TURIN, Italy — Curl Girls were supposed to really rock. They had the catchy nickname, their own Web site and smiles as white as a Minnesota winter.

They were poised to be stars — or as close to it as anyone can be with a broom in their hand.

And, as Tiger Woods would say, they were really rolling the rock beautifully.

At least they were until Monday, when the United States women's curling team was blown out in their opening match to underdog Norway — proving, of course, that even frenetic sweeping can be affected by a case of Olympic nerves.

Call it an early scare for the Curl Girls. But there were a lot scarier things going on for American athletes in the mountains outside this factory city.

Two frightening crashes. Two medal hopefuls lying in hospitals.

NBC might have liked it because nothing sells like some good wipeout videos. Three days into these Olympics, though, injured Americans are piling up and U.S. medal projections are plummeting faster than General Motors' car sales.

If it weren't for those wacky snowboarders grabbing air and kicking rear, the United States wouldn't even be on the first page of the leaderboard in the thing most important to those who dole out Olympic money: the medal count.

Three days into these Olympics, America's biggest — and supposedly best — team is off to a start that might be described as slushy, at best. The medal count doesn't look bad at six, but four of those were won in a sport that didn't even become part of the Olympics until eight years ago.

Maybe it's time to invent some more sports like America did with snowboarding. Better hurry because the U.S. is terrible at things like ski jumping, biathalon and cross-country skiing, and it doesn't seem to be getting much better in other winter sports.

It's too late for Turin, but how about a combination of Frisbee golf and downhill skiing? We could call it Friski, and Americans should be able to dominate for a few Olympics before the rest of the world catches up.

Don't like that? Then think speed ice fishing. The 2010 organizers can freeze some kiddie pools full of trout, build little shacks on top of them and give competitors five minutes to reel in all they can. Minnesotans should sweep the medals in this event.

If that doesn't work, bring back barrel jumping. It's exciting and easy to understand when you've added one barrel too many. American skaters used to rule that competition when it was a staple on "Wide World of Sports" back in the '60s.

Right now, though, NBC would be happy just to have the team they spent so many hours promoting. By the second day of the Olympics their biggest star was gone, their biggest mouth was muted and there were still nearly 400 hours of television time left to be filled.

Michelle Kwan bowed out tearfully with an injury, then rejected NBC's pleas to stay on as a commentator. Bode Miller finished out of the money in the downhill, and Apolo Anton Ohno nearly ended up sliding on his soul patch.

Miller and Ohno will have more chances, while the 17-year-old sister of 2002 gold medalist Sarah Hughes will fly to Italy to take Kwan's place. Some good lineage can't hurt, but there was a reason Emily Hughes wasn't

Cowboys' Sutton cited for DUI

By Kelly Kurt
Associated Press

TULSA, Okla. — Eddie Sutton was cited with driving under the influence after he was injured in a car accident, and the Oklahoma State basketball coach will take a medical leave for the rest of the season.

Friday's accident in Stillwater, along with chronic back and hip pain, prompted the 69-year-old coach's decision, the school said Monday. Sean Sutton, his son and head-coach designate, will finish this season as coach. Oklahoma State was home Monday night against Kansas. The university said no decision has been made on who will coach next season.

Sutton was hospitalized overnight for a head injury and released Saturday after the two-vehicle accident. The occupant of the other SUV received minor injuries and was released at the scene, officers said.

In a statement released by the university, Sutton said that "with my deteriorating physical condition and other issues, I have been under a tremendous amount of stress."

The coach said he had been close to taking a medical leave after a Feb. 4 trip to Kansas State because "the pain in my back was making it very difficult to coach."

"After Friday's events, I know it is best to go on medical leave the remainder of the season to address my future health," he said. "It is very difficult to step away from the team. But I know they are in great hands."

Stillwater police cited Sutton after the accident but did not jail him on a complaint of driving under the influence because of a lack of physical evidence, the city's police chief said Monday.

Police are awaiting the results of blood tests that will confirm whether the coach was driving under the influence, Stillwater Chief Norman McNickle said. It could take six to eight weeks to receive the test results. Sutton was not given a field sobriety test at the time because he needed medical treatment, McNickle said.

Before issuing a DUI citation "officers have to have reasonable suspicion to believe the person was under the influence at the time," the chief said, declining to discuss those suspicions because they are part of an investigation.

The police department has filed complaints against Sutton for speeding and crossing the road's center line, the chief said.

Under Oklahoma law, driving under the influence can include a range of substances,

Gretzsky straps in for bumpy ride, hockey's image suffering

By Beth DeFalco and Angela Delli
Associated Press

Hockey legend and Phoenix Coyotes coach Wayne Gretzsky is under investigation for his wife's involvement in high stakes gambling.

Wayne Gretzky's contention that he had no prior knowledge of an illegal gambling ring linked to his wife and Rick Tocchet appears to be supported by the timing of a wiretap conversation involving the hockey Hall of Famer.

A New Jersey state police-wiretapped conversation of Gretzky asking Tocchet, an assistant under Gretzky on the Phoenix Coyotes, how Gretzky's wife, Janet Jones, could avoid being named as a participant in the ring happened last Monday. That was the day after Jones allegedly won money betting on the Super Bowl, sources told The Associated Press.

A person with knowledge of the investigation confirmed the wiretap was recorded last Monday, the day Gretzky's lawyer said New Jersey detectives showed up at the Phoenix coach's doorstep looking to speak to his wife.

"Published reports that Wayne had spoken to Rick Tocchet about his concern for Janet prior to officers appearing at Wayne's house on Monday are completely ludicrous," said Gretzky's attorney, Ron Fujikawa. "It's absolute balderdash."

Gretzky, the executive director of Canada's Olympic hockey team, was scheduled to travel to Italy on Monday with his wife for the Turin Olympics. The Canadian team will practice Monday afternoon in Mississauga, Ontario.

Last Tuesday, New Jersey authorities announced charges against Tocchet, a New Jersey state trooper and another New Jersey man for running a nationwide sports gambling operation. State police said wagers primarily on professional football – exceeded $1.7 million in the five weeks leading up to the Super Bowl.

Gretzky, revered as hockey's greatest player and now in his first season as Phoenix's coach, said he was unaware of any gambling accusations until Tocchet called him last Monday night.

But when reports surfaced that a wiretapped conversation between Gretzky and Tocchet happened within the last month, questions over whether Gretzky knew about the ring before authorities contacted him last Monday spawned a publicity firestorm for first family of hockey.

In all, Jones bet at least $100,000 on football, sources said. Jones hasn't been charged with any crime but is expected to be subpoenaed to testify before a grand jury investi-

Bucknell cracks the Top-25

By Jim O'Connell
Associated Press

Bucknell, the Patriot League team that has beaten some of the country's premier programs the last two seasons, joined The Associated Press' Top-25 for the first time Monday.

"This is so neat for the school and everything like that. I won't play it down because it's wonderful for people to have that kind of respect for our program," Bucknell coach Pat Flannery said. "At the same time, we have the kind of kids who can take it in stride to be ranked among that company."

Bucknell (20-3) moved into the poll at No. 24, two spots below another newcomer used to being among the ranked. Kansas (17-6), one of the big-time programs the Bison beat last season, entered for the first time this season at No. 22.

Connecticut (22-1) was a runaway No. 1 for the fourth straight week and the next five teams held their positions in the rankings, but it was Bucknell that drew the attention.

The Bison beat Pittsburgh and Saint Joseph's last season before shocking Kansas in the first round of the NCAA tournament, the first win for a Patriot League team. They didn't miss a beat this season, winning at Syracuse.

"I think going to Pitt and winning and Saint Joe's got the ball rolling and as we went along we got confidence," Flannery said.

The Bison have won 11 straight since losing two straight on the road to Santa Clara and No. 1 Duke. Their other loss this season was to No. 4 Villanova.

"Our place is filled every night and buses come with us on the road," Flannery said. "This has created such excitement and as long as we take it in stride, we have some size and some handlers, the components to be able to compete with people."

The Bison play at Lafayette on Wednesday and at Northern Iowa, another school which entered the poll for the first time this season, on Saturday in a Bracket Buster game.

"It is a big game in a sense of being a TV game that's big for our conferences, but first we have a league game that's huge," Flannery said. "Then we'll be on a national scale and it will give people a chance to see us again and for us to put our best foot forward."

Kansas, which has won seven straight and 14 of 16, lost three seniors from the team that was ranked No. 1 last season before losing to Bucknell as a No. 3 seed. The Jayhawks, led by freshmen Brandon Rush and Mario Chalmers, lost four of their first seven games in a tough early schedule.

"I don't think any coach wants to get off to the start we did," Kansas' Bill Self said Monday, hours before the Jayhawks played at Oklahoma State. "We weren't mature enough to go to Maui.

Roddick tries subdued approach

By Ken Peters
Associated Press

SAN DIEGO — Andy Roddick tried the calm approach, and it worked.

That doesn't necessarily mean he plans to be low-key all the time on the court.

"Even the calmest guys, you see Pete [Sampras] get fired up sometimes," Roddick said Sunday after his victory over Romania's Razvan Sabau moved the United States into the Davis Cup quarterfinals against Chile.

"But I think it's something that can definitely be learned, and especially in Davis Cup matches when tensions are high, kind of learn just to take it down a little bit," Roddick added. "Maybe today was the start of it, who knows?"

Roddick, who was nauseous during his opening singles and lost to Andre Pavel, came back to beat Sabau 6-3, 6-3, 6-2. Unlike his match two days earlier, Roddick seemed subdued while he was controlling the match against Sabau.

"I just wanted him to relax, and not just emotionally play and get too hyped up," team captain Patrick McEnroe said. "I think sometimes he gets so excited in Davis Cup that maybe he expends too much energy early in the match, sort of what happened on Friday."

Roddick, whose win over Sabau gave the Americans an insurmountable 3-1 lead in the best-of-five competition, said he paced himself.

"I kind of put it on cruise control early and was trying to not overexert energy between points," he said. "I felt fine, but I didn't want to test it too much and find out how deep I could go."

"I was just trying to maintain energy and keep an even keel."

In the earlier match against Pavel, Roddick won the first two sets and had match point before he became really sick. He vomited and wound up being so dehydrated he had no energy. Pavel came back to win in five sets.

"I felt horrible the other day after my match," Roddick said. "I didn't want to test those waters. It would have been useless for me to throw around energy [in the Sabau match] that didn't need to be thrown around."

After Roddick's win clinched it for the Americans, James Blake made the final 4-1 with his closing singles victory.

Blake and the doubles team of Mike and Bob Bryan provided the first two U.S. victories, then Blake capped the first round with a 6-1, 7-5 win over Horia Tecau in what essentially was an exhibition match shortened to two sets.

Sabau, ranked No. 112 to Roddick's No. 3, filled in for injured teammate Victor Hanescu. Hanescu, No. 41, tore ligaments in his left side during doubles the previous day and had to quit after the first set, won 6-2 by the Bryans.

Blake had beaten Hanescu in straight sets Friday to even the matches 1-1 after Roddick lost to Pavel.

Sabau realized Roddick was playing conservatively.

"I wish I could have done more than I did because I saw that Roddick was not 100 percent," he said. "I saw him playing a different tactic than he usually is playing. He was defensive and he stayed very long distance behind the baseline.

"I was expecting him to attack me." Roddick, who wasn't pleased with his serving, still had 17 aces to one by Sabau, and three double-faults to nine by the Romanian.

The United States assured itself a home date and the choice of playing surface for the April 7-9 matches. The site and surface are to be determined.

UMass employee helps with tsunami aid

By John Fenuccio
Collegian Staff

In the wake of the devastation caused by the 2004 tsunami, a nurse practitioner from the University of Massachusetts's Health Services traveled to Sri Lanka to help with relief efforts.

Upon hearing tragic accounts of survivors from a personal friend, Sara Aierstuck decided she needed to take time away from treating her students to helping out during the crisis.

"It was one of those very few times in my life where I felt like it was the right thing to do and I was kind of surrendering to the fact that there's a real need here," Aierstuck said.

Two days after her decision to leave, friends and coworkers raised nearly $1,200 and gathered two suitcases full of antibiotics, bandages and other medical supplies.

"It was unbelievable because people I didn't even know gave $5, $10, anything they could."

A couple that run the Centre for Peacebuilding and Reconciliation (PCBR), a group focusing on training grassroots leaders in mediation and peacebuilding, hosted Aierstuck. However, since the Tsunami hit, they've been working on relief efforts.

Aierstuck ended up working with a team of doctors, nurses and public health workers just south of Jaffna, the cultural capital of the Tamil people. Aierstuck and her team took a van to various refugee camps in the Mullaitivu area. An area that had 3000 deaths, 2000 injured, 2000 missing and now have 25,000 people living in the refugee camps.

There were twenty-two refugee camps holding anywhere from 200 to 1,000 people in need of medical attention. While Aierstuck didn't know what to expect, other than what she'd heard from a friend, nothing could have prepared her for what she witnessed.

"What I had to think about was how much psychological trauma there was with the people. Some people didn't just loose members of their immediate family, but some lost twenty to thirty people of their family, an entire generation lost," Aierstuck said. "Just trying to imagine that was really hard to take."

Aierstuck saw patients with all types of problems, relating to the Tsunami, living in highly crowded conditions and chronic poverty. Aside from people living on the now decimated coast, the poorer areas were in the worst situations because no governmental structures were in place to care for its people in a time of crisis.

Guilt weighed heavily among the survivors because many weren't able to hang onto their loved ones while the massive waves poured in from the Indian Ocean. The horrid trauma survivors endured was enough to make some people delusional and others even worse.

"Many people were still in shock, some had not been able to eat, sleep or talk since the tsunami," Aierstuck said. "The area we worked in has no regular electricity or phone lines, so many people had no way of knowing the status of family who lived in relatively nearby villages."

Sri Lanka's own doctors and their ability to help and treat their people particularly impressed Aierstuck. While they don't have such things as disposable products, electricity, or even the most up-to-date medicines that recipients of western medicine may take for granted, Aierstuck was still impressed at what they could accomplish.

"I have tremendous respect for the doctors who are doing the best they can in some very difficult conditions," Aierstuck said.

Since her return, Aierstuck has been in contact with several of the people who helped her throughout her trip. As she's continually donating funds and technologies to grassroots organizations like the CPBR that help in relief efforts, students looking for any way that they can help should contact Aierstuck or the CPBR.

While the images she witnessed during her trip will be forever implanted in her memory, Aierstuck was particularly moved by something that survived the natural disaster.

"The town we were in was just amazing. There was a big beautiful Catholic church and all that was left was the alter," Aierstuck said.

2 picketers hit by cars during strike

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

Two contractors involved in the "informational line" picketing at the construction site of the new residence halls were struck by motor vehicles at the site entrance yesterday, according to University of Massachusetts Police Chief Pat Archbald.

Archbald said there were two incidents yesterday morning of contractors entering the motor site, upon which protestors crossed in front of the vehicles and were struck.

In each case, the victim was transported to Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton. Representatives of the hospital declined to comment on the status of the two victims.

The two victims have been identified as Stephen Keane of 153 South Martin Street in Holyoke, and Daniel Redmond of 275 Westfield Road in Holyoke.

Picketing continued yesterday morning, but as of 1:30 p.m. there were no non-union workers at the site. The "informational line," as workers prefer to call it, as opposed to a "strike", will resume tomorrow morning. No workers on site offered to comment about the informational line or the two workers that were hit by motor vehicles.

No one from Dimeo, a union-based company constructing the buildings, was made available for comment at press time.

"UMass police has been a presence at this particular job site, in an attempt to seek out two functions," Archbald said. "One is to keep the job site open and accessible to the contractors, and the other is to allow the right of those persons who would like to protest to express their free speech rights. That's our goal, and I think we've been successful."

Amy Daignault, a representative of Adams Plumbing and Heating, one of the companies building the new residence halls, said that the signs held by protestors, which state that the company "doesn't pay area standards on all jobs," is incorrect.

According to Daignault, "we do pay standards, as we are supposed to…our guys make more than some union workers."

Daignault also responded to the complaint made by the Sheet Metal Workers Local 63 that Adams Plumbing and Heating has not answered questions regarding the employment of minorities.

Daignault said that the union "is not an authority over us," and therefore, Adams Plumbing and Heating is not required to answer to them.

Cheney shooting victim suffers heart attack

By Lynn Brezosky
Associated Press

CORPUS CHRISTI, Texas — The 78-year-old lawyer wounded by Vice President Dick Cheney in a hunting accident suffered a mild heart attack Tuesday after a shotgun pellet in his chest traveled to his heart, hospital officials said.

Harry Whittington was immediately moved back to an intensive care unit and will be watched for a week to make sure more of the metal pellets do not move to other vital organs. He was reported in stable condition.

Whittington suffered a "silent heart attack" – obstructed blood flow, but without the classic heart-attack symptoms of pain and pressure, according to doctors at Christus Spohn Hospital Corpus Christi-Memorial.

The doctors said they decided to treat the situation conservatively and leave the pellet alone rather than operate to remove it. They said they are highly optimistic Whittington will recover and live a healthy life with the pellet left in place.

Asked whether the pellet could move farther into his heart and become fatal, hospital officials said that was a hypothetical question they could not answer.

Hospital officials said they were not concerned about the six to two hundred other pieces of birdshot that might still be lodged in Whittington's body. Cheney was using 7 1/2 shot from a 28-gauge shotgun. Shotgun pellets are typically made of steel or lead; the pellets in 7 1/2 shot are just under a tenth of an inch in diameter.

Cheney watched the news conference where doctors described Whittington's complications. Then the vice president called him, wished him well and asked if there was anything that he needed.

"The vice president said that he stood ready to assist. Mr. Whittington's spirits were good, but obviously his situation deserves the careful monitoring that his doctors are providing," the vice president's office said in a statement.

Cheney, an experienced hunter, has not spoken publicly about the accident, which took place Saturday night while the vice president was aiming for a quail. Critics of the Bush administration called for more answers from the Cheney himself.

Whittington has said through hospital officials that he does not want to comment on the shooting. A young man at Whittington's Austin home who identified himself as his grandson said Tuesday he did not have time to talk to a reporter and closed the door.

The furor over the accident and the White House delay in making it public are "part of the secretive nature of this administration," said Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada. "I think it's time the American people heard from the vice president."

Before hospital officials announced details of Whittington's condition, the hunting accident had produced a raft of Cheney jokes on late-night television.

"I think Cheney is starting to lose it," Jay Leno said. "After he shot the guy he screamed, 'Anyone else want to call domestic wiretapping illegal?'"

On Tuesday morning, the White House spokesman briefly joined in the merriment, joking that the orange school colors of the visiting University of Texas championship football team should not

Wal-Mart must stock emergency contraceptives

By Brooke Donald
Associated Press

BOSTON — The state pharmacy board ordered Wal-Mart on Tuesday to stock emergency contraception pills at its stores in Massachusetts.

Massachusetts becomes the second state to require the world's largest retailer to carry the morning-after pill.

A Wal-Mart spokesman said the company would comply with the directive by the Massachusetts Board of Pharmacy and is reviewing its nationwide policy on the drug.

"Clearly women's health is a high priority for Wal-Mart," spokesman Dan Fogleman said. "We are actively thinking through the issue."

Wal-Mart now carries the pill only in Illinois, where it is required to do so under state law. The company has said it "chooses not to carry many products for business reasons," but has refused to elaborate.

The unanimous decision by the pharmacy board comes two weeks after three women, backed by abortion rights groups, sued Bentonville, Ark.-based Wal-Mart for failing to carry the drug in its 44 Wal-Marts and four Sam's Club stores in Massachusetts.

The women had argued that state policy requires pharmacies to provide all "commonly prescribed medicines."

The morning-after pill provides a high dose of hormones that women can take up to five days after sex to prevent pregnancy. Some abortion opponents believe emergency contraception is a form of abortion because it blocks the fertilized egg from being implanted on the uterine wall.

CVS, the state's largest pharmacy chain, stocks the pill at all of its pharmacy locations, as do the state's other major pharmacy chains.

Sam Perkins, a lawyer for the three women, praised the board's decision and said he was prepared to sue in other states should Wal-Mart not overturn its policy. Abortion rights groups and women's organizations have also urged Wal-Mart to change its policy.

"I'm proud to be able to tell my patients that they now can go anywhere for their prescriptions," said one of the plaintiffs, Dr. Rebekah Gee, 30, of Boston.

"My patients should not have to shop around."

Katrina McCarty and Rebekah Gee are plaintiffs in a lawsuit against Wal-Mart.

U.S. missing millions in taxes

By Mary Dalrymple
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Internal Revenue Service said Tuesday that taxpayers shortchanged the government by $345 billion in 2001, with the biggest problem among people failing to report income from business ventures.

Sole proprietors, independent contractors, self-employed workers and others who report business income on their individual tax returns accounted for $189 billion in missing taxes. They failed to report 43 percent of the business income.

Within that category, taxpayers with farm income did not pay $6 billion in taxes, failing to report 72 percent of that income. Non-farm proprietors did not pay $68 billion in taxes, failing to report 57 percent of that income.

Class B substance found in Baker dorm

4:55 p.m.
Christopher Mandonas, 18, of 50 Crescent Lane in Sudbury, was arrested on charges of person under 21 in possession of liquor. Officers saw two men who did not look of drinking age walking towards a car in Lot 44 (near Northeast dormitory) in a manner that drew the attention of the officers. The two then proceeded to open the trunk of the car, looked around to see if anyone was watching, and the officers observed alcohol being moved into bags. Neither party was found to be of 21 years of age, though Mandonas was charged because he was caught handling the alcohol.

Friday, February 10

11:30 p.m.
Brian Patrick Hudson, 24, of 3836 Harper Court in Bethlehem, Penn., was arrested on two counts of indecent assault and battery on a person 14 or over. Police responded to a complaint by two women partaking in the Chinese New Year celebration at the Campus Center Auditorium. Officers met and interviewed with the two women, who identified Hudson by name and said he is a student at UMass. The two say he "inappropriately touched them," and continued despite being told to stop. Hudson was not on the scene at the time, but police were given direction of travel back to his campus residence. The officers identified Hudson as the suspect in his dormitory building, and made the subsequent arrest.

Saturday, February 11

12:49 p.m.
Default warrant issued for Shawn Emin, 21, of 10 Highwoods Road in Tisbury. Police contacted Emin to come into the station as part of an ongoing investigation. The default warrant was issued after Emin failed to show up in Eastern Hampshire District Court, in Hadley.

9:50 p.m.
Keiko Schnelle, 18, of 3880 Road Z, P.O. Box 2143 in Redway, Calif., was arrested on charges of possession of a Class D drug and Class B drug, and Douglas Reedy, 19, of 32 Kirsi Circle in Westford was arrested on charges of possession of a Class D drug. Caller reported an odor of marijuana in Brooks Hall residence. Officers responded and found a small amount of marijuana in addition to a Class B drug in the room. The officers also noticed residue of cocaine on a piece of drug paraphernalia during the investigation.

Sunday, February 12

3:00 a.m.
Marvin L. Mims, 20, of 7 Marvin Place in Cambridge, was arrested after having an outstanding warrant following an altercation. Several residents reported having issues with Mims, and had been "frightened" by some of his actions. It was alleged that Mims said he would physically harm another student if he saw him off-campus. Mims denied it, saying there were never any real threats. A check on Mims revealed he had a default warrant, and he was subsequently put under arrest.

Smuggling ring busted

WINDSOR, Ontario (AP) — A smuggling ring that sometimes forced migrants to hang on the sides of freight trains or be stuffed in car trunks to get across the Canadian-U.S. border was broken Tuesday with the arrests of 17 people, U.S. and Canadian authorities said.

"There was a complete disregard for the safety of these migrants, who paid thousands of dollars to the ring for the privilege of being treated worse than cattle," said Inspector Glenn Hanna of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

U.S. authorities said they intercepted 74 illegal immigrants — mostly from Asian and Eastern European countries — who were being smuggled into the United States from Canada. Canadian officials said 24 migrants were stopped going into their country.

The migrants face deportation. Most were trying to get from Toronto to New York City, officials said.

An indictment unsealed in Detroit described people riding on freight trains. Others rode over bridges and aboard ferries in car trunks or in the cargo trailers of semi-trucks, according to the indictment.

Salespeople found guilty of fakery on doctors' tests

By Aaron Tursey
The Lariat (Baylor U.)

WACO, Texas — Car salespeople are notorious for asking, "What can I do today to get you into this car?" Some salespeople stretch the truth while on the job, but do they embellish their skills? According to a new psychological study of salespeople, they do.

"Over 50 percent of the answers on psychological sales tests are probably faked," said Dr. Jeff Tanner, professor of marketing.

He conducted a study of 94,000 salespeople with his partner George W. Dudley, director of Behavioral Sciences Research Press' Scientific Advisory Board and co-founder of BSRP. The organization is an international research database which specializes in scientific research development, publishing and training.

According to the study, many salespeople do not tell the truth on psychological tests, which is confusing for researchers trying to understand the mind of a salesperson.

The study draws a comparison to the game Balderdash. Questions were posed to test subjects on sales terms and strategies that do not exist. If they gave an answer, researchers knew that they were not telling the truth.

"The test measures fakery by testing to see whether they claim knowledge about selling that they cannot have (because it doesn't exist)," Tanner said. "When we compare their exaggeration scores to their estimates of performance, we find that they are also likely to claim higher levels of performance."

According to the study, salespeople in the United States fake more than in other parts of the world, while those in New Zealand and Singapore fake less.

Ethics has been a hot topic at Baylor University's Hankamer School of Business in recent years, and the Ethics Seminar has been used to teach ethics outside of the classroom.

Matt Hendrickson, right, a salesman at a Circuit City in Brentwood, Missouri explained information to consumers Nick Casey and Angie Bahr, who were interested in looking at televisions.

Baylor is doing its best to teach ethics at the university level.

Some believe general ethics need to be taught at an earlier age.

"Ethics are instilled in you the way that you are raised," Omaha, Neb., senior Michelle Taubert said. "The business school can tell you what is and isn't ethical. Their responsibility is to make students aware of what is and isn't appropriate."

Tanner said there hasn't been any research conducted proving that teaching ethics at the university level produces positive results. He said the stereotype of salespeople can hurt their reputation.

"Think about how salespeople and other business people are often portrayed in media," Tanner said. "Students probably don't realize that most people in business are ethical."

The results of the study weren't compared to the salespeople's employee performance records. The ethics of some salespeople can lead to questionable sales practices used to confuse potential buyers, especially students. Some students may feel worried when it comes to negotiation.

"Before (I took the) professional sales (class) I felt intimidated," said Heather Neumann, a senior from The Woodlands, Texas. "Whenever I go into a sale, I realize what their job is. It's hard to be a salesperson. I respect why they are there and what they do. A good ethical salesperson is one who will meet your needs."

Others feel they have they can cut through the jargon.

"You need to go into the situation knowing what you want, instead of letting them decide for you," Taubert said. "You can see through when people are trying to manipulate your needs."

In his professional selling class, Tanner teaches students they represent more than the company while on the job.

"Who we represent as salespeople is the community, Jesus Christ, ourselves and the company and its values," Neumann said.

Taubert said consumers need go into the sales situation knowing what the want, instead of letting the salesperson make the decision.

"If someone lies to you, they lie to you, and you can't control that," Taubert said.

Senate pushes back important items to talk about taxes

By Mary Dalrymple
Associated Press

WASHINGTON—Republicans and Democrats staged an election-year joust in the Senate on Tuesday over the Bush administration's tax cuts for capital gains and dividends.

The parties lined up a series of votes that caused most other morning business in the Senate to be postponed or canceled, including hearings featuring Cabinet members Condoleezza Rice, Michael Chertoff and John Snow.

The battle began when Democrats decided to use a routine procedure that sends the bill into final negotiations to make political points about President Bush's insistence on continuing tax cuts for investors.

Republicans matched each Democratic motion, but by lunchtime the party leaders had agreed to set aside some motions.

Both parties fashioned their motions to put the opposition in a political squeeze. But they could only suggest, not force, changes to the pending bill, a $70 billion package aimed at reducing taxes over five years, mostly by extending tax breaks that are scheduled to expire.

The votes ended, and the Senate sent the tax cuts into final negotiations. None of those votes bound negotiators named to hammer out the final version of the bill. Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, said he hoped the House and Senate could iron out their differences by mid-March.

The House version of the bill features a two-year extension of the reduced tax rates for capital gains and dividends, which are now scheduled to disappear at the end of 2008.

The Senate version omits that extension, even though Senate GOP leaders want the final bill to preserve tax cuts for investors. The key element in the Senate bill prevents millions of taxpayers this year from owing the alternative minimum tax, a trap for wealthy tax dodgers that increasingly hits the middle class.

In the first pair of motions, the Republican-controlled Senate voted 53-47 to include both matters in the final bill.

"Some of my colleagues are creating a false choice when they suggest that in order to provide AMT relief we need to remove incentives that encourage economic growth," Grassley said.

The committee's top Democrat, Sen. Max Baucus of Montana, said senators can't have both.

"This motion says you can have it all," Baucus said. "This motion says there's no deficit problem. This motion says, don't worry, be happy."

The Senate then voted 53-47 to reject a Democratic effort to exclude capital gains and dividends from the final bill.

Senators voted to preserve tax deductions for state and local sales taxes, but they rejected Democratic efforts to prevent the final bill from increasing the nation's legal debt limit. Democrats also lost a bid to drop extensions of investors' tax cuts in favor of military spending.

Senators by voice vote endorsed an effort to keep the child tax credit at $1,000.

Victim in Mass. gay bar shooting files discrimination complaint

By Mark Jewell
Associated Press

BOSTON — A victim of a teenager's violent rampage in a New Bedford gay bar has filed a complaint with the state alleging he was treated poorly and abusively by paramedics — treatment he believes he endured because he's gay.

Robert R. Perry, 52, of Dartmouth, was struck in the head with a hatchet and shot in the back when 18-year old Jacob D. Robida attacked patrons of Puzzles Lounge two weeks ago. Two other men were injured in an attack police labeled a hate crime.

In a complaint filed with the Massachusetts Department of Public Health, Perry says the New Bedford paramedics took too long transporting him to the hospital, were physically and verbally abusive, and shared private information about his injuries with certain family members without his permission.

Perry, who is the clinical services director at Mercy General Ambulance Service in Boston, said in a separate complaint letter to New Bedford's mayor that he could not recall "any action by an EMT so cruel and hate-filled" in his 29 years in emergency medical services.

In an interview with The Associated Press on Tuesday, Perry said the circumstances of the treatment he says he received "make it pretty easy for me to jump to the conclusion that it was hatred.

"It's really hard to say it was definitely homophobia, because they never used any names," said Perry, whose complaint was first reported Tuesday by The Standard-Times of New Bedford.

Steve Arruda, acting deputy director of New Bedford's emergency medical services, said on Tuesday his office would not comment because an investigation of Perry's complaint was ongoing.

In response to Perry's letter to him, Mayor Scott Lang wrote Perry that the city would take his complaint "very seriously." He said he sent a copy of Perry's letter to the acting police chief in New Bedford, about 60 miles south of Boston.

Donna Rheaume, a state Department of Public Health spokeswoman, acknowledged the agency's Office of Emergency Medical Services had received a complaint. She declined further comment.

Perry said the initial treatment he received inside the bar was done "by the textbook." But he said the care he got in an ambulance outside was poor, with little attention paid to what were life-threatening injuries.

He said knows from professional experience that the 25 minutes he says the ambulance waited outside the bar before heading to St. Luke's Hospital in New Bedford was too long.

"Twelve minutes on-scene for a gunshot victim in our system is considered a maximum" under most circumstances, Perry wrote in the letter to the mayor.

He said he was repeatedly told to "shut up" and was sworn at when he asked why he hadn't been taken to the hospital.

Perry also alleges the paramedic treating him slammed an oxygen mask over his face when he repeated the question.

"I think you could say it approaches criminal behavior," his complaint letter to the state says.

Perry said he was recovering well from his wounds.

Bill would wipe out junk food in Bay State schools

By Steve LeBlanc
Associated Press

BOSTON — Students reaching for their favorite sugary drink or fatty snack could soon find them replaced with healthier, low-calorie treats.

That's the goal of a bill set to be debated Wednesday by the state Senate. Supporters say it addresses growing concerns about childhood obesity by targeting a key source: the school vending machine.

The bill requires elementary schools to sell only drinking water, 100 percent fruit juices and low- or nonfat milk during school hours. Those standards would be loosened in middle schools, which would also be allowed to sell sports drinks and low-calorie juice drinks.

High schools could sell sweetened and non-sweetened carbonated drinks under the bill, as long as at least half the beverages sold are non-carbonated.

The bill takes a similar, stepped-up approach with snack foods — banning the sale of foods with more than 190 calories per portion in elementary school vending machines, and more than 250 calories in high schools.

"We feel we have a compromise bill that will certainly not make the industry happy, that starts putting restrictions on calorie intake, on hours of availability and the line of product that are put into these machines," Senate President Robert Travaglini, D-Boston.

Sen. Richard Moore, D-Uxbridge, chairman of the Senate's Health Care Committee, said the bill strikes a balance not found in earlier proposals that would have banned the sale of all sweetened, carbonated beverages during school hours.

He said those more restrictive bans could have backfired because they focused on barring sugary drinks and high calorie snacks that students could still purchase at neighborhood stores, rather than focusing on educating students about making healthier decisions.

"The vending machines will still be there, we want to make sure some of the products going into them are healthier," Moore said. "We think we need to move in a phased approach and not come down with a hammer right away."

The restrictions would only apply during school hours and not to after-school or sporting events.

Past bills have come under fire from some school districts that rely in part on the revenues from vending machines. In Brockton, for example, vending machines can bring in up to $60,000 a year.

Concerns about childhood obesity have grown in recent years. Obesity rates have tripled over the past 40 years for kids and adolescents ages 6 through 19, raising their risk of risks of type 2 diabetes and a range of other diseases.

Glenn Koocher, executive director of the Massachusetts Association of School Committees, said a too-restrictive ban sends the wrong message. He said the focus should be on education about healthy eating, not mandates.

"This is about health," said Koocher, who said schools shouldn't be placed in the situation of "denying to high school kids ... what they can legally buy across the street."

A more restrictive bill is currently before the House Ways and Means Committee.

IRS claims billions in lost taxes; sites citizen 'noncompliance rate'

"That is a very, very significant noncompliance rate," IRS Commissioner Mark Everson told reporters. "We do not have specific conclusions as to how much of this is willful or confusion."

The measure of the tax gap, the difference between taxes owed and taxes paid, refines a figure released last year that estimated taxpayers failed to pay between $312 billion and $353 billion in 2001.

The determination that taxpayers did not pay $345 billion taxes means more than 16 percent of the money owed that year went uncollected. The IRS said it can recoup about $55 billion through late payments and collection activities, leaving a net tax gap of $290 billion.

The IRS measured the tax gap after auditing 46,000 people and combining those findings with previous estimates of unpaid corporate, payroll and unemployment taxes.

"It could very well be higher, in that we have not updated the corporate tax piece," Everson said.

In the current phase of the research project, the IRS intends to audit 5,000 randomly selected S-corporations, enterprises that do not pay corporate income tax but instead pass income and taxes through the business to individual shareholders. The audits include those shareholders.

The study of individuals showed taxpayers much more likely to report income when an employer, bank or other institution separately submitted the information to the IRS. Individuals reported 99 percent of their wage, salary and tip income, for example.

But taxpayers omitted 64 percent of money categorized as other income, which includes things like prizes, awards and gambling winnings.

About $27 billion in unpaid taxes were attributed to roughly 10 million people who failed to file a tax return.

The IRS said the information will help it better focus its audits, and that tax collectors can be expected to pay more attention to areas that account for significant source of income and a high rate of underreporting.

Everson said the complexity of tax laws means people have a difficult time determining what they owe, and simplifying tax laws would help reduce the amount of unpaid taxes.

A presidentially appointed panel recommended ideas for simplifying the nation's tax laws last fall. The Treasury Department plans to analyze the recommendations and report their findings to President Bush. Secretary John Snow has not set a timetable for advancing a tax overhaul.

Bush also laid out ideas for reducing the tax gap in the 2007 budget recently submitted to Congress.

Everson highlighted two ideas. One would require more reporting to the IRS of business payments made through credit cards and debit cards. Another would require more reporting and tax withholding of some government payments to vendors.

Everson appears Wednesday before the Senate Budget Committee to discuss the tax gap.

Whittington suffered wound near heart, had irregular beat be confused for hunters' safety gear.

"The orange that they're wearing is not because they're concerned that the vice president may be there," press secretary Scott McClellan said. "That's why I'm wearing it."

Hospital officials said they knew that Whittington had some birdshot near his heart and that there was a chance it could move closer since scar tissue had not had time to harden and hold the pellet in place.

After Whittington developed an irregular heartbeat, doctors performed a cardiac catheterization, in which a thin, flexible tube is inserted into the heart, to diagnose his condition, said Peter Banko, the administrator at the hospital.

The shot was either touching or embedded in the heart muscle near the top chambers, called the atria, officials said. Two things resulted:

It caused inflammation that pushed on the heart in a way to temporarily block blood flow, what the doctors called a "silent heart attack." This is not a traditional heart attack where an artery is blocked. They said Whittington's arteries, in fact, were healthy.

It irritated the atria, caused an irregular heartbeat known as atrial fibrillation, which is not immediately life-threatening. But it must be treated because it can spur blood clots to form. Most cases can be corrected with medication.

White House physicians helped advise on the course of treatment, hospital officials said.

Texas officials said the shooting was an accident and no charges were brought against the vice president.

A Texas Parks and Wildlife Department report issued Monday said Whittington was retrieving a downed bird and stepped out of the hunting line he was sharing with Cheney. "Another covey was flushed and Cheney swung on a bird and fired, striking Whittington in the face, neck and chest at approximately 30 yards," the report said.

Many read blogs over papers, despite political, war views

By LEIGH SHELTON
THE DAILY REVEILLE (LSU)

BATON ROUGE, La. — About the only thing activists for and against the war in Iraq could agree on Monday is that they don't trust mainstream media.

The Iraq war debate between anti-war protester Cindy Sheehan and U.S. Marine Lt. Col. David Couvillon drew, among others, a small group of war-supporting mothers and anti-war organizers with seemingly nothing in common except that they said they look to alternative forms of media, particularly Internet blogs, to get their news.

The sentiments reflect what blog researchers already know. Recent Internet research shows blog readership jumped 58 percent in 2004, and blog readers find personal publishers, or "bloggers," to be much more credible than traditional journalists.

"I rely on blogs more and more," said Martha LeBlanc, whose 20-year-old son is on active duty in Baghdad, Iraq.

LeBlanc, Julie Robinson and Lynette Bell, all Baton Rouge residents who said they came to the debate to show their support for the troops and disapproval of Sheehan's opinions, said they look beyond traditional media for information about the war in Iraq. They also said they think their message is marred by left-leaning media that don't pay attention to the mothers and sons who disagree with Sheehan.

Sheehan, whose 24-year-old son Casey was killed in Iraq nearly two years ago, gained notoriety in 2005 when she camped outside President George W. Bush's ranch in Crawford, Texas, to protest the war. Sheehan used her blog extensively at the time to disseminate information about her protest.

LeBlanc, Robinson and Bell said they read "Iraq the Model," a pro-war blog written by two Iraqi brothers that chronicles progress in Iraq since the war began. Couvillon, a Marine reservist who served as an interim governor in Wassit Province, Iraq, and now debates the war's merits, mentioned the blog in his closing statements Monday and encouraged attendants to read it.

The Spirit of America, a non-profit group that raises money for American troops in war zones, set up "Iraq the Model." They are also trying to spread Arabic-language blogs and encourage Iraqi students to publish online.

Local peace activists Hassan Ghosn and Liesse Hand expressed a similar distaste for traditional media.

Ghosn and Hand, members of Bienville House Center for Peace and Justice, complained about mainstream media, particularly television outlets, saying they don't showcase enough opposition to the war.

Ghosn, a former University professor, and Hand said they rely on blogs and other outside sources for news. Ghosn said he often reads the popular, politically left-leaning blog www.DailyKos.com, left-leaning British and French newspapers and Arabic language news network Aljazeera on the Internet.

"You need to look outside the box," Hand said. "The blogs are breaking the news, not the [traditional] news."

War supporters and peace activists agreed that with a little practice, it is easy to sift through what's credible and what's not on the Web.

Thomas Johnson, journalism professor at Southern Illinois University in Carbondale, recently published research that found readers trust bloggers much more than traditional journalists.

"They just don't trust what they get from the American media, and they see blogs as a viable alternative" Johnson said. "Particularly those who are left-of-center or right-of-center – the more extremes of views – they don't perceive the media as the truth."

Johnson said political blog creators and readers tend to be "political junkies" with strong points of view. Readers usually look to blogs with similar philosophies to their own, he said.

Kaye Trammell, University mass communication professor and blog researcher, said she thinks readers may trust bloggers more than mainstream media because in most cases readers are aware of bloggers' political ideologies from the start. She said some readers may perceive traditional journalists as having agendas but have no way of knowing it.

Johnson said since the war began, military professionals increasingly published blogs to provide first-hand accounts of the war. Milblogging.com organizes and ranks top military-related blogs from moms and wives to captains and front-line soldiers.

"Antiwar Mom" Cindy Sheehan waves to the media after being escorted by the Secret Service last summer.

Smartening up for the day after

Sanam Hakim

This one goes out to the "single" crowd here at UMass Amherst. We are those shady people staring at you against the walls at parties, the people who are still playin' the field, looking for something we haven't found yet, not looking for anything at all, or just trying to mend a broken heart. We are the faces that show up on Facebook when you click on single, the ones who are "in a relationship" with our best friends just to be funny, or the ones without a status at all because, let's face it, who the hell cares? We are the people who pretended to hate Valentine's Day when, deep down, we knew it was mostly because we didn't have anyone to celebrate it with and that we're just bitter. But, today is not Valentine's Day anymore. Today is even better: it's the day after Valentine's Day.

First of all, what is Valentine's Day anyway? Basically, a chubby kid in a diaper flies above you and stabs you with an imaginary arrow, which somehow compels you to buy overpriced heart-covered merchandise for someone you love. If I put on a diaper, pranced around you, and stabbed you with an imaginary arrow on the 23rd, you would call the police and run like hell. Valentine's Day participants are the fools; the ones who are convinced that they have to spend a lot of money on February 14th in the name of love, when in reality, it's in the name of industrialization.

Nationwide, stores basically decided that they weren't making enough money between Christmas, St. Patrick's Day, and the 4th of July, so they decided to glorify a few random days: a day to love your mother, a day to love your father, and a day to love your lover.

Nationwide, stores basically decided that they weren't making enough money between Christmas, St. Patrick's Day, and the Fourth of July, so they decided to glorify a few random days: a day to love your mother, a day to love your father, and a day to love your lover. So they took a pile of random stuff, made it red, covered it in hearts, added some fur, and sold it for five times the normal price to unsuspecting American citizens, who would otherwise be considered mean and selfish if they didn't buy something for their lover.

However, every holiday has at least some historical roots. Here's a brief history: Valentine's Day is believed to have first originated in Fifth Century Rome. The Romans basically used to celebrate young men on this day. They wrote down the names of all the teenage girls in the town, and each man would pick one of the names out of the box, and that would be his sex partner for the rest of the year. During the time, the Emperor had banned marriages in hopes that more men would join his Army. On the side, however, St. Valentine, a bishop from Rome, secretly performed marriages and was martyred on February 14th, after the Emperor found out.

Let's face it, though. At the end of the day, Valentine's Day is basically a consumer driven holiday.

This leads me directly into my next point, where I would like to use one of the most glorious words in the English language: Clearance! When I come to your room and you hold up your cute little stuffed monkey wearing heart boxers that your boyfriend bought you for forty dollars last week, in the back of my head, I will remember that I saw that same monkey in CVS for $5.99, with dancing capabilities. When you come to my room and offer me some candy that your girlfriend bought you for 10 dollars, I will kindly decline, because I bought five for a dollar this morning, merely because of the red packaging. First off, the Day-after-Valentine's-Day clearance is an excellent day to stock up on gifts for other holidays. Think about it – what mother wouldn't love something with hearts on it from her baby on Mother's Day?

Secondly, after filtering out all the weird kissy faces, eventually you'll find a lot of red merchandise. Personally, I need a new mixing bowl because mine is broken. I saw one at CVS that was ten dollars three days ago, but will be 89 cents today. Plus, at the end of the day, who doesn't like the color red?

Thirdly, this is a great opportunity to show your friends you care. Head to the clearance rack, buy a bunch of gifts, give them to your friends and say, "I was just thinking about you on Valentine's Day. I just didn't get a chance to give this to you yesterday." This way, you've already got your Mother's Day gift, you can replace broken items in your room with nice, new red ones, and you will throw the gift-giving ball into your friends' courts. Now it's their turn to buy you something.

Lastly, how many people do you know that complain about their Valentine's Day gifts anyway? Single people have to be prepared with lines like, "Oh my God! I can't believe he only got you a card! You totally deserved, like, so much more!" or "I can't believe she didn't put out, man. That sucks. At least you got candy."

By not celebrating Valentine's Day, you were at an advantage. You have more money in your pocket to spend on whatever you want to spend it on. Go buy yourself something practical, then eat dinner at your favorite restaurant with your friends. If you go for a walk on a beautiful, sunny day, the rain will ruin everything, but if you go for a walk on a horrid rainy day, nothing could go wrong. Think about it. It's brilliant.

So to all you single people with "0 missed calls" on your cell phone and an empty inbox; the people who actually caught up on their reading and homework yesterday, today is your day. I'll see you in the clearance racks. And to all you people in relationships, don't listen to me: at the end of the day, I'm probably just another cynical single girl.

The freedom of expression

Bonnie Solomon

Art is all about expression. Any form of art, whether it is painting, photography, theater, or journalism. The First Amendment to the Constitution declares that we, as writers, have the right to freedom of expression. This freedom is so essential to the furthering of our society and of our knowledge. However, how far does the government, or even our society, go to censor this freedom? Why is the media changing so drastically?

As a writer, I feel that I should be able to say whatever I want to, as long as I don't target a certain group or hurt anybody. I am granted this freedom to speak my mind. Our society today limits our freedom of expression more than we realize. In my high school art class one day, for example, I realized that painting a nude figure was embarrassing to me. As beautiful as the human body is, and as artistic as it is, I felt uncomfortable around all the high schoolers whom I knew would be immature about it.

From this fact, I realized that students in the present day do not understand how important it is to read and to be immersed in art. As my professor, Janice Hanson said, "Reading, including newspapers, is a habit; people are not likely to start reading news unless they acquire the habit early." I think that this rings very true for all of us. I was brought up to be an avid reader, and this is a habit that I cherish, and I believe that it is not being taught enough to accumulate a love for books and for art.

When I write articles for this newspaper, I may not be censored at all, but I am being chided and rebuked for what I write. This is my form of expression, and I have a right to articulate my opinions and ideas. If anyone ever writes something that you do not agree with, rather than chastising him or her, explain to them in a valid way why you do not agree. This is your right as a human being.

Journalists who write for bigger newspapers are also being censored and criticized, not only by society, but also by the government. Just a couple days ago, on Sunday, an article came out that Vice President Dick Cheney shot, and wounded his friend by making a mistake on a hunting trip. The government held back this news by not letting the press write about the shooting until a day after it had happened, when it had all blown over.

Just a couple days ago, on Sunday, an article came out that Vice President Dick Cheney shot, and wounded his friend by making a mistake on a hunting trip. The government held back this news by not letting the press write about the shooting until a day after it happened, when it had all blown over.

Another example is when Brokeback Mountain first showed in theaters. One theater in Utah, the Jordan Commons Megaplex, decided not to show this movie because the owner felt that it was inappropriate. It is bizarre that the movie was censored from a societal standpoint when it was so critically acclaimed.

This society decides what we want to read, see, and hear. Artists produce what sells. In my Communications class the other day, we learned about how much the 18-34 demographic has an effect on readership. Newspaper readership has dropped 27 percent since our parents' generation. Now, people are more likely to turn to television, magazines, or any other easily accessible source.

Now, newspapers and other forms of media are realizing that our society is constantly changing. They realize that what people are interested in reading about is different. Thus, newspapers are filled with advertisements and sections like arts, advice, health, etc., rather than actual news. Only about 70 years ago, newspapers only contained news. Also, what is chosen to be published is different. Articles that are front-page news stories are usually more appealing to society than articles that are more important, but seem "boring."

Our generation will not be able to know more about life if we do not continue to read, continue to share our opinions, and view media critically. This is all I want to stress to you here, is to always read, always learn, and always be immersed in culture and art. Know that you have a right to your opinion and that there is no reason for you to be afraid to share it. Just never use it to hurt anyone, ever.

Cigarette smokers: endangered

Chris Reardon

Surgeon's (Not-So) General Warning: Quitting smoking, while beneficial to your physical health, may cause extreme irritability, sleeplessness, and the ability to smell things that you would have preferred not to.

Smoke up while you can, people, because the "golden days" of Big Tobacco are gone, and before you know it, lighting up on your cigarette break will be as taboo as mentioning Abu Ghraib in the Oval Office. Americans once considered themselves lucky to win a carton of smokes on "I've Got a Secret," but now we consider ourselves lucky to avoid a "Truth" ad during Adult Swim. Whether they're aware of it or not, the human species is steadily fazing smokers out of the equation.

Let's look at evolution. Until we experience another massive global environmental change (an ice age, for instance), it can be assumed that for now, human physical evolution is at its peak. Mental evolution, though, doesn't appear to be slowing down anytime soon. As a result, technology is advancing at a rapid pace, and humans are learning things about the universe and about their own bodies that scientists 100 years ago would have scoffed at. At the same time, the earth's population is steadily increasing, with villages and towns increasingly making way for cities and megalopolises, such as the entire northern half of the east coast.

Fields are being paved for streets, and buildings are becoming taller and closer together. That alone spells doom for the lowly cigarette smoker. I'm sure you've noticed the imposing signs throughout campus that read "No Smoking within 20 Feet of the Building." It started slowly, but before you knew it every building in Southwest maintained this policy, and soon you can be sure that every building on campus will follow suit.

Add that to the fact that thirty states (including Massachusetts) have enacted legislation restricting smoking in public buildings, and it can only be a matter of time before the Patriot Act renewal includes a "no smoking inside ANY building, period" rider.

So we can't smoke indoors, and we can't smoke within twenty feet of any building; what happens when you walk twenty feet away from your office and bump into a Macdonald's, three Starbuck's, and a Wal-Mart? Where do you go to smoke then? Are humans doomed to taking a lovely Sunday drive to the country just so they can puff a Marb' Red?

I'm sure you've noticed the imposing signs throughout campus that read "No Smoking within 20 Feet of the Building." It started slowly, but before you knew it every building in Southwest maintained this policy, and soon you can be sure that every building on campus will follow suit.

Well, without sugar coating it, yes they are; and eventually even that solution will be implausible. The fact that I can remember ashtrays being offered in fast-food restaurants is a testament to the speed with which smoking is being eradicated in the state. I wouldn't be surprised if in a handful of lifetimes smoking was unilaterally banned throughout the planet. Humans in the twenty-third century will learn about the curious tradition of inhaling tar and nicotine into our lungs and risking fifty different kinds of cancer with every drag, thinking to themselves how stupid and self-destructive people in our time were. Well I, for one, laugh at the (alleged) ignorance of my great-great-great-great-great-grandchildren, for they will never know the sweet, calming truth: through numbed tongues, hacking coughs, and smelly fingers, every single puff I've ever taken in my life was absolutely worth it.

I'm a rare breed; a true casual smoker. I tried that whole addiction nonsense, but it was too expensive and once in a great while I like to be able to smell my food before I eat it. Now I try to reserve smoking for times when: a) I really want a cigarette, or b) I really need a cigarette. Therefore, each and every cigarette I smoke is a little slice of Heaven, and the idea of that being taken away from me concerns me more than some tuition hike ever could.

Of course, as I said, my theory that smoking will one day be completely abolished from society will take a few lifetimes to come to pass. And, although this change in human behavior may affect my children's children...well, I'll be dead by then so I won't give two craps. But let us, in the meantime, reflect on all the experiences that past smokers took for granted, but are no longer available to present-day smokers.

It's a little sad, isn't it? Wouldn't you love to sit in your favorite bar, with your favorite drink, and your favorite brand of cigarette hanging sexily from your lips? How many of us wish we could have had such a bonding experience with our fathers as sitting on the dock by a lake at the age of fourteen, fishing rod in hand, smoking a cigarette?

Well, maybe I'm the only one. But it's okay, because I'm a smoker, and proud of it.

The many faces of passion

Andrew Freeman

This Valentine's Day, American males were expected to spend an average 135.67 dollars, twice as much as women (According to National Jeweler). When I hear this, I contemplate passion. Passion is usually construed in the romantic sense, but it takes many other forms throughout our society.

There is the expectation that you should be passionate about your work and your employer. The successful exude confidence and 'joie de vivre.' Those who do not are often stigmatized as morose or depressive. In an economy increasingly built around customer service, being carefree and lively is absolutely essential to staying competitive.

A related feature of our economy is its focus on marketing, which is ultimately about instilling passion for a product, as well as for materialism in general. Marketers want us to believe the siren song that material goods will make us happy, fulfilled individuals. This passion for products is expressed more often as obsession than as love. Thus we get the yearly Christmas shopping craze that sees people trampling one another to get the latest toy, as well as the vast sums spent on trivial holidays like Valentine's Day.

If passion at its violent extremem is destructive, so is its opposite, apathy. Not caring about anything is also harmful, as an apathetic society will not lift a hand to stop its own decay. The two emotions are interrelated, with the violent passions of some driving others to withdraw their interest in a subject.

Another form that passion takes is anger. We see it in the self-righteous rhetoric that inflames much of our political and social discourse, through talk radio, television, or the internet. When people take action, it is usually under the banner of powerful emotions, mostly rage or fear. Few speak out, except to denigrate. When I write about a sensitive issue, the limited feedback I receive is almost entirely negative. An atmosphere of anger pervades the interactions of our culture, turning partisan disagreement into partisan warfare.

Sustained rage is extremely dangerous to society. A wave of homicides has hit American cities in the last year, and the chief factor in most of the murders was not drugs or gangs, but anger, according to a Feb. 12 New York Times' article. In Houston, where there was a 24 percent increase in murders last year, 113 out of 336 deaths stemmed from disputes. In Philadelphia, 208 of the 380 killings were the result of arguments.

People are being murdered for supposed or real disrespect, for dirty looks, for harsh words. An example of this new violence occurred on Aug. 2 of last year in Brockton, where 60-year-old Walter Bishop shot and killed 27-year-old Sandro Andrade after a traffic dispute. Bishop shot Andrade four times in the head, while the victim was clutching his 9-month-old daughter. Bishop feared that Andrade planned to take revenge on him for their roadside altercation, and chose to act preemptively.

Such destructive passion eats away at a society, stripping it bare of compassion and decency. The Middle East and Muslim world is awash in such rage, as governments and demagogues channel popular anger at Israeli and American scapegoats. And we Americans, led by our own hatemongers, are in danger of following down the same road, if we refuse to acknowledge the humanity of those that oppose us.

If passion at its violent extreme is destructive, so is its opposite, apathy. Not caring about anything is also harmful, as an apathetic society will not lift a hand to stop its own decay. The two emotions are interrelated, with the violent passions of some driving others to withdraw their interest in a subject. This is a complaint that many make about the current political climate of the country, as partisan warfare turns off all except the partisans. Another connection is that some may be passionate about their own material pursuits, but apathetic towards the concerns of others. Either of these emotions can ensnare one.

My trap is apathy. It's hard for me to be passionate. I have never worked a job that I felt totally and deeply committed to. I expect that products will never live up to their hype. Passion can be a great and beautiful emotion, but it can also lead to terrible extremes. Still, at times, I wish I were more passionate, that I could look on my life or the world with rose-colored glasses, and be more motivated to improve both. In the end, we must confront passion and apathy, both as a society and as individuals, if anything great is to be achieved.

Pop that Collar UMass

Nick Belanger

In a recent column Collegian editor Dan O'Brien expressed outrage over the recently announced tuition increase. In order to fully understand the issue from a policy standpoint, I suggest checking out O'Brien's article. Indeed I share O'Brien's outrage towards the situation; therefore I only wish to draw more attention to the issue at hand. The purpose of this column is not to re-state what has already been said, but to approach the issue in a more satirical manner.

Year after year the University becomes more expensive, and the standards for admission become increasingly tougher. In short, UMass Amherst is becoming more and more elite. As this occurs, incoming classes have been increasingly preppier. If I may, the level of preppiness is directly proportional to the cost of attending the University.

The class of 2010 is poised to be the wealthiest, smartest, and probably the most polished class of undergrads to ever be admitted to UMass; hence they will be the lamest class in state school history. The year 2010 will undoubtedly bring more popped collars per lecture hall than ever before. If the trends continue, the student body will flood campus with bright pastel polo shirts layered thicker than the DC lasagna. Everyone will be carrying video IPods and drinking Starbucks double shots while reading The Wall Street Journal and discussing the latest way to look like a complete douchebag. The future is bleak, ladies and gentlemen, very bleak.

Over the past five years the tuition here has increased 100 percent, and before it doubles again I would like to offer up a solution to the administration. Rather than privatize the university, commercialize the university. Hey, if UMass needs money why not sell-out to corporate America?

Our administration has set into motion the privatization of the university. UMass has already isolated itself by becoming the most expensive state school in Massachusetts, and among the most expensive of flagship state universities nationwide. The reputation of UMass as a party school, and more recently the most violent large university in the country has sparked the chancellor's office to do a sizeable amount of damage control to alter the image of the university. The tuition raise and future tuition raises will change the social landscape of UMass, and without a doubt this means the death of "the zoo".

I won't question the university's need for more funding, I'll give our administration the benefit of the doubt for now, and I can only hope that the money is invested wisely. If UMass is going to be as expensive as a private school, then one should expect a private school quality education. Smaller classes, better advising, and higher quality living standards, but maybe if the tuition raises aren't enough to give us what we deserve, perhaps it's time UMass seeks alternate ways of generating revenue.

Over the past five years the tuition here has increased 100 percent, and before it doubles again I would like to offer up a solution to the administration. Rather than privatize the university, commercialize the University. Hey, if UMass needs money why not sellout to corporate America?

We could be the very first golden arch campus, the 'M' in UMass can become the golden arches, and I'm sure McDonalds would fork over several million for that kind of advertising. On top of that they can buy out dining services and throw up fast food joints all over campus. After all, who wouldn't want to hit up the dollar menu in Herter and have the Hamburgler himself dish out a double cheeseburger before lecture? Better yet, I'm willing to bet our athletic department can raise some serious money by changing our colors to yellow and blue, and decking Sam out in a red curly wig and a striped costume.

Maybe our administration can get Wal-Mart to furnish the new dormitories in exchange for the naming rights. Who wouldn't want to live in a dorm with a giant happy face painted on the side of the building?

Maybe Microsoft would want to get in on the action by sponsoring a new lab or two in the library, errr, I mean maybe Microsoft would like to go ahead and just slap their name on the entire library. I'm sure students wouldn't mind studying in the Bill Gates Memorial Library.

Maybe Gargano can get Budweiser to invest in a 'drink responsibly' campaign. I'm sure Anheiser Busch would be thrilled to host the alcohol education classes on campus. Because when I think of drinking responsibly I sure as hell think of Budweiser.

The possibilities are endless; I'm sure corporations would love to slap their names all over UMass. But somehow I doubt that millions of dollars in corporate sponsorship would put an end to the ridiculous tuition hikes. The social landscape is changing and the type of student that is welcome here at UMass is also quite different. So pop that collar UMass, because we're closer than ever to becoming a 'private' state school.

All bunched up at Boyden

Jonathan Brandt

"I don't know if you heard me counting, I did over a thousand." "Watch out for the guns, they'll getcha." These are the words commonly spoken by newcomers to the gyms around campus.

Sadly, two weeks later they stop going, and the guns fade away. For the first two weeks of every semester, the gyms on campus are filled with students who have new resolutions to lose some weight, or get bigger and stronger.

Unfortunately for most of those students, after about a week or so they realize that it takes time and commitment, and by the second week the stragglers have mostly been weeded out. This "semester resolution" is like a New Year's resolution, which many people also give up after a short time. However, Boyden Gym will not be getting any roomier this semester and will continue to be overcrowded for the duration.

I go to the gym four or five times a week, and as any other regulars would agree, there is nothing worse than going to the gym when it is crowded. It's hot, stinky, and everything you need to use is taken. Worse yet is when a newcomer who doesn't know what they're doing will take something you need and practically kill themselves with it. After the typical two week period of overcrowding at the gym, a regular could expect to go at times when it wouldn't be so busy, such as earlier in the afternoon or later at night. Unfortunately, the UMass Crew Team, which used to workout in Totman Gym, has now moved to Boyden Gym. Now, whenever you go to the gym it will be overcrowded, and the only times you could actually go without having your space invaded is around noon or late at night. For those of us who are not athletes and simply want to be able to go to the gym and workout, this is extremely aggravating.

The athletes that compete for this school have a state of the art gym that they can use at Boyden, which happens to be above the regular students' gym. It is a huge gym with tons of equipment, and sadly, it is hardly used. For whatever reason, the Crew team has taken over the smaller gym downstairs and now students will have to compete with 40 athletes who should not even be there in the first place. The gym itself is small. Most of the equipment there is old, and there is only one or two of everything. Last year a survey was sent out around campus to find out what students would like at their fitness centers. In response, the administration has agreed to start construction on a new gymnasium across from the Mullins Center. However, there is still the issue of what to do now at Boyden Gym.

I go to the gym four or five times a week, and as any other regulars would agree, there is nothing worse than going to the gym when it is crowded. It's hot, stinky, and everything you need to use is taken.

The small weight room in the basement of the gym has no windows, no air, and no ventilation. Every time a student goes down there they are subjected to the heat and general discomfort of being surrounded by sweaty people. The staff tries to help by putting enormous fans in the corner, but that only helps the two people who stand in front of them the whole time, and block the air from coming out any further. I'm not saying the gym itself is terrible. It happens to be the best free gym on campus.

For anyone who's ever ventured to Totman Gym, you know that Boyden is comparably much better. It is not fair, however, for students whose tuition goes towards fees for the use of the gym, to have to be stuffed into these overcrowded weight rooms. The athletes have their own workout facilities so that they can exercise as a team if they want and they won't be hassled by other students. There is a reason why we separate those who play for the school and those who simply play for the love of the game. Having separate gyms is also part of that reason.

The coach of the Crew team needs to find someplace else for his players to workout. Plain and simple. I'm not going to ignore the fact that sports like Crew do not get a ton of funding, and I understand that if they can no longer workout at Totman they need to go somewhere else. This is still not a reason to workout in a regular student gym. If they want to workout as a team then they should have the athletic director keep the athlete gym open later or just reschedule their sessions.

Can you fee what's going on?

Marisha Leiglum

Today, the UMass Board of Trustees will issue a final vote on whether or not to freeze our fees for the next academic year. Regardless of increasingly vocal concerns about the declining accessibility of the UMass system, the verdict looks dire and the votes seem set.

Yet despite our Chancellor and the Trustees' willingness to jack up costs yet again, they relentlessly struggle to come out on the moral high ground: whether they are (erroneously) claiming that their proposed increase falls short of the rate of inflation, or whether they are (baselessly) claiming that a fee freeze would wreak havoc on the University's programs, they are doing all they can to keep the debate on their terms.

Yet when it comes down to it, their arguments and morals are as empty as our pocketbooks will be next fall.

Take, for example, the claim that the proposed fee hike falls 0.2 percent short of the 3.6 percent rate of inflation (woo-freaking-hu, eh?). In fact, when taking into account the additional 300 dollar increase in housing charges (which does not include the costs of the new luxury apartments), this represents an overall increase of five percent (or 617 dollars) in the total cost of attendance for in-state students at UMass Amherst.

So the question becomes: if the University's public and private revenues are increasing in addition to our fees, where the hell is the money going?

Yet even this clarification misses the point. Arguing that increases in student costs are dandy so long as they are pegged to the rate of inflation presumes that the current costs of UMass are acceptable – and they're not. It is time to increase the affordability and accessibility of UMass, not to perpetuate the fee structure as it is.

And as for the claim that a fee freeze would result in sweeping programmatic cuts? Hogwash.

If approved, the 3.4 percent increase in student fees will provide a total increase of 19 million dollars for all the UMass campuses, yet the legislature has already earmarked an increase of 26.2 million dollars for the UMass system, and a new higher education bill proposes to provide an additional $400 million for public higher education over the next seven years. While no doubt we could always use more funding for capital improvements and faculty at UMass, the Trustees could vote to freeze our fees and still get away with an increase of seven million dollars from fiscal year 2006.

This is not to mention that since 2000, the University has significantly upped its revenue by doubling student fees and placing increased emphasis on private contributions. And thanks to the current movement in the legislature to re-invest in public higher education, it looks like public funding for UMass may return to its 2000 level in the near future.

So the question becomes: if the University's public and private revenues are increasing in addition to our fees, where the hell is the money going? If we have been continually told that our fees have been engorged in order to cover the cost of public funding cutbacks, shouldn't our out-of-pocket costs be assuaged as state appropriations for UMass to move toward the upswing?

This raises the equally mythical claim that the Trustees and our Chancellor are "doing all they can" to increase public funding for the University.

In the Trustees' subcommittee meeting last Wednesday, the chair of the Board of Trustees, James Karam, claimed that the Trustees want to "work with students" to lobby the legislature for more state funding for UMass.

Yet when students met with Karam later in the week to discuss the possibility of postponing the vote on student charges until a joint (student and trustee) attempt had been made to lobby the legislature this spring, Karam scoffed at the idea and the meeting flopped.

Frighteningly, it seems our Chancellor and the Board of Trustees prefers student fee revenue to state funding. Indeed, what could explain the fact that the University asked for a smaller percentile increase in state appropriations for fiscal year 2007 than any of the other state and community colleges across Massachusetts?

While public funding comes with a variety of accountability measures (all bane to Johnny Lombardi's ears), student fees serve as the Chancellor's own slush fund: they can be spent at will and without any public control whatsoever. (Heck, perhaps the Chancellor is saving up for another 24,775 dollar paint job for his mansion on the hill a la the summer of 2005).

For all their talk about lobbying the legislature, Chancellor Lombardi and the Trustees are unwilling to deliver. Once again, it will be up to us as students and workers of UMass to secure more public funding for our campus in the future – and to ensure that such funding eases the cost of attending UMass while improving the quality of our school.

Clearly, it is time to rethink the terms of debate about the question of cost: public higher education should be a right, and we should be moving toward a system that is free and fully accessible to all, not fudging the numbers to match the magical rate of inflation.

Yet perhaps it is also time to rethink the composition of the Board of Trustees and the leadership of our campus. if increasing UMass's public funding and accessibility is not a priority for the Trustees and Johnny Lombardi, then perhaps its time we give them the boot.

On Classroom Etiquette

Kevin Dooley

One of the trends I have witnessed after completing my first semester here at UMass is the absolute lack of attention most of my fellow classmates have. That, and how at ten o'clock every Friday night everyone comes out of their dorms like a swarm of cockroaches, but that's a different story entirely.

We live in a fast-paced world where people are coming and going at near breakneck speed, but come on, would it really kill us to stay in our seats until the class is scheduled to be dismissed? I understand we are all busy, but trust me when I say it does not take more than fifteen minutes to get from one class to the next. You can't go to one class without hearing five minutes before the class is supposed to get out, the banging of the arm rests, the zipping of bags, and a chorus of chatter.

When trying to time when my classmates will make their dash for the door, I usually hear these words, which will seemingly light a fire under people's hairs. They are the following: "next class," "finally," "in summary," "before you go," and "one last thing." Once those words come out of the professors' mouth, the stampede and chaos soon follow.

When I walk into my nine o'clock class every morning, I almost always have to remind myself that I am not walking into a cemetery. Everyone is lifeless, dead. (I tried to take someone's pulse once but he growled at me).

When I walk into my nine o'clock class every morning, I almost always have to remind myself that I am not walking into a cemetery. Everyone is lifeless, dead. (I tried to take someone's pulse once but he growled at me).

The professor will begin their lecture for the day which is as useful as expecting an obese person to devour a plate of fruits and vegetables. Then at about five minutes before the class is supposed to be dismissed a scene from Frankenstein begins to develop; the walking dead begin to rustle in nervous distress in their chairs and begin to show signs of life and start to pack up.

The professor, sensing the classroom situation is turning from a morgue to a prison breakout, begins to raise his or her voice in a futile attempt to regain control. At this point however, telling everyone that he or she still has an allotted five or so minutes left to teach is like telling a pack of starved wolves to lay off fresh meat in a famine.

Now, one would think that when arriving early for a lecture, he or she would file into the seats by taking the seat in the middle of the row, that way, everyone else would not have to climb all over them, and the regular crowd, which always arrives late for lecture would not be disturbing the class. Well think again. Not only do the early arrivers not file to the end of the row, they will make sure they have the first seat or the one closest to the aisle. Could it be that they are devoid of all common sense? No, probably not. Instead, the reason why they plunk themselves in the seat closest to the aisle is so they can be the first to leave. I swear, I am not being included in some ongoing contest here.

What the professor says near the end of class is often the most important he or she will say, and summarizes that day's lecture. Heck, he or she could even be retelling about how she robbed a bank the day before and no one would hear it because everyone is getting ready to go. Or the professor may be in an exceptional good mood that day and could be telling the answers to an upcoming final exam. No one would have the slightest clue.

So what are we all in a rush for? Is it that our generation has more ADD or attention deficit disorders diagnoses than Michael Jackson has had plastic surgeries? Or is it that the professors here at Amherst are that boring? Or could it be that all the clocks here on campus are ten minutes behind and I have yet to be clued in on the conspiracy?

Well, I don't want to admit I'm insane so I'll rule out the clock conspiracy unless local Amherst time broke away from standard Eastern Time as a way of rebelling against authority. In reality though, we are a generation which is very hard to please and grabbing our attention for long periods of time without boring us to death is very unlikely to ever occur. Unless we are completely captivated by someone or something, it is very likely that we will want to get up and move on. They don't call us the microwave generation for nothing.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

RESPONSE TO "FIRM BELIEVER OF FREE PRESS"

I was upset by the preachy way that Asif Khan's article made me feel like an ignorant American because I can't fathom why people would want to kill each other over a cartoon. I had no idea of the "common knowledge that Muslims consider any images of Mohammed as blasphemous," but I have certainly found out over the last few weeks.

Interestingly, Khan omitted a few details in his article, namely that the newspaper that originally published the cartoons in September 2005 (yes, almost 6 months ago) issued a formal apology. Additionally, the news has been fanned by several governments in the Middle East demanding an apology from the Danish government. That's like asking President Bush to apologize for something offensive in the New York Times. That's just not going to happen.

But what I find most hypocritical about Khan's article was the way he glossed over what is happening in the Arab world of political cartoons. The NY Times reports an Iranian government-run newspaper has started a competition for cartoons mocking the Holocaust. Similarly, the Arab European League posted a cartoon of Anne Frank in bed with Adolf Hitler after having sex, with Hitler saying "Write this one in your diary, Anne."

There are a lot of things in this world that offend me, like Khan's article, but I didn't threaten to bomb The Daily Collegian for printing it. Instead I wrote a letter expressing my opinion. Democracy is based on the open expression of ideas, not the suppression of ideas by bombs and guns. Thankfully, this ignorant American lives in a democracy.

A VIEW ON WIRETAPPING

While I think Gruenenfelder made many valid points in his Feb. 8 article "President Should Not Wiretap", I also believe that he failed to address the most important issue concerning domestic surveillance.

After September 11th, the complexion of our nation changed; not only was the US attacked, but we were attacked by enemies set at destroying not only the lives of Americans, but also the American way of life. Under a cloak of anonymity these enemies used or rather abused our country's freedoms and liberties for the purpose of destroying them.

While domestic surveillance is not necessarily ideal, we must accept the reality of the times. It is lawful for the President of the United States to conduct surveillance with or without a warrant or judicial approval in order to obtain information on foreign threats to the US. Because our enemies may or may not have invaded our soil, or because an American has interjected himself into that threat does not and should not mean we have to halt our surveillance. Not only does the President's inherent Constitutional authority allow for this, but I would also argue that his job, as Commander in Chief of the United States of America, requires it.

AN EXPERIENCE FOR THE EARS

'Aztec' duo joke at Iron Horse

By Pete Cornett
Collegian Correspondent

"Listen, Rex, don't pull a 'size thing' on me," Neal Shulman dryly responded to Rex Fowler's narrative on the size of the anal thermometer he had dealt with during his recent illness.

"Always in good taste, that's our motto..."

Aztec Two-Step, a folk act based in Philadelphia, entertained the crowd quite well Saturday night at the Iron Horse Music Hall in Northampton. Experienced touring musicians that they are, they know that a good show is not merely music – it is a performance.

During their hour and a half set they joked about getting old, the way their bodies change with age, and Simon and Garfunkel. In fact, Simon and Garfunkel took quite a bit of heat from Aztec Two-Step. So did hip-hop, and the Grammys.

When Rex and Neal weren't busy dumping on various aspects of the music industry (and being hilarious while doing it), they played with the vigor of artists half their age. Energetic and soulful throughout the entire set, the two gentlemen could've taught a few unnamed younger bands a thing or two about showmanship.

That being said, when they chose to cover some of Simon and Garfunkel's greatest hits such as "The Sound of Silence," the humor was appreciated, but this reporter felt that Simon and Garfunkel tunes should be left to, well, Simon and Garfunkel. Aztec Two-Step has their own repertoire, and that is what they should lean on during their live performances. Their strength does not lie in their ability to cover other artist's songs.

Their strengths lie in Neal's guitar playing talent, both on the six and twelve string guitars, and in Rex's singing ability. Neal played his guitars with gusto, and adequately supported Rex with harmonizing vocals. As lead singer, Rex's vocals were hard to miss, smooth and melodious. It was obvious that these two know what they are good at personally, and how to play off of each other in order to create something that neither could accomplish alone.

Their latest album, "Days of Horses," released in 2004, does not quite show the talent that these two can muster at a live show. The title track is a bit country-ish, and gets repetitive. In fact, much of "Days of Horses" has a country feel, with the notable exception of "Better These Days." This song has some bluesy qualities to it, and is one of the highlights of the disc. According to Rex, "Better These Days" was written by Neal, and is very autobiographical. He referred to it as an "aging baby boomer's song," documenting how people of that generation started with illicit drugs in their youth, and have now moved on to prescription drugs to fulfill their physiological needs.

Aztec Two-Step formed in 1971 in Boston, when Neal and Rex met in a now defunct folk club on Beacon Hill. It was an open mic night, and they impressed each other with their talents. Since that fateful night, they have released twelve albums as a duo.

Rex lists his influences as Simon and Garfunkel, Bob Dylan and Donovan; all folk staples.

When asked what he enjoys writing lyrics about, Rex responded that he likes to write about relationships and other introspective sides of life. He says that, "you don't need to be a genius" to write songs, and that the emotional side of life is full of material for writing songs. For inspiration, he uses subjects he reads about for his topical songs, and "stuff that comes through me" for his more introspective songs. He says, "songs are blessings," and that anyone can do it, it just is easier for some.

If one is into the folk scene, then Aztec Two-Step is worth checking out. If folk isn't your forte, then you probably wouldn't be interested in this group.

Singer Juanes looks to influence listeners

Soulfull folk singer Juanes performs for a crowd, stepping up as one of Time Magazine's most influential rockers.

By Marian Liu
Knight Ridder Newspapers

Colombian rock star Juanes can tug at your heart, soul and mind all at once. He looks like a young Antonio Banderas and sings like Bruce Springsteen, evoking the common man's experience through his voice.

Last year, he was among Time magazine's 100 most influential people in the world, drawing comparisons to Bono for social consciousness.

"Music can be the most powerful weapon about peace," Juanes says by phone. "You can use music to send messages. It doesn't mean that people have to take all the messages, or that music is the cure for all the problems, but music can make people feel better."

Singing soulful folk ballads with a reggae-rock lick, the 12-time Latin Grammy winner expresses both political and romantic themes. Two of his big hits, for example, are "Nada Valgo Sin Tu Amor" ("I'm Worthless Without Your Love") and "A Dios le Pido" ("I ask God"), a peace anthem.

"All inspiration come from life itself," says Juanes, a 33-year-old father of two. "Everything which is between life and death is just inspiration to me; my family, my daughters, my country, also relationships and the situation with the war now. ... I believe in love and I believe in family, but I'm also a man of dreams."

"I live in music all the time," he says. "For me, it's like a religion. I use music to express my feelings, to get connected to the universe; that's why I put my heart and soul in music all the time, because I can't live without music."

Born in Medellin, Colombia, as Juan Esteban Arrsitizabal, Juanes' father and brother taught him to play guitar when he was 7 years old. Eventually, the performer combined Juan and Esteban to create his performing name, Juanes (pronounced: who-ah-ness).

He idolized Metallica and formed a successful heavy metal band called Ekhymosis (Bruise) in the late '80s, and moved to Los Angeles to pursue a solo career in 1998.

Juanes has been steadily increasing in popularity around the world. While his 2000 debut album "Fijate Bien" ("Listen Closely") sold only 72,000 records, his sophomore album "Un Dia Normal" ("A Normal Day"), which included a duet with Nelly Furtado, sold more than 2 million worldwide.

"I feel really happy because it's an opportunity to exchange cultures and educate people," says Juanes about his success. "It's about music, and music is a universal language."

His latest album, "Mi Sangre" ("My Blood"), made its debut at No. 1 in the Spanish-speaking world and has sold more than 2.3 million world wide. And three singles off the album ("La Camisa Negra," "Nada Valgo Sin Tu Amor," and "Volverte a Ver") stayed at the top of Billboard's Hot Latin Songs chart for months.

He plans to continue singing in Spanish, because it's the language he thinks and dreams in.

"What I do with my music is just follow my feelings," he says. "I have no idea about what I'm doing. I just follow my inspirations, my heart."

Last year, Juanes garnered another title: He was one of People Magazine's 50 most beautiful people. But he doesn't let it go to his head.

"No, no, I hate that. I don't like that," he says. "I don't see myself as that kind of thing. I try to put all my focus and all my energy into the music and the songs. That's the only thing that is important for me."

'Favela' documentary featured on campus

By Eva Piccozzi
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts Latin American Graduate Students Organization and the Center for Latin American, Caribbean and Latino Studies will feature the documentary film, "Favela Rising," by Jeff Zimbalist and Matt Mochary, this Thursday at the Latin American, Caribbean and Latino Film Festival. The film has won numerous international awards and was most recently winner of the Tribeca Best New Documentary Filmmaker for 2005. "Favela Rising" will be released in theaters in June.

"Favela Rising" is the first feature length film by 26 year old director and editor Jeff Zimbalists, who is a native of Northampton, MA. Working with Matt Mochary, a new filmmaker and philanthropist, the two men spent two years on and off living in the favela, Vigario Geral, one of the worst slums in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil. The objective of the film was to show a progressive, grass-roots movement, called AfroReggae, and its inspiration on a community that is plagued with drug armies.

"Favela Rising" documents the rise of two AfroReggae leaders, Anderson Sa and Jose Junior, and their vision to counteract the violent drug industry and police oppression in Vigario Geral. The AfroReggae revolution encourages local youth to be self-empowered and proud citizens through artistic and cultural education. This alternative lifestyle creates a viable escape from participation in the existing drug trade. Director Zimbalist used a strategy of allowing the children living in the favela to operate the cameras. The result was self-representation by the children and some of the most visceral and authentic scenes in the film.

On Thursday, Febuary 16 at 6pm in Thompson 104, a free screening of Favela Rising will be open to the public.

Director Jeff Zimbalist, talks about his new film "Favela Rising," with Eva Piccozzi

Eva Piccozzi: How did you get involved with documentary film making?

Jeff Zimbalist: The short of it is that my father is a Latin American economist is very politicized and my Mother is a visual artist and those were my two passions growing up.

Eva Piccozzi: What inspired you to shoot the film in Rio de Janeiro?

Jeff Zimbalist: A lot of what I had been looking for is communities that work. I've traveled in not only Latin America but elsewhere in the Third World and I found some pretty inspiring people and effective community building models that come out of nothing. Communities that are inside out and are based on assets that a community has and don't depend on outside support or outside guidance. This (Vigario Geral) community is one of the more effective inspiring models for change that I've ever come across. The Afroreggae movement is the name of the group and what they've put together is not just applicable in Brazil but really is a model that can be implemented and maintained in urban areas across the world. It was about telling a universal story and offering a universal prescription for change.

Eva Piccozzi: What is a favela?

Jeff Zimbalist: A favela is a Brazilian word that describes a slum, shanty town or ghetto near the peripheries around the hills in urban areas in Brazil. But, the slums are universal situation. They are up against the same obstacles and adversity that slums in NY or Holyoke or Springfield are up against. It's a place where poverty, neglect, abandonment, and violence occur.

Eva Piccozzi: How are the Brazilian favelas similar to the "barrios" and "ghettos" of the United States?

Jeff Zimbalist: It's full of racism. They are completely neglected areas that are used as political pawns in the newspapers. They are seen as a hot bed of violence by the outside world. People are afraid to go in to the favelas. There is really no integration, very little opportunity, and few services. It (the favela) is an exaggerated abandonment relative to US ghettos.

Eva Piccozzi: How is the favela represented by the media in Rio de Janeiro and the rest of Brazil?

Jeff Zimbalist: There was a murder in 1999 in the favela. Tim Lopez, a journalist who worked for O' Globo news, was based in Rio and he was doing undercover investigating in the favelas. He was caught by a drug army using a hidden camera and they tried him in an all drug army jury and they decided he was guilty and tortured him and killed him. Since 1999 when that happened all the big media conglomerates decided there is no way they were going to ask drug lord permission to go in and shoot stories in their neighborhoods. They felt they would be legitimizing their power. There has been no story telling in the favelas, there has been very little news reportage that's because people don't want to ask drug lord permission. We weren't of that mindset. Stories need to be told from the inside or else how are people in the outside ever going to see the potential there? How is this place ever going to transform its identity and reputation away from being that of violence destruction and crisis and conflict?

Eva Piccozzi: How did you get access to film inside the favela?

Jeff Zimbalist: We got access by making friends. We asked drug lord permission and they gave it to us. We were chaperoned at all times by at least two or three leading members of the Afroreggae movement and these guys are respected by the peacelovering, hardworking population of favela residence as well as the drug armies. We stayed within a radius of the two main characters of the film. There is daily violence and destruction, raids and invasions in the favelas. But because its so routine the community has a good sense of when and where it was going to happen so they could anticipate and give us fair warning. They'd say, "don't go over to the east side of the community today there will be some cross-firing."

Eva Piccozzi: How did the "drug lords" react to the film crew's presence inside the favela?

Jeff Zimbalist: We didn't do big film crews, that was part of the strategy as well. We gave cameras to kids in the community we taught them how

PBS looks for an eager audience

By Charlie McCollum
Knight Ridder Newspapers

NBC would like you to think differently, but there are things on television this week other than the Olympics. And the alt TV isn't limited to the latest installments of "American Idol."

If you're an Anglophile, or if you even just like things British, Wednesday is your night. PBS is showing two good documentaries, "Windsor Castle: A Royal Year" (8 p.m.) and "The Blitz: London's Longest Night" (9 p.m.), that say a lot about the island nation and its people in good times and in bad.

"Windsor Castle" is a three-episode miniseries (parts 2 and 3 will air March 1 and 8) that was a huge hit in Britain on the BBC. After years of negotiations, the filmmakers were able to gain unprecedented access to the castlem, the home of the royal family, and its staff. While visitors always can see some of the public rooms, this film pokes around the stables, the kitchens and the bedrooms reserved for distinguished guests, all places where cameras and outsiders had not been allowed in the past.

Of the show's three installments, Wednesday's is the most fascinating, a detailed account of a state visit and banquet for French President Jacques Chirac. A team of more than 300 is employed to set the tables, cook gourmet meals for 140, select the wine and, just for a little after-dinner entertainment, stage a concert version of "Les Miserables" (in the Waterloo Room which, in deference to French sensibilities, was renamed the Music Room for the occasion).

Don't expect anything too candid from the staff interviews. But it's fascinating to hear longtime castle employees talk about the intricacies of weekend visits by the royals (one man's sole job is to fly the right flag with the queen arrives), keeping time in the castle (one guy oversees more than 400 clocks) and how Queen Elizabeth herself has named all the royal horses.

In future weeks, "Windsor Castle" will look at a year in the life of the castle (including the Royal Ascot and the Christmas holidays) and, in Part 3, how Prince Philip serves as the "Ranger" of the castle's grounds. That episode will include inside footage of the wedding of Prince Charles and Camilla Parker Bowles.

"The Blitz" is a much more serious piece of work. Using archival footage, re-enactments, computer-generated graphics and some fascinating interviews, it reconstructs the evening of Dec. 29, 1940, when Germany tried to break the spirit of the British people by unleashing an unprecedented Luftwaffe attack on central London.

I still cringe at some documentaries that use re-creations because they tend to be low-budget and pretty cheesy. But "Blitz" does an admirable job giving a sense of just how terrifying the attack must have been for Londoners, and how they rose to the occasion to fight the firestorm that threatened such city landmarks as St. Paul's Cathedral. (So symbolic was St. Paul's that at one point, Winston Churchill ordered all firefighters to the church to keep it from going up in flames.)

In some ways, though, it is the words of those interviewed that carry the most emotional impact. That's particularly true of Leonard Rosoman, the renowned artist who worked as a firefighter that night. Ann Regan-Atherton, who tells the story of her mother and father making their way across the city at the height of the attack, and Barbara White Walker, the daughter of famed American reporter William White, who talks about her father wandering the city that night.

At the end of that very long night, St. Paul's was still standing, and so was Britain. It was a moment in history of great courage and great resolve.

VH1 grasps at 'surreal' straws

By Richard Huff
New York Daily News

The producers of VH1's reality shows "The Surreal Life" are expanding the franchise, and perhaps, the watercooler buzz with a new series, "The Surreal Life Fame Games."

The show will pit 10 "Surreal Life" alumni in a series of challenges, all designed to test their fame.

"One of the biggest questions we always get is, 'Who's more famous?' when we cast a show," said "Surreal Life" executive producer Cris Abrego.

So, the idea for the "Fame Games" is to play off that concept and put a group of former "Surreal Life" players in a series of off-beat challenges.

For example, Abrego said, a true A-list celeb knows how to hide from the paparazzi. So, they'll let the players loose to be chased by a well-known paparazzi. The one who gets photographed the most loses.

"And if you're truly an A-lister," Abrego said, "we'll see who you could get on the phone."

Among the players for the new show will be Brigitte Nielsen, Ron Jeremy, Chyna Doll, Vanilla Ice, Traci Bingham, Jordan Knight, Sandy (Pepa) Denton, Emanuel Lewis, Andrea Lowell and CC Deville.

Robin Leach will host.

"The Surreal Life' has become a brand and a franchise," Abrego said. "There's a lot of favorites."

Producers came up with a cast list by picking players from past shows who would create sparks when thrown together on TV.

Abrego said "Fame Games" is seen as a new franchise, and some celebrities having appeared on "The Surreal Life," there will be a number of stars to mine for future installments.

So far, the only "Surreal Life" veteran to say no to "Fame Games" was MC Hammer, who Abrego said had had a good time on the show.

"We asked him to come back," Abrego said, "and he said you'll spend the money on the set and

Folk singer Butler relives simpler days

By Jim Abbott
The Orlando Sentinel

SANFORD, Fla. — David Butler learned how to play the guitar when he was a teenager, a long time ago now, and he never stopped.

Sitting in the living room of his Spartan apartment in Sanford, his long, powerful fingers rake across the strings of a red guitar. It fills the room with the determined, primitive rhythms of the blues.

It's not the stylized version of the traditional music that surfaces in suburban garage bands, where the middle-class idea of misery is getting a "C" in biology or being grounded for the weekend.

Butler, 75, has seen harder times: discrimination, financial hardship, potentially life-threatening medical conditions. He has one artificial leg, a reminder of a long-ago motorcycle accident, and doesn't see so well.

Such realities reverberate in the music.

"I met Lightnin' Hopkins in Atlanta, Ga.," Butler says softly, the consonants in his deep voice striking hard against the roof of his mouth. "I was young then, and I went up on stage and played this here."

He touches the strings again, unleashing a rumbling bass line.

What do you call that?

"Don't Get Mad with Me, I Ain't Mad with You."

The song is obscure, like the man singing it, but Butler and his music haven't been forgotten. He and other traditional blues practitioners are considered cultural treasures by the Music Maker Relief Foundation, a North Carolina organization devoted to offering musicians support and long overdue recognition.

"I've never heard anybody else play like him," says Tim Duffy, the musicologist who started the foundation more than a decade ago in Hillsborough, N.C. "He does all these message songs in the spirit of all bluesmen, telling people who never left home what it's like. The way he carries himself, he should be a character actor in Hollywood."

Duffy, 42, developed his interest in traditional Southern music in the 1990s, when he studied folklore at the University of North Carolina. In the spirit of legendary folklorist Alan Lomax, Duffy traveled the region recording the songs and stories of unknown musicians. He quickly realized that most of them lived in poverty.

With the success of "O Brother, Where Art Thou?" and roots-based albums such as Eric Clapton's recent tribute to Robert Johnson, interest in the old music is stronger than ever, Duffy says. Unfortunately, the original practitioners rarely reap the rewards.

"It's hard for the true traditional artists to have any platform because they have no expertise competing against white college-educated kids. How can you compete against a guy like Jack White of the White Stripes? This kind of sophisticated guy reaches straight to roots music, twists it and makes big hit records. A guy like David Butler isn't going figure that out."

Music Maker sends monthly checks to musicians such as Butler, amounts that average $100 to augment annual incomes that typically range from $6,000 to $15,000. Equally important, the foundation has sponsored concerts and more than 55 CDs exposing the music to new generations.

Music Maker has garnered the endorsement of stars such as Bonnie Raitt and Taj Mahal, the latter a member of the board of directors.

"These people are part of the tradition that brought this music to the forefront in the first place," Mahal says. "There's a whole industry built up around how to exploit these artists, yet they always seem to be the last considered whenever the tradition is spoken about."

Two of Butler's performances are featured on "Treasure Box," a 2005 three-disc compilation featuring Music Maker artists. Duffy has enough material to release an album of Butler's songs, but he has so many other projects that he isn't sure when it might happen.

Meanwhile, Butler plays every day in his living room, serenading the pictures of Jesus on the walls. Spend enough time with him and he might share tales of his stint in baseball's Negro Leagues or encounters with famous bluesmen.

He has played everywhere from folk-art festivals to off-the-beaten-path nightclubs in a band that includes bassist Scott Riggan, 35, who brought Butler to Duffy's attention.

Riggan, co-owner of Jack's Cycles in Sanford, met Butler more than 10 years ago when the musician did odd jobs at the shop. He offered Butler gas money for guitar lessons, and the two became friends.

It was a slow process.

"He was pretty much a loner," Riggan says. "He was pretty anti-social, beaten down. It took him a long time to build his confidence."

Butler is still distrustful of strangers, but music knocks down the walls.

"We weren't making anything sounding like anybody else," he explains after another old tune. "We needed something that sounded like us."

David Butler, legendary folk singer, sits outside his Sanford apartment, talking of his music.

Watlington grabs a pen and begs for a cinematic future

By Cary Darling
Knight Ridder Newspapers

"Chasing America," a memoir by actor-writer-producer Dennis Watlington, is one of those books that just begs to be made into a movie. It's got it all: poverty, racism, heroin, crack, lockup, football, the Beatles, the Beach Boys, Geraldo Rivera, and overcoming long odds to find a life of sweet, sober satisfaction with home and family. If not for James Frey's lapse into literary excess and exaggeration, you could almost hear Oprah applauding from here.

No doubt, "Chasing America" does follow a familiar arc, one that in the wake of the "Million Little Pieces" scandal some might view with skepticism. But that doesn't make Watlington's tale of coming of age as a black New York kid in the turbulent '60s and '70s any less compelling.

Born to stern and somewhat distant but loving parents in Harlem, Watlington demonstrated early academic and athletic prowess. He nabbed scholarships to elite prep schools, became a high school class president, could quote Hemingway and love Nathanael West, would bop to the innocence of Fun, Fun, Fun, and took to calling himself a "Lennonist," after his hero, John Lennon. But he couldn't avoid the streets' seductive siren song of violence and drugs as, by his teenage years, he could add "addict," "gang member" and "mugger" to his list of accomplishments.

In fact, it was partly his feelings of being torn between two worlds that seem to have left him emotionally stranded, susceptible to the worst each had to offer him. He recalls being introduced to heroin almost as if it were his first romance.

"This recently tarnished golden boy gazed with fascination at Earl's deft handling of the most popular process to hit the ghetto since welfare applications," he writes. "I was dying to try it but was afraid of needles. Earl drew the fluid into the eye-dropper, which now sported a sleek hypodermic needle on its tip. He injected the fluid into the pit of his left arm, and, without the slightest hint of discomfort, he calmly rode the fluid. That was the coolest thing I had ever seen. In minutes he was into a world he controlled. As he began to nod off into a dreamlike comfort, his voice changed, it slowed down and became melodic in a blues-laced way."

From there, it's a long, steep drop into drug-induced despair, ultimately turning him into a walking, glad-handing contradiction: an anti-drug activist who still partook. That led to a bizarre turn in which, while working as a consultant for Geraldo Rivera who was prepping a TV special on drugs in America, he volunteered himself to go on camera in a crackhouse to smoke crack, the ultimate case of a reporter throwing himself into a story. What followed was a two-day bender when the cameras weren't rolling.

Amazingly though, Watlington's intellectual curiosity remained largely intact. He dabbled in music, writing and theater, attended New York University, and began to move in circles that would ultimately change his life. Writer Gail Sheehy ("Passages") and a pre-Moonlighting Bruce Willis (who appeared in a play Watlington wrote called "Bullpen") became part of his circle of friends. Marriage and children also helped ground him.

Watlington also never gave up his ideals as a cultural integrationist, someone who could love Sam Cooke and Sgt. Pepper's in equal measure. Early on, after trying LSD and tripping out to singer-songwriter Tim Hardin, Watlington declares, "I was never as happy or enlightened as I was that sun-filled acid dawning. Heroin addiction, racial problems, and all of the other harsh obstacles that the time period trafficked in were downsized into mere speed bumps ... I sped up the construction of my new image, that of a Black John Lennon. I was no longer interested in any particular racial affiliation. I wanted to belong to the world."

While he would finally shake the drug dependency, he hasn't let up in his chase of the integrated American promise, even if it earned him ridicule from some of his friends, and especially his parents. And, even if, as during the post-Rodney King violence, it seemed more distant and elusive than ever.

Yet for all of the drama in Watlington's life, at 358 pages, the book is bloated and bogged down by details. It's not helped by his tendency to bounce out of chronology, sometimes leaving the reader wondering when something happened in relation to something else. And his writing style, a blend of street tough and poetic overreach, at times feels stilted.

But that saps little of the story's core strength: Watlington's ability to survive, even thrive, under conditions that might have made lesser men succumb.

Bet Denzel Washington plays him in the movie. Assuming, of course, Watlington survives his Oprah moment.

Mediocre Brockmeier hits shelves

By Melissa Moody
The Louisville Cardinal

LOUISVILLE, Ky. — The debate negotiating boundaries between truth, fact and fiction has been raging in the literary world recently. In 21st-century America, authors are rarely celebrities and when they are it is seldom for the work they have produced, often receiving little attention from anyone outside literary and academic circles.

There appears to be a strong desire in the publishing world, and American culture at large, to claw for fame even when it is at the cost of the truth and your dignity. Kevin Brockmeier is likely to be an exception. His new novel, "The Brief History of the Dead," is released in bookstores Tuesday. Brockmeier is in no danger of being thrown to the celebrity wolves, although if fame were any longer a measure of talent he would have cause to worry. Certainly worthy of recognition, "The Brief History of the Dead" is essentially post-apocalyptic. Within that sweeping description, however, "Brief History" manages to escape trite science fiction. Upon the face of the extraordinary plot, Kevin Brockmeier most eloquently utilizes his mastery of describing ordinary details. These details add up to create a meditation on life and death, and the nature of the human connection.

The book begins in the City, where the living appear after they have died, with the simple explanation, "That was what the living did: they died." Each citizen of the City, and there are many, comes with a brief anecdote.

It becomes a catalogue of memories and moments — "Jeffrey Fallon, 16 and from Park Falls, Wisconsin. 'Mostly I just miss my girlfriend.' Her name was Tracey Tipton, and she did this thing with his earlobes and the notched edge of her front teeth that made his entire body go taught and buzz like a guitar string. He had never given his earlobes a second thought until the day she took them between her lips, but now that he was dead he thought of nothing else."

Each inhabitant also has a unique story to tell about his or her death. Not the actual event, but the crossing afterward. "The stories people told about the crossing were as varied and elaborate as their 10 billion lives, so much more particular than those other stories, the ones they told about their deaths. After all, there were only so many ways a person could die."

The story has two main narratives. Alongside the story of the City, there is the story of Laura Byrd, who is alone at an Antarctic research station. Brockmeier meticulously describes both the intensity and vastness of the landscape and lays bare the emotions and thoughts that account for an entire life lived.

While post-apocalyptic on the surface, and with certain similarities to the many other fantasy tales of Armageddon, "The Brief History of the Dead" quickly re-trains your focus beyond the generic. Invoking all of your literary senses with suspense, realism, magic realism, romance and philosophy, Brockmeier manages to weave a story of both major and minuscule proportions. And stating the fact means that fame is not longevity and that every person is suddenly meaningful.

'Favela' inspires filmmakers

to shoot little digital video. A lot of what the Afroreggae movement preaches is self empowerment, giving youth the opportunity to take control of their own lives and feel confident in their own voices. Afroreggae and their band are role models for youth. For us to come in as outsiders and accomplished filmmakers and give cameras to kids in and of itself was a process that really fed the movements ideology and philosophy. But we were surprised that by giving the kid's cameras also yielded some access to violence and great everyday footage. When I was in there shooting alone the idea behind that was to capture the most authentic representation as possible.

Eva Piccozzi: What was the most interesting lesson you learned after living in the favela?

Jeff Zimbalist: From the whole process I would say the rarity and progress of Brazilians. What I mean by that is two-fold. It took these guys (Afroreggae), 12 yrs by the time I was there to get to a place where the world started to recognize the work they were doing. The way the community started to transform around their mission statement and influence. They are in a war zone. They are in the least likely of places for a positive cultural artistic and economic movement to take place and they did it but it took them a long time with nothing. It was a testament being there and seeing their patience and their resolve and their dedication and their lack of hesitation or indecisiveness, they were certain and convicted. It takes something that strong to build and it takes coming back to your idea and your mission time and time again.

Second, I've been an editor and I've never produced directed and edited and shot an entire feature by myself until now. I used to think good artists were people with good ideas and then as I got involved in editing I said good artists are people with strong work ethic and in making this film I took it up a notch and said it takes resilience. No one is applauding your work when you're in the editing room for two years. You just have to have faith despite the odds. It was a parallel journey.

Eva Piccozzi: How was your film received in the media and by the public in Brazil? Did you get any criticism?

Jeff Zimbalist: In Brazil, the film has done very well. It was the most popular at the Rio International film festival. It is more directed at an international audience. When we showed the film in the favela they loved it because their stories are never told. How often have they seen in any media their community represented as a place where hardworking, peace loving people exist? Only 1% of the population living in these communities is involved in criminal activity. While, 99% of people living in the favela, (and ghettos in the US) are hardworking innocent people and their stories aren't told enough. The only outside image of that community is one completely dominated by violence and lawbreaking. So this story to come out of there was really refreshing for them.

Eva Piccozzi: What was the hardest part of living in the favela?

Jeff Zimbalist: They're very distrustful of outsiders. It tested my patience to be able to really develop an authentic friendship. It's like a child whose been abandoned by his parents. It's almost impossible to convince that kid to trust you regardless of whom you are because that model has been built in. This is an entire community that's been abandoned time and time again and I'm trying to come in and say, I'm different. So that was tough. But, ultimately I've become very tight friends with several of the main characters. I've developed a sense of respect and solidarity with the community there.

Eva Piccozzi: Do you feel you were accurate in the portrayal of your subjects?

Jeff Zimbalist: In film school they say don't bring your subjects into the edit room because they may get vain, but that's not the priority the priority is telling the story. I think that in ethnographic documentary film making, its very important to bring in the subjects into the edit room to bring them in at every stage of the develop of the story telling. I ask them if this feels accurate. Sometimes they'd say yes that's what it feels like when I walk the streets in my neighborhood. Or they'd say don't put this in the film because it endangers us. It was crucial that we worked hand in hand throughout the creative process with the guys we were representing.

Eva Piccozzi: Are you working on any projects right now?

Jeff Zimbalist: Right now I'm working on a deadline for an HBO special about drug addiction. I'm also about to start on another project in Puerto Rico that will start in a week.

lesser opponents – but GW going undefeated in the A-10 and losing to a ranked team is like Detroit beating every team in the Eastern Conference and losing to the Spurs.

What's the real test here? Is it taking care of cupcakes like St. Joe's, Charlotte and Rhode Island? Or is it winning against worthy opponents in pressure situations and hostile environments? I think it's the latter, and if that's the case, GW hasn't proven to be a Top-10 team yet.

The Associated Press Poll (the mother of all basketball polls) has the Colonials progressively climbing in the rankings, but while the No. 7 ranking looks pretty, it's the RPI that is more indicative of where George Washington stands – the Colonials are 38th in strength-of-schedule, behind teams like Wichita State, Seton Hall, George Mason, Northern Iowa, Missouri State, Nevada and Wisconsin-Milwaukee. That is not outstanding company.

The Colonials are 20-1 right now, but there's a word that describes them well that the Indianapolis Colts hear ringing in their ears during the offseason: overrated. It doesn't mean that UMass or any of the teams (with the exception of Saint Louis, which has a shot) will take GW down in the A-10 tournament, but I'll bet Tony Wagner that the Colonials' end will be abrupt and ugly, possibly in the first round of the NCAA tournament.

There are currently six teams that have, perfect conference records in Division I college basketball – Duke (11-0), Memphis (8-0), GW (10-0), Penn (6-0) and Bucknell (11-0).

The Atlantic Coast Conference is surprisingly weak this year. Wake Forest and Georgia Tech, two teams usually dishing out losses, are buried at the bottom of the conference with 1-9 and 2-8 records, respectively.

The Maryland Terrapins are a mediocre 5-5. Roy Williams has admirably brought back the North Carolina program to the Top-25 despite losing its top seven scorers and its holy trinity of May, Felton and McCants. The Tar Heels are tough but are too young (their top two scorers are freshmen) to challenge the Blue Devils for A-10 supremacy this season.

North Carolina State is 8-2 but it is hard to believe that the Wildpack can pose a serious challenge to the Blue Devils in a pressure game.

Boston College, taking advantage of a weaker ACC that usually puts six or seven teams in the NCAA tournament, is 6-4. The much-overrated Eagles began the conference season with three straight losses, and, despite recovering to a 6-4 record, will perform their annual disappearing act if they make it to March.

Duke, needless to say, is the cream-of-the-crop. They play hard, play smart and play tough defense every night. On top of that, the Duke basketball program does something that almost no other top-notch basketball schools can pull off: have success on the basketball court while maintaining an acceptable graduation rate and a squeaky-clean image.

Bucknell is 6-0 in the Patriot League and just moved into the Top-25 for the first time in school history. It's also a first for the Patriot League, which has never had a team in the Top-25 since its creation in the early 90's. I hate to beat on the same drum here, but isn't Bucknell in the same boat as George Washington? The national media is calling Bucknell the "giant killer," but who have they brought down this season? The Bison beat a mediocre Syracuse team on the road early, but they lost by 19 to No. 4 Villanova and lost by 29 to Duke. A Top-25 team should be able to hang with the top teams in the nation, but Bucknell has been road-kill so far.

Penn? Congratulations, you beat Harvard, Yale, Brown and Columbia. When there are three teams in your conference named after colors (Harvard Crimson, Brown, Cornell Big Red, Dartmouth Big Green), you know you're in trouble.

UMass's old friend John Calipari is doing well for himself down in the heartland, but who's he playing against? UTEP, UAB, UCF – know those schools off the top of your head?

Plus, it seems like he's up to his old tricks down there. How'd he get Dajuan Wagner, a certain lottery pick in the NBA draft, to come to Memphis for one year before declaring? Calipari put Wagner's father on the university payroll the year before he graduated high school. Sound dirty? After what happened with Camby I'm willing to believe almost anything.

Gonzaga is 9-0 in the West Coast Conference. I know Gonzaga is pretty high-profile, but I had to go online to find out what conference the 'Zags were in. Other than Pepperdine, good luck finding any other schools in the WCC that have sniffed national recognition. Ya, the Bulldogs are good – and this Adam Morrison character is drawing comparisons to Larry Bird — that seems a little much — but they've played ranked teams three times this season (UConn, Mich St. and Washington) and they dropped two of three, both to Huskies.

Here's the point: strength-of-schedule is the most important statistic in college basketball. It determines which teams can play at the highest level — with the best players, raucous fans, in-game adjustments, pressure shots — can survive. We know that Duke is the real deal because they play the best teams in the nation on a weekly basis — and win. That desensitizes all of their players to pressure environments so they won't have as many butterflies when it's win-or-go-home.

George Washington? Bucknell? Gonzaga? Who knows what will happen when they go on the road in March.

Rob Greenfield is a Collegian Columnist

Duke sharpshooter J.J. Redick has shot over 90 percent from the free-throw line in three of his four seasons in college basketball.

George Washington's Pops Mensah-Bonsu, a potential NBA prospect, is averaging 13 points and seven rebounds this season.

The Minutemen have struggled recently, dropping five of their last six games, with four of those losses coming on the road. UMass is just 2-10 away from the Mullins Center this season.

Any hopes of pulling off the upset tonight rest with the health of Chris Lowe's right ankle. The freshman point guard sprained the ankle prior to the La Salle game, and played 30 minutes that night, though he was clearly limited by the injury.

It appeared that Lowe would be held out of Sunday's matchup with FSU, as he didn't practice in the days leading up to the game, but it was determined on game day that he was healthy enough to play. Lowe logged 37 minutes in the game, looking sharp in scoring six points and dishing out four assists.

Lowe will certainly be in the lineup tonight, but Ford said the team's floor general is still only at 80 percent.

"Chris is really playing hard and gutsy," Ford said. "He has grown up a lot mentally this year. I'm proud of the way he has gutted it out. Obviously, he means a whole lot to our team, so him at 80 percent is better than anything else we have."

Lowe's success on the court is largely contingent on his teammates converting the opportunities that he provides them with his passing. One teammate who seemed to rediscover his offensive flair against FSU was junior Brandon Thomas.

Thomas was the team's second leading scorer early in the season, but went into a slump midway through the year, as his role and position changed frequently. Back in the starting lineup at his natural wing position on Sunday for the first time in a month, Thomas responded with 10 points, scoring seven of those in the first half.

"He came out with a lot of energy," Ford said. "He made smart decisions and didn't force his actions; he took open 3-pointers and drove when it was there. When he makes smart decisions and plays within himself he's a very good basketball player."

Despite the strong showing by Thomas in a starting role, Ford expects to go back to James Life as the starting shooting guard tonight. Life was absent from the starting lineup on Sunday for disciplinary reasons.

Miller down and out

bed. Winning brought the sponsors knocking at his door, but it was Bode, enjoying the trappings of money even as he curses it out of the other side of his mouth, who opened it and let them in.

"It's torture to do something you don't like," Woody Miller added. "It's a constant, constant drain."

Maybe it's not a coincidence that Miller killed his best chance at gold so far trying to cut a corner.

And maybe it's a coincidence, too, that Ted Ligety, who will be making the trip down to Turin on Wednesday to pick up his gold medal, is just 21 and largely free of serious expectations.

Four years ago, Ligety was a forerunner at the Salt Lake City Olympics, one of those who goes down the course ahead of the big guns to make sure no rocks peek out of the snow and the timing clocks are all set right.

"I have no idea how this will change my life," Ligety said afterward. "I'm pretty satisfied with my life so far, so I hope it doesn't change too much."

Too bad Miller didn't stick around very long. He could have provided the kid with chapter and verse on that one.

Russian speed skater takes gold

By Beth Harris
Associated Press

TURIN, Italy — Calling home to check on her 2-year-old son, Svetlana Zhurova heard him chirp the name of a Russian speed skating medalist.

"Dmitry, second. Dmitry, second," he told her.

When she calls again, Zhurova hopes to hear something about dear old Mom.

"I hope he tells me, 'Mama first, Mama first,'" she said.

The 34-year-old Russian who took a break from sports to become a mother won the gold medal in the women's 500 Tuesday. She skated a combined time of 1 minute, 16.57 seconds to give Russia its second speed-skating medal of these games.

As young Yary knew, Dmitry Dorofeyev won silver in the 500 meters on Monday. Zhurova was matched with China's Wang Manli in the final pair and beat her to the finish line after 1 1/4 laps in 38.34. Wang was timed in 38.47, winning the silver with a time of 1:16.78.

"I feel a little regret not to get the gold medal. Maybe Svetlana is stronger mentally than I am," she said.

Wang had dominated the 500 the last two years, including winning consecutive world championships.

"I'm really sorry for her," Zhurova said. "For four years, she's been skating very fast. I'm sure she could have had the gold."

Ren Hui won the bronze in 1:16.87 for China, which is still hoping for its first gold in women's speed-skating.

"This will give me the power to get better and better and do well at the next Olympic Games," Ren said.

The Americans were never in contention.

Jennifer Rodriguez finished 11th, Amy Sannes 17th and Elli Ochowicz 23rd. Chris Witty finished 28th of 29 skaters.

"We're typically not on the podium," Sannes said. "It's not like we had any hopes of ending up there."

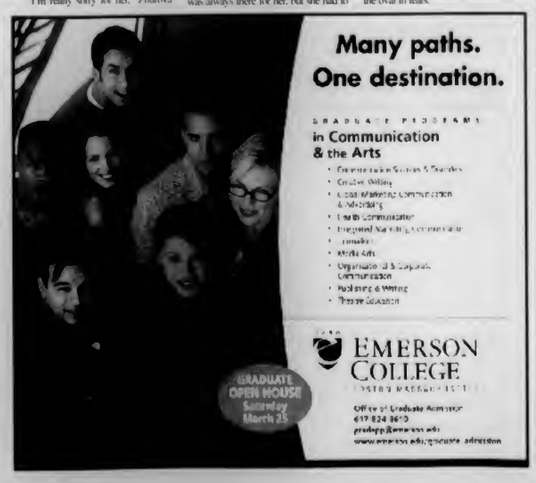
Zhurova didn't seem to realize she had captured the gold. She shot a puzzled look at her coach, who confirmed it. She then skated a victory lap, her long blond hair flowing down her back and the Russian flag waving.

On the medals podium, she jumped up and down and waved her arms excitedly.

Zhurova had Yary in 2003 and returned to win the world sprint title last month.

"She's phenomenal," Rodriguez said. "She took some time off and it took her a while to come around. She didn't really start skating well until January. It was always there for her, but she had to bring it back."

As a youngster, Zhurova saw three-time Olympic 500 champion Bonnie Blair on television. Her uncle told her she would beat the American someday. Zhurova did once in 1995 before Blair retired.



"I always hoped to be like her. She's my hero for sure," said Zhurova, who treasures a photo of herself and Blair after the Russian's 1995 victory. "That was a sign that I was going to be very good in the future."

Zhurova's win returned Russia to the dominance it once enjoyed in the sprint race. Skaters from the former Soviet Union won medals the first seven times the race was held, starting in 1960, including a sweep in 1964.

Zhurova left her home outside St. Petersburg to train at an indoor rink in Moscow. Her sister helps watch Yary while she is away.

"I went to training camp for three weeks and when I came back home Yary was walking," she said. "That shocked me. I tried to put that feeling deep inside me. I tried to tell myself, 'I have a goal, this baby he will be very happy if I win a gold medal. It will be the best present for him.'"

Dutch star Marianne Timmer, a two-time gold medalist in longer events, was disqualified for a false start and left the oval in tears.

Raich's – not an insurmountable lead, but one he could easily have held.

All of a sudden, those numbers were meaningless.

Miller was the 2002 Olympic silver medalist in the event and the reigning World Cup circuit champion. Raich came into the competition the No. 1-ranked combined skier in the world and won a bronze at Salt Lake City four years ago.

A few hours earlier, Miller had charged down the downhill course with trademark abandon to take the lead while Raich struggled to finish 13th in that portion of the combined, 2:06 behind Miller.

Raich is one of the world's best slalom racers, though, and he sliced Miller's lead by more than half with an aggressive run, always in control down the icy, steep course on the edge of the village of Sestriere.

Fourteen of the 56 skiers either didn't finish the first slalom run or were disqualified. Among them were medal contenders Aksel Lund Svindal and Lasse Kjus of Norway, downhill silver medalist Michael Walchhofer and Didier Defago of Switzerland, who was second in the downhill portion of the combined.

Miller had the fastest downhill in 1 minute, 38.36 on a course slightly shortened from the one on which he finished a disappointing fifth in Sunday's downhill medal race.

Miller picked up time through the middle portion of the course Tuesday to finish 32-hundredths of a second ahead of Defago. He was 32nd out of the gate after skipping the Monday training run that determined Tuesday's starting order.

He delivered the kind of nail-biting run that has made him among the world's best, making turns on one ski and soaring through jumps.

Miller found a tight line, swiping many of the red gates with his arms as he sped by. The line made for speed – at one point he was clocked at 78 miles per hour.

Within view of the finish line bleachers, Miller nailed the last jump in unusual style. In midair, rather than thrusting out his arms sideways for balance as he often does, he extended them behind his back, his poles sticking straight up.

It was classic form that for once didn't elude Miller. The gold medal still did, though.

Miller wastes talent and chance for gold

By Jim Litke
Associated Press

SESTRIERE, Italy — He wouldn't be the last guy to waste a world of talent. The sports landscape is already littered front to back with athletes every bit as good and just as full of themselves.

But as Bode Miller is fast on his way to finding out, there's always room for one more.

Talent has always been equal parts blessing and burden. This should not be news, at least not to Miller, least of all now.

The recklessness that makes him the most dangerous skier on the planet is the same thing that makes Miller his own worst enemy. The genius that enabled him to survive one close call after another is the same thing that lures him out onto the edge again and again.

In that sense, Tuesday was Exhibit A. Early in the afternoon, Miller careened down one mountain like a banshee in the downhill portion of the Olympic combined and stole everybody's breath. As nightfall set in, he carved his way down a second, and in one foolhardy moment left them shaking their head.

The difference in quality between those two runs, between leaving one audience impressed and the other depressed, could be measured by the length of a gold medal. But that's a distinction that might forever be wasted on him.

"I don't really intend to get that disappointed," Miller said. "I mean, at least I don't have to go all the way down to Turin tomorrow."

Miller was referring to the medal stand set up at Piazza Castello, a 90-minute ride from the bottom of the slope where he'd just been disqualified. He was joking – we think. This was a half-hour or so after the tip of his left ski bounced just outside the 42nd of 56 gates in the first of the two slalom runs that along with the downhill make up the Olympic combined.

The Disqualification for straddling the gate was nothing new. Since winning a World Cup slalom race over this same course little more than two years ago, Miller has failed to finish 11 of the last 14 on the circuit, including five of seven this season. Apparently, he found that comical, too.

"I've straddled probably more times," Miller said, "than most people have finished the slalom."

Five years ago, Miller was arguably the best slalom skier on the circuit, a point U.S. ski team coach Phil McNichol made during the break between the downhill portion of the combined and the slalom.

McNichol was one of those breathing easiest after Miller's win in the downhill gave him almost a third of a second cushion on the field and better than two seconds on the man who figured to be his closest rival, Benjamin Raich of Austria.

"A very important piece of the puzzle," the coach called it.

And that wasn't the only reason McNichol was feeling confident.

"Bode's very rested, very focused and you always like to see your guys that way," he added. "He's spending a lot of time in the athletes' village, hanging out with his teammates, laughing."

That description was in sharp contrast to the picture Miller has been painting for the public. During a whirlwind round of interviews last fall, he talked about skiing "wasted," about battling with team officials, sponsors and even his coaches, and how all of it was draining his desire.

The Olympics were supposed to wipe the slate clean. Since arriving in Sestriere, though, Miller has been rumored to have visited half the saloons in town. He was supposed to compete for all five Alpine medals, and he's already 0-for-2.

If Miller is as happy as he contends, half as happy as McNichol made it sound, either the skier is doing a good job of hiding it, or he really doesn't care. Looking on from the grandstand a few moments before the race, his father thought he knew which.

"What's going on is he's not happy with the situation he's in," Woody Miller said. "His drinking is a symptom of that, not the problem."

Woody Miller was clear about this, too. His son made his own

Reebok ads ignite controversy

By Mark Jewell
Associated Press

CANTON, Mass. — The images that sell Reebok sneakers these days are edgy.

One ad depicts the devil. Another has fingerprints on what appears to be a police booking form, as rapper 50 Cent advises buyers to "take advantage of today because tomorrow is not promised."

A controversial television ad last year had 50 Cent, a former drug dealer who has rapped about being shot nine times, counting aloud the bullets that were fired at him. The rapper laughs and then looks into the camera as a voiceover asks, "Who do you plan to massacre next?" The ad was withdrawn in Great Britain.

Reebok's "I am what I am" campaign is a significant shift for the sneaker brand that first gained traction pitching subtly styled, lightweight shoes to American women who embraced the aerobics phenomenon of the 1980s.

These days, however, there's more money in selling to teenage males — a reality not lost upon Adidas-Salomon AG, which completed a $3.8 billion buyout of Reebok International Ltd. Jan. 31 and plans to keep the Reebok brand name alive. Reebok's profits rose more than 20 percent in both 2003 and 2004, and were up 37 percent through the first nine months of last year.

Adidas must now decide whether to stick with a marketing campaign that has yielded short-term sales gains among younger consumers. But the campaign is angering activists — although it has spurred no boycotts — and industry analysts say it also risks alienating customers who prize sneaker performance over fashion.

Activists have complained about Reebok's promotion of corrupt athletes like Jason Giambi, who admitted to steriod use last season.

"Promotion and marketing footwear, or any clothing, is not, and must not be a money-making tool referencing gun violence, drugs or gangs," said Liz Bishop-Goldsmith, president of Rosedale, N.Y.-based Mothers Against Guns.

Reebok, which has also featured rapper Jay-Z, has gone further than market leader Nike Inc. and other rivals in embracing hip-hop culture and youth-oriented entertainment alongside athletics.

As the aerobics craze cooled, the brand expanded into basketball, football and other sports and signed endorsers like edgy basketball star Allen Iverson. Reebok's hip-hop foray began in 2002 with the street-inspired "Rbk" line, and in November the company announced it would begin producing Reebok-branded TV programs for a new Comcast Corp. on-demand hip-hop channel.

Reebok's chief marketing officer, Dennis Baldwin, said market research conducted after a late 1990's sales downturn revealed Reebok needed to reirench in response to a changing youth market.

"They weren't distinguishing between athletes and entertainers, and other things that were influencing youth culture," Baldwin said in an interview at Reebok's headquarters in Canton, 20 miles south of Boston. "So when we looked at the market, we said, 'Yeah, Allen Iverson is incredibly influential, but so is Jay-Z.'"

Reebok's "I am what I am" ads celebrate individual empowerment and overcoming adversity, Baldwin said. Alongside the bad-boy ads are some softer spots, including ads with actresses Lucy Liu and Christina Ricci.

Other Reebok endorsers have less-than-squeaky-clean pasts that might scare away other companies. 50 Cent, whose real name is Curtis Jackson, and Jay-Z have made no secret of their drug-dealing pasts or difficult upbringings. Jay-Z used his real name, Shawn Carter, for a signature line of Reeboks known as "The S. Carter Collection," which preceded 50 Cent's "G-Unit" line.

One of Reebok's newest endorsers is New York Yankees slugger Jason Giambi, who's been mentioned in court records as a client of a lab at the center of baseball's steroid scandal. Iverson – a 10-year Reebok endorser with a current ad featuring an image of the devil – has a record including arrests and convictions.

The Congress of Racial Equality, a civil rights group, says Reebok promotes negative messages about black men.

"50 Cent was a drug dealer and proud of it," CORE spokesman Niger Innis said. "The fact that corporations are going to reward that kind of behavior is an outrage."

While there are risks in taking on such endorsers, consumers no longer demand squeaky-clean reputations, said John Quelch, a Harvard Business School professor who served 12 years on Reebok's board beginning in 1985.

"The broader public is used to this these days, and does not generally punish the brand for associating with a few such celebrities," Quelch said.

Analysts credit Reebok's marketing shift for boosting the former No. 2 U.S. sneaker and athletics apparel maker's prospects against Nike — a competition that could become more heated now that Reebok is paired with Adidas.

Marketing has helped Reebok get some recognition among teenage male customers, a sector of the athletic footwear industry that Nike has really dominated, said John Shanley of Susquehanna Financial Group.

"They really have tried to have a very different product, and they had to do that simply because Nike is such a huge force in the marketplace," Shanley said. Nike had 36 percent of the U.S. athletic footwear market to Reebok's 12 percent in 2004, the most recent figures available, according to Sporting Goods Intelligence.

Some observers warn Reebok's shift toward a younger and more fashion-conscious demographic could alienate athletically inclined customers who value performance, Nike's traditional strength.

"You risk losing or diminishing control of your brand meaning, because these are non-sports celebrities," said Andrew Rohm, an ex-Reebok marketing employee and now an assistant business professor at Northeastern University.

Adidas will announce detailed plans in April to "sharpen the brand identities of both brands based on sports performance and lifestyle," said spokeswoman Anne Putz.

Whatever Adidas decides, it will face pressure to target a youth market with increasingly greater buying power.

"The folks that are capturing this group's attention right now are the Jay-Zs and the 50 Cents," said Jim Andrews, a vice president at marketing research firm IEG Inc. "It would be foolish for Reebok or any marketer to ignore that."

Philadelphia 76ers guard Allen Iverson is part of a new advertising blitz by Reebok to capture the younger generation of buyers.

Francona recovering from health problems

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FORT MYERS, Fla. — An excited Terry Francona saw his third baseman make an impressive start with a new team: four hits, in eight at-bats with three walks and two RBIs in just three games.

"I was like in tears," he said, and they weren't for Mike Lowell, Boston's new third baseman obtained from the Florida Marlins.

They were for his daughter Alyssa, who played as a North Carolina freshman last weekend in a tournament in Miami.

It was a joyful change in the off-season of the Red Sox manager, who lost center fielder Johnny Damon and temporarily lost general manager Theo Epstein.

He also lost his knee.

Francona had his right knee replaced nearly three months ago — the 10th operation on that knee and 19th on both knees. The surgery was done about six weeks after the Red Sox were swept in the AL division series by the Chicago White Sox and three weeks after Epstein stepped down.

Three after Epstein's departure, Damon signed with the New York Yankees. Just one month after that, Epstein returned as GM, but so far the Red Sox have tried but failed to honor trade requests from Manny Ramirez and David Wells.

Francona took it all in stride, hobbled though that stride may be.

"My knee, I work as hard as I can because I can control it," the 46-year-old Francona said Tuesday, four days before the first official workout for pitchers and catchers. "Theo is back where he started. Manny, it never really involved me. Manny's offseason is his offseason. When his season starts, I expect Manny to be a productive left fielder for us.

"I think you spend energy on things you can control and not waste energy on things you can't control."

On his first day in camp Monday, Francona rode the stationary bike for an hour, something he couldn't do before the operation. On Tuesday, he ran on the treadmill. His days of throwing batting practice may be over, he said, but the surgery was necessary.

There had been added concern because Francona suffered a pulmonary embolism in 2002, but his doctors addressed that.

"They assured me that I wouldn't die," he said. "I asked them point blank. I said, 'If I go on that table and I die ... I'll come back and haunt every one of you guys.'"

On Tuesday, he praised his doctors and said, "It was just something I had to do. I was getting so howlegged, it hurt when I walked."

Francona was hospitalized with what was identified as a virus before the third game last season at the New York Yankees. After the season, he felt "like I got run over by a truck the whole year."

His offseason priority was to get healthier and he's on his way.

He feels better that Curt Schilling and Keith Foulke also are leaving physical woes behind.

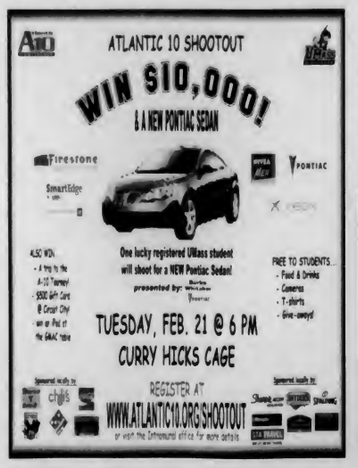
Knee problems contributed to Foulke's poor season as a closer. He underwent surgery and played catch for 13 minutes Tuesday. He was the first veteran pitcher to report.

That's "a great sign," Francona said. "I think, in his own mind, he feels like he has some work to do and something to prove."

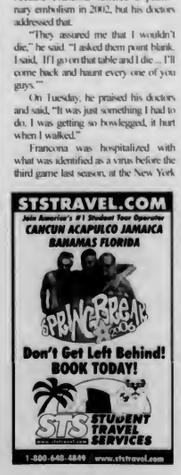
Schilling worked out in Arizona after a mediocre season in which he was hobbled by an ankle problem suffered in 2004, when Francona managed Boston to its first World Series title in 86 years.

"I trust what I understand, he's doing terrific," Francona said.

He got some more good news Tuesday when Red Sox reliever Mike Timlin was named to the 30-man U.S. roster for next month's World Baseball Classic.



"I know he'll be excited," Francona said before the roster was announced. "The honor would probably mean more to him maybe than some other people."



Timlin is patriotic and Francona hopes he doesn't get hurt by overthrowing before his arm is ready. Red Sox catcher Jason Varitek also is on the U.S. team, pitcher Lenny DiNardo will play for Italy and other Boston players are expected to participate.

"It's an awesome concept. I wish there was a perfect way to do it," Francona said. "You're going to see a lot of general managers, managers and organizations hold their breath every time their pitcher steps on the mound." His own physical condition also is important for Boston's success.

"The players deserve to have me be upbeat, positive and it's not always easy to do, especially in Boston, because it beats you down and last year I got beat down a little bit," he said. "I need to be a little more resilient and not feeling good health-wise doesn't help."

Minutemen face No. 7 Colonials

Ford happy with UMass progress

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

Before the Massachusetts men's basketball team squared off with a formidable Florida State squad on Sunday night, UMass coach Travis Ford said he was less concerned with his team actually pulling out a win than he was with it bouncing back from a demoralizing 65-44 home loss to La Salle last Wednesday.

While UMass (10-11, 5-5 Atlantic 10) ultimately came up short in the out-of-conference matchup, losing 73-63 to the Seminoles, Ford's pre-game expectations were met, as the Maroon and White played at a much higher level than in the loss to La Salle.

With the Minutemen facing an even more daunting opponent tonight at 7:30 p.m. when they travel to the nation's capital to take on No. 7 George Washington (20-1, 10-0 A-10), one might expect that Ford would once again only be looking for a solid effort out of his troops.

But with UMass tied for eighth in the bunched up A-10 standings, Ford will be looking for his team to capture a big conference win tonight.

"Were back in the conference and we need to win this game," Ford said. "We understand the challenge ahead of us. We need to be overachievers and play better than we have all year."

The Minutemen will look to build off of their solid effort against FSU, although Ford still sees room for improvement from that game.

"We wanted our team to improve and play better basketball than we did against La Salle and we did that," Ford said. "We did the things we wanted to do, but we just didn't shoot well from the perimeter [2o percent from beyond the arc].

Junior James Life scored 14 points on 2-of-7 shooting from behind the arc against the Florida State Seminoles on Sunday. The sharpshooter did not start against the Seminoles but will return to the starting lineup tonight.

"I was disappointed because we put ourselves in a position to win, but we made some mental mistakes."

UMass will be looking to put an end to its season-long struggles on the road, although GW does not figure to be the most likely candidate for the Minutemen to get their first road victory since Jan. 7 at Duquesne. The Colonials haven't lost at home this season, and are riding a 12-game winning streak at the Smith Center.

See MEN'S HOOP on page 11

Records don't tell the full story

This is the time of year that we browse through the encyclopedia of sports clichés and use them to give a broad analysis of what college basketball will be like for the next month or two.

Rob Greenfield

But clichés are clichés for a reason – more often than not they are true.

And that's why records and standings alone don't do justice to the fans curious to know which teams are for real and which teams have the heart of a Manning.

There are no undefeated teams left in Division 1 college basketball and there are only three teams with one loss, including the Atlantic 10's George Washington Colonials, the team your UMass Minutemen are facing tonight.

That's right, the team that annually hangs around the Top 25 and lost to Steve Lappas and company at home last season after a Rashaun Freeman buzzer beater – has breached the Top-10 for the first time in 50 years.

The Colonials stride into the No. 7 spot with swagger and in solitude. They have separated themselves from the rest of the mediocre A-10 teams, which continue to fight for second place while the Colonials march into the national spotlight.

GW, Red Auerbach's alma mater, looks like the real thing, but they haven't made the final step to becoming an elite team yet. Here are the toughest teams GW has played so far: Maryland (78-70 victory on the road . . . OK, not bad), No. 21 North Carolina State (20-point loss), Saint Louis, Charlotte and Xavier.

The schedule isn't impressive. Yes, the Colonials are dominant in the Atlantic 10 and it is very difficult to win consistently in the dog days of the season – even against

UM after sixth straight A-10 title

The Massachusetts men's swimming and diving team is going after its sixth consecutive Atlantic 10 Championship this week when it travels to Buffalo, N.Y.

From Thursday through Sunday at the Flickinger Aquatics Center, the Minutemen will be gunning for an unprecedented ninth A-10 championship in the last 11 years.

"We're healthy, happy, and hungry," UMass coach Russ Yarworth said, who has earned A-10 coach of the Year six seasons in a row. "We're ready to go and we're hungry for another championship."

Last year the Maroon and White dominated the field with a total of 804 points. St. Bonaventure finished second with 652.50 points, followed by La Salle with 473 points.

The Explorers edged out UMass at the Jan. 14-15 Rhode Island Invitational by a score of 890-804. It came down to the final event when the Explorers finished first and fourth in the 400-yard relay, while the Minutemen placed second and sixth. George Washington finished third and URI was fourth.

Leading the Maroon and White are junior captains Mike Herald, Greg Chartier and Jake Hogue.

"The three captains have done a great job focusing the team. They're really going to dictate what happens," Yarworth said.

Returning champions from last year's A-10 Championships are sophomores A.J. Vezella, who won the 1000-yard freestyle in 45.99 seconds, and R.J. Rappe, who won the one-meter diving event with a score of 314.10.

"We don't look at individual results, we're looking to score the most points to win the championships," Yarworth said.

Last year the Minutemen were more consistent in team relays than any other squad as they took two gold medals, two silvers and one bronze for their lowest finish.

The Minutewomen will be seeking their second A-10 Championship in program history and their first since 2001. The woman's tournament runs from Wednesday through Saturday.

UMass finished fourth last year with 363 points, behind George Washington (427) and ahead of Xavier (350). The Lady Spiders of Richmond are going for their fifth consecutive championship.

The Minutewomen convincingly won the Rhode Island Invitational with 935 points, and GW finished third with 642 points. UMass coach Bob Newcomb said "we're shooting for third [at A-10 Championships]."

"I'm pretty happy where we are right now," Newcomb said. "I like the attitude."

The Maroon and White have no returning champions from last year, but junior Mary Jenkins won the one-meter diving event two years ago and was the top finisher for UMass last year when she took second place in both the one-meter and three-meter diving events.

"I look at our diving core and I think they're going to do very well," Newcomb said.

Freshman diver Karen Epperco has won the high-board four times and the low-board three times this season. Rounding out the strong diving squad for UMass is junior Melissa Pond and freshman Sarah Horstmann.

Senior captains Corey Tawczynski, Aimee Bourassa and Kaitlyn McDonough will be leading a young squad that include freshmen Taryn Prinut, Christa Narus and Jackie Porter.

"The biggest thing is that all year long this is what we're focusing on," Newcomb said. "I think we're right where we need to be right now."

Sophomore diver R.J. Rappe leads the Massachusetts men's diving team to its A-10 title defense this week in Buffalo, N.Y.

Gretzsky, Canadians focus on task at hand

By Alan Robinson
Associated Press

TURIN, Italy — Finally, what Canada has been waiting for: hockey.

No more talk about Wayne Gretzky's link to an alleged gambling ring. Oh, at least until he pokes his head into one of the two rinks at the Turin Olympics.

Or discussion about possible distractions for the players, who make up what may be the best Canadian Olympic team ever. They say what's going on with Gretzky has nothing to do with them winning another gold.

"The players are pretty much insulated here," Gretzky said after arriving Tuesday. "Distractions don't matter to them. They're here to play the game ... and they're ready to play."

The games start Wednesday with Canada playing Italy in what could be a 10-goal game or more. The United States, silver medalists in Salt Lake City in 2002 while Canada won its first gold in 50 years, takes on Latvia in the first of its five round-robin games in pool play.

The Olympics stir a Super Bowl-like reaction in Canada, only everybody roots for the same team. TV ratings for Canada's gold-medal win in 2002 were among the highest ever in the country. And this team, put together mostly by executive director Gretzky, is seen as the gold medal favorite.

But who could have seen this coming? A New Jersey-based gambling investigation alleges Rick Tocchet, Gretzky's top assistant coach with the Phoenix Coyotes, financed an illegal betting ring that purportedly drew $1.7 million in bets in the weeks leading to the Super Bowl.

Gretzky has not been questioned, but his wife, actress Janet Jones, is alleged to have placed bets with the group. And the timing couldn't have been worse – leading one Canadian newspaper to question if the probe was intentionally timed to hurt Canada's chances and improve the United States' in the Olympics.

The NHL only wishes Americans paid such close attention to hockey.

Canada's players are acting as if Gretzky's troubles aren't their own, since he won't be taking any shifts or leading any odd-man rushes – though, at age 45, the NHL's all-time leading scorer probably could.

"We're excited he's coming and that he'll be a part of that," team captain Joe Sakic said. "I know people are trying to bring up, 'What's going on with Wayne?' It's not an issue."

But Gretzky knows it will be if Canada doesn't repent.

"I'll get blamed," he said. "But I've been blamed for losses before. It's not going to change my life."

It will be difficult to tell if Canada is distracted against Italy, an NHL player-less team appearing only because it is the host country. If betting was allowed, Italy might be an eight-goal underdog against a team that practiced Tuesday with Sakic on its third line.

Miracle on ice? This one might be better called the mismatch on gelato.

The Americans were mostly late arrivals in Turin, with most players scheduled to get in late Tuesday night or Wednesday morning after many missed scheduled flights due to last weekend's East Coast snowstorm.

"It's not the ideal way you'd like to prepare for a game, but it's that switch – that "competitive juice" – that just turns on and you're ready to go," said John Grahame, who is expected to open in goal for the Americans.

The United States, despite relatively low expectations that caused coach Peter Laviolette to joke last week there was no reason to make the long trip, also figures to have a relatively easy game Thursday against Kazakhstan.

The best matchup of Wednesday's six games looks to be Russia against Slovakia, which has star-quality NHL forwards in Marian Hossa, Pavol Demitra, Miroslav Satan and Marek Svatos. Russia general manager Pavel Bure, who retired as a player last fall, has repeatedly denied his talented team won't be focused or in sync – a common problem for Russian teams of recent vintage.

Russia has plenty of scorers in Ilya Kovalchuk, Alexander Ovechkin and Alex Kovalev, and the Olympics mark the first major showcase for forward Evgeni Malkin, who will open on a line with Ovechkin. Malkin, the No. 2 pick in the 2004 NHL draft by Pittsburgh, played in the world junior championships for silver medalist Russia only last month.

Besides the Russia-Slovakia game, the other round-robin games Wednesday in the United States' pool matches Kazakhstan against Sweden, which will be without star forward Peter Forsberg for at least two games. He missed the Philadelphia Flyers' final eight games before the break with a groin problem.

Another Flyers forward, Michal Handzus, also may be out for Slovakia because of a right shoulder injury that occurred last weekend. Despite Handzus' injury, Slovakia forward Peter Bondra said, "I'm looking for a big surprise" against Russia.

The Czech Republic, the 1998 gold medalist during the first Olympics tournament conducted mostly with NHL players, opens against Germany. The Czechs, led by Jaromir Jagr, are seen as Canada's biggest threat in the tournament.

Finland plays Switzerland in the other opener Wednesday.

Four of the six teams in each pool advance to the quarterfinals after each team plays five round-robin games in eight days.

Canada coach Pat Quinn already has the tournament planned out, saying the Canadians will play eight games in 12 days – not might, but will.

To do that, they must play for the gold.

Ligety steals spotlight from Bode Miller

By Bob Baum
Associated Press

SESTRIERE, Italy — Young Ted Ligety gave the United States the Olympic gold medal that Bode Miller couldn't deliver Tuesday night, uncorking two dynamic slalom runs to win the men's combined and break the Americans' bad luck in Alpine skiing.

The 21-year-old skier from Park City, Utah, in his first Olympics, had a combined time of 3 minutes, 9.35 seconds for the downhill and two slalom runs. Ivica Kostelic of Croatia won the silver medal, 53-hundredths of a second behind the American at 3:09.88. Rainer Schoenfelder of Austria captured the bronze at 3:10.67.

Austrian favorite Benjamin Raich, the leader going into the final slalom run, skied off course, setting off a red-white-and-blue celebration at the finish area.

"It's incredible," Ligety said. "I can't believe it [happened] in combined because I'm not very good in downhill."

He said it would have been even better if Raich had finished.

"I would prefer to win standing up to him," Ligety said.

U.S. skiers Steven Nyman and Scott Macartney tackled Ligety, and the three teammates rolled in the snow together. They rose, and Ligety waved an American flag while he was propped on the others' shoulders.

"I'm not surprised he's on the podium," U.S. men's coach Phil McNichol said. "I'm a bit surprised he won gold."

It was only the fourth Olympic Alpine gold medal ever for U.S. men.

Ligety burst onto the world scene with two thirds and a second in this, his second World Cup season, and it seemed only a question of when, not if he would be a winner.

It couldn't have come at a better time for the frustrated Americans.

"It's a great day, especially with Bode skiing out," Macartney said. "Ted stepped up."

"You've just got to get in the starting gate and throw down whatever you've got," Ligety said.

What he had was two near-flawless slalom runs – the night's fastest at 43.84 seconds in his clinching second run and 44.06 seconds in the first, 01 slower than the best time of that leg.

On the final run, he attacked the steep part of the course at the start but gained most of his time with a sweep through the middle section, dashing between gates with a perfect aggressive rhythm.

Miller was disqualified for straddling a gate in the first run, just when he seemed to have built a commanding lead for his elusive first Olympic gold medal.

The disqualification gave the lead temporarily to Raich, who had trailed Miller by nearly a second.

The U.S. team decided not to protest.

"We looked at it enough times," said program director Jesse Hunt. "We're satisfied."

Miller was nonchalant.

"I've straddled probably more times than most people have finished the slalom," he told reporters at the bottom of the run.

Indeed, the often-reckless American failed to finish five of seven slaloms on the World Cup circuit this season.

"If it's clear, it's clear," Miller said.

That left U.S. hopes to Ligety, who was 32nd after the downhill, 3.06 seconds behind Miller, and third after the first slalom run, 86-hundredths of a second behind Raich.

"Teddy will save the day," McNichol said.

He did, and he picked up his more famous teammate in the process.

Like a cowboy riding a wild horse, Miller was a sharp contrast to the smooth, swivel-hipped style of Raich in a classic U.S.-Austrian showdown on a cloud-shrouded evening in the Italian Alps.

About three-quarters of the way through the first of two evening slalom runs – on the 42nd of 56 gates – Miller pinned a red gate with his left ski and the post popped up between his feet.

"I came down and the run felt fine," Miller said. "I had no idea I had straddled. I was in the recovery room already getting ready for the second run when I heard it on the radio and I looked at the replay."

By his own assessment, Miller was not as wild as he usually is.

"I wasn't so much conservative as just bad," he said.

Still, it might have been good enough had it not been for his mistake in the "flush," when the skier comes out of a straight line of flags and makes a sharp turn.

"It's a clear straddle," McNichol said.

The large scoreboard at the foot of the hill showed several replays after his run, but Miller's name remained atop the leaderboard for nearly a half-hour. That's when an orange asterisk went up beside his name, and seconds later "1. Bode Miller" was gone completely, replaced at the top with Raich.

Miller had seemed poised to become the first U.S. Alpine skier to win three Olympic medals. His time of 2 minutes, 23.68 seconds through the downhill and one slalom run was 97-hundredths of a second better than

Iraqi television runs ads supporting Carroll

By Hamza Hendawi
Associated Press

Jill Carroll as she appeared in the latest video from her kidnappers.

BAGHDAD — Iraq's state television has begun broadcasting ads appealing for the release of kidnapped U.S. journalist Jill Carroll, including footage of her mother and a major Sunni Arab politician describing the 28-year-old freelancer as a friend of Iraq.

Carroll, who reported from Iraq for the Boston-based Christian Science Monitor, was kidnapped Jan. 7 in Baghdad while on her way from the office of Sunni politician Adnan al-Dulaimi.

The one-minute long television appeal begins with two photographs of a smiling Carroll appearing on the screen.

"The kidnapped journalist Jill Carroll loves Iraq and she now needs your help," a male narrator says. "It's time for Jill Carroll to go home safely."

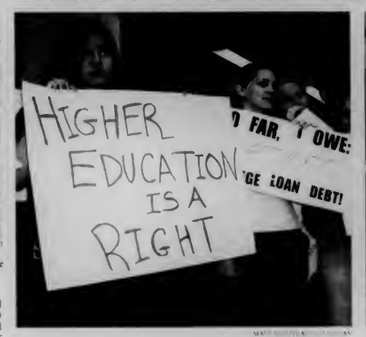
The appeal later shows archival footage of al-Dulaimi addressing a news conference.

"I appeal to those who kidnapped the American journalist Jill Carroll to release her. She is a woman who struggled for the sake of Iraq, defended Iraq and Iraqis," he said.

Mary Beth Carroll, the journalist's mother, spoke in English with an Arabic voiceover.

"I, Jill's father and sister directly appeal to Jill's kidnappers to free her, that young woman who worked hard to publicize the suffering of Iraqis," she said.

The appeal also showed scenes of a Baghdad street with local newspapers spread on a sidewalk, with some bearing Carroll's picture on their front pages. A female voice speaking with an Iraqi accent could be heard telling the kidnappers: "Close your eyes for a second and imagine that she is your sister or daughter. How would you feel?"



The spots, which were produced by Monitor staff in Iraq with assistance from CNN, began running Tuesday night, said David Cook, Washington bureau chief of the Christian Science Monitor. They were financed by donations and were being aired free of charge on state-run Iraqiya TV.

Carroll's kidnappers have set a new deadline of Feb. 26 for their demands to be met or they said they would kill her, according to the owner of a Kuwaiti TV station that aired the latest videotape of her on Friday. In that tape, she appealed for her supporters to do whatever it takes to win her release "as quickly as possible."

Two previous tapes showing Carroll were aired by Qatar-based Al-Jazeera TV on Jan. 17 and 30. Both were aired without audio. The first tape included a threat to kill Carroll within 72 hours unless all Iraqi women were released from custody.

Carroll grew up in Ann Arbor, Mich., and graduated from the University of Massachusetts. She worked as a reporting assistant for The Wall Street Journal before moving to Jordan and launching her freelance career in 2002, learning Arabic along the way.

Board of Trustees votes to raise student fees

University of Massachusetts hold signs during the Board of Trustees meeting yesterday, attempting to make the Board vote for a fee-freeze.

Several students hold up signs, showing that they are already in debt because of the price they pay for higher education, a price that may soon rise.

By Matt Bellveau
Trustee Staff

DARTMOUTH — The Board of Trustees of the University of Massachusetts yesterday approved a 3.2 percent increase in student fees.

Dozens of UMass students, staff, and faculty sat in on the meeting at UMass Dartmouth, holding signs in support of a "fee-freeze" and shackling balls and chains to their feet to represent the burden of student debt.

UMass graduate and Vice President of the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) Darren Griffin pleaded with trustees to reconsider approving the fifth increase in tuition in five years.

"We have worked hard over the last several years to find some common ground with the members of this body," said Griffin. "We have asked, we have written letters and petitions, we have lobbied, and we have tried to educate you. And still you are prepared to raise fees again today."

"The members of the board should make no mistake: your decisions over the last several years to place a greater financial burden on the backs of the students who are pursuing their educations at UMass have very real consequences," said Griffin. "For far too many of us, the increased fees represent either what is, in effect, a large cut to our income or the prospect of assuming thousands of dollars more in debt."

UMass President Jack Wilson sympathized with the students' concerns, but said not raising or freezing fees will cause more problems in the future.

"I know students are graduating with debt; I graduated with debt. But freezing fees, something we did in the early '90s, left us vulnerable for the next generation. I think preventing this increase would undermine the progress of all five campuses," said Wilson.

Wilson blamed the lessening of Massachusetts funding towards education for the increases.

"Massachusetts no longer funds public universities as it once did," said Wilson. "Chancellor John Lombardi and Vice-Chancellor Michael Gargano have worked wonders to maintain UMass's high level of education during this fiscal crisis."

The motion was presented by UMass Student Trustee Valerie Louis, who suggested that the administration look for different options in raising the necessary funds.

"The University's debt burden shouldn't fall on students; it should fall on the legislature to lobby and raise more money," said Louis.

Students gave personalized valentines to every trustee that included dozens of signed petitions from UMass students stating their support for the fee-freeze.

"I know students are graduating with debt; I graduated with debt. But freezing fees, something we did in the early '90s, left us vulnerable for the next generation. I think preventing this increase would undermine the progress of all five campuses," said Wilson.

"Do you realize what happens if we don't increase these fees?" asked Trustee Edward Kingshaw. "We will have to eliminate programs. How does this help improve the educational environment?"

"I've sat on this board for eight years and I've never voted to increase tuition," said Boyle. "In our guidelines it says we cannot raise tuition, we can only recommend it. So we call them 'fees.' It's all the same."

The fee increase motion was approved by a vote of 14-3.

Wilson remained optimistic concerning UMass's progress despite the recent tuition increases, claiming that the University saw a 17 percent increase in applications.

"When I took the job three years ago, I said if we can keep tuition under the costs of living, we would essentially be 'freezing-fees,'" said Wilson. "Our increases have been lower than the rate of inflation three years in a row."

Louis said she wasn't surprised by the trustees' approval of the fee increase, but was excited that the motion received three votes in support.

"I still hold hope for the future," said Louis. "I'm elated that I was able to bring this topic up to the trustees and had it discussed and debated."

SGA rejects motion to allot funds for student organizations

By Matt Bellveau
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association Senate of the University of Massachusetts rejected a motion that would have provided $35,000 to be divided among Registered Student Organization for food and travel.

In the closest Senate vote of the year, the motion received 19 supporting votes, falling two votes shy of the necessary 21.

"This is something that every RSO wants; it's a service we should provide," said Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee Sean Robinson.

The one-year pilot program would have set aside $15,000 for food costs, with the maximum award for a RSO being $500, and $20,000 for travel costs, with the maximum award for a RSO being $750.

"There is no bylaw that says we can't fund RSO food and travel costs. We have 2.2 million to use along with a $700,000 budget on top of that. All we're asking for is $35,000 for a one-year program," said Robinson.

Senators debated whether or not RSOs could be trusted to use the given funds for the reasons they were given.

"We're not giving them cash," said Robinson. "We give them a type of credit card, and can track exactly how much is being used and on what."

SGA President Pavel Payano was angered and claimed that Robinson hadn't created the motion in the proper procedure. Payano urged senators to table the motion so senators would have more time to examine and alter certain aspects of the motion.

"I'm not saying if this is right

Survey finds little resistance to surveillance and spying

By Alejandra Del Real
The Daily Free Press (U-Wire)

BOSTON — Most people don't mind being surveyed via tracking devices and nearly one in three adults would not hesitate spying on their loved ones to protect them, according to a recent survey conducted by Boston University graduate students.

The survey, which polled 523 adults online across the country, revealed that the top reasons Americans consider valid for using personal surveillance are health conditions and locating a loved one in an emergency. Adults said they were also willing to use surveillance to monitor children with an illness or mental disability and to track young runaways.

BU Mass Communications Professor James McQuivey said he decided to have his graduate students conduct the survey, upon the introduction of new technology for person-to-person surveillance, such as the new GTX sneakers that contain a GPS tracking device.

The survey, conducted in fall 2005, was part of an annual project McQuivey assigns College of Communication graduate students taking his communication research course.

"All of the students taking the class designed, conducted and analyzed the survey under professor McQuivey's supervision," COM alum Erica Hepp said. "We conducted background research on person-to-person surveillance, designed the questions and analyzed the data."

McQuivey said he decided to focus this year's study on surveillance because of the recent attention on government and company surveillance. According to McQuivey, person-to-person surveillance is an "uncharted area," and he wanted to find out what the impact of the technology would be.

"There is no restriction on surveying each other," he said, "and when the technology hits, either a bomb will go off or it will be no big deal, so I thought we had to get out there and find out if it is going to be a problem."

The findings surprised the students, who showed that Americans are willing to engage in surveillance if it concerns their loved ones, especially for safety or health reasons.

When it came to surveying adults, the majority of Americans agreed the government should play a role in restricting the devices, mostly because they said they believe adults should not be monitored without their permission.

McQuivey said the fact that 66 percent of Americans said they would be comfortable being tracked by their loved ones in case of an emergency meant various things to the group.

"something that people are afraid of, it's who controls it and whether they know about it."

Departments combine skills to study the nature of bat bites

By Teresa Franco
Collegian Correspondent

University of Massachusetts's engineering and biology departments are combining their skills and knowledge to research the biomechanics of biting and the evolution of skull shape diversity in bats.

In order to gain new information for the study, the two different fields of science decided to combine their tactics and learn from each other in the process.

Biologist Elizabeth Dumont head of the interdisciplinary team has been studying how the evolution of the bat's skull relates to the ways they eat. She has done research in various parts of the world, including New Guinea, Africa and Central America. She chose bats to study because of their streamlined build. Dumont compares the animals to airplanes, saying they can't be overly bulky and still fly efficiently. This makes them an easy species to study.

During the last two years, Dumont has been working with mechanical engineer Ian Grosse using a method called Finite Element Analysis to get an even closer look at how exactly feeding impacts the structure of the skull of a bat.

Government Association Pavel Payano was encouraged with the results from the meeting.

"Last year we wouldn't have received any supporting votes, this year we had three," said Payano.

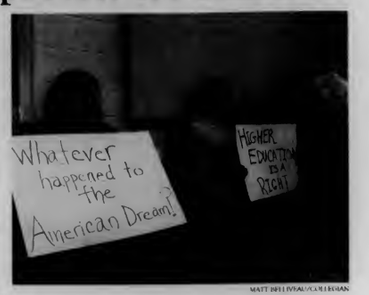
Among the six New England flagship campuses, UMass Amherst ranks fourth this year in total costs for in-state students.

Over the past ten years, the average annual student charges, including tuition and fees, at public universities nationally averaged 9.5 percent.

By comparison, student charges increases at UMass during the past 10 years averaged 7.5 percent. That period coincides with several years of deep cuts in the state's annual appropriation for the University.

Student charges increases at UMass campuses for next academic year will range from $273 to $317 for in-state students.

According to a report by the American Association of State Colleges and Universities News, New York State University has proposed a 13 percent increase for next year, the University of Virginia is discussing a 10 percent increase over each of the next five years, the University of Maryland is proposing a 5.8 percent increase for next fall and the University of Oregon expects to approve an increase of between five and seven percent.



The trustees also tabled a motion that concerned the building a student body that more adequately represents the population of youths graduating from Massachusetts's high schools in racial and socially economic terms.

SGA leaders have pointed to statistics showing that certain segments of the population, particularly African-Americans and Latinos and Latinas, are underrepresented at the UMass flagship campus.

According to statistics compiled by the Department of Education, African-Americans and Latinos make up 7.3 percent of the entering class at UMass, although they made up over 17 percent of the 12th grade population in Massachusetts in the 2004-05 academic year.

"We admit we have a lot of work to do: Massachusetts demographics are constantly changing," said Wilson. "We are working towards holding a culmination of staff, faculty, and students that represents the Massachusetts racial demographics."

Wilson announced plans to create a sub-committee to discuss the topic and return with their recommendations.

SGA members argue about proper use of RSO funds or wrong," said Payano towards Robinson. "If you're going to do it, do it right. You have not talked to the Secretary of Finance. You have not talked to the head of RSOs. I found out you were planing this by overhearing you talk about it."

"I overlooked telling people about this. But I didn't think it was a big deal. It's just something we should do," said Robinson.

Director of finance and business Alan Brainerd seemed to support the motion.

"I think the funds are perfectly appropriate with the right kind of oversight, subject to university policies and procedures. Historically, the bylaws don't say you can't do this," said Brianerd. "I don't see why you couldn't consider this kind of request. You won't be able to fund all of it, but some."

SGA Senator Jen Kennedy said the motion would have increased the enrollment of students in RSOs.

"People are turned away from joining RSOs because they know they have to pay out of pocket. Our supplying $750 shows we're trying to fund them," said Kennedy. "We're not giving a free trip, and if it fails, it's $35,000 out of our 2.2 million [dollar] budget that just didn't work out."

Chairman of the Finance Committee Peter Barros debated that giving RSOs extra funds may weaken their determination to raise their own funds though fundraising and gaining revenue.

Associate Speaker Maxine Dube agreed that helping RSOs was right, but shared Barros' concern with the motivation of RSOs to raise funds.

"No one questions the validity of why RSOs want this money, we question the consequences," said Dube. "Fundraising is vital; it's what makes you strive for what's best for your RSO. Revenue comes with effort.

"I hope this never comes up again. We are a public university state whose tuition is constantly going up. Our foundation is shaky, we need to focus on the present or we won't have any RSOs in the future," said Dube.

"We're going to have coffee and donuts at our next meeting but we can't pay for RSOs to have a pizza party'" asked Robinson.

Study of bats brings two fields together

There is, however, a predicament that a biologist doing this kind of study alone would run into. The bones of bats are small and delicate, which makes it hard to study how they respond to forces generated by biting and chewing. Biology itself does not provide the tools required to perform such an intricate task. This the main reason Dumont turned to the engineering science department for help.

The method used by the combined force of biology and engineering takes in depth looks at the skull by building a 3D model of the bone from micro CT scans. Using the same technology as a medical CT scanner, pictures are taken of the bat slice by slice. The resulting image shows the exact location of the bats' bones. The slices are then put back together with a computer to create a detailed 3D model. This model allows the researchers to examine how forces are transmitted through the skull when bats bite down as they chew. This kind of technology provides information about how the bats' chewing habits relate to the process of evolution. Images and further information on the study can be found on its Web site at www.biomesh.org.

The researchers learned a large amount not only in the scientific sense, but also on a communication level, says Dumont. Biology and engineering have extremely different sets of vocabulary, and in the beginning it was hard to translate facts to each other.

"It was like we [the biologists and engineers] were speaking two different languages," Dumont said.

As the project progressed, both fields of science began to understand one another and were able to apply and mold it into one subject. Dumont believes that any field of study, not just the sciences, can gain insight from this example. Any two unrelated subjects, with time and effort can have a huge positive impact on one another and together can make something completely new.

In Tuesday's edition of Massachusetts Daily Collegian, it was incorrectly stated that Adams Plumbing and Heating is based in New York. In reality, it is a Massachusetts-based business. Additionally, in yesterday's edition of the paper, the UMass Police Log had an incorrect headline which referred to a substance abuse problem in Baker dorm. Actually, the incidednt referred to took place in Brooks dorm.

Four children killed during bombing in Iraq

By Paul Garwood
Associated Press

BAGHDAD — A bomb exploded in Baghdad on Wednesday, killing three girls and a boy on their way to school as violence targeted all walks of life in the capital. Nearly 20 people were killed in car bombings and shootings elsewhere.

With the bloodshed showing no sign of abating, politicians held protracted talks over formation of a new government, which the U.S. hopes will help stamp out the insurgency by encouraging Sunni Arabs and Shiites to work together.

But new images aired on Australia's Special Broadcasting Service of Iraqi prisoners being abused and sexually humiliated at Abu Ghraib prison in 2003 threatened to fan the violence.

"Bringing up these issues is only going to add to heat to an already fragile situation in Iraq and they don't help anybody at all," said Labeed Abbawi, an adviser to the foreign minister. "What Iraq needs at this moment is calm, but these images, which have already been dealt with and seen people punished, will only worsen the violent atmosphere."

The children killed in the bombing the bustling Fadel neighborhood were between 10 and 14 years old and included two daughters and a son of Jamil Mohammed, a vendor in a nearby public market.

"We are poor people who have nothing to do with politics," the father sobbed at the police station. "We only wanted to live a decent life. What is the guilt of my dead children? They were only heading to school. Now I am left with only two children. This is a disaster for my family."

The bomb exploded near a camera shop that also sells alcohol, police Lt. Ali Mittab said. The target was unclear, but Islamic extremists often attack stores that sell alcohol or DVDs deemed pornographic.

Many of the attacks Wednesday appeared directed at Iraqi police, which the United States hopes can take over some security responsibilities so foreign troops can withdraw. But civilians were caught in the carnage, too.

A parked car bomb hit a police patrol in northern Baghdad, killing four officers and wounding two civilians, police said. And gunmen firing from two cars killed a police captain and his driver, also a policeman, in southwestern Baghdad.

Another car bomb killed two civilians near Baghdad's University of Technology and wounded five other people, including three policemen.

Gunmen elsewhere shot and killed a blacksmith at his Sadiyah workshop, a man who opened his door in the southern Dora neighborhood and a civilian driving in the western Ghazaliyah district.

An ex-member of Saddam Hussein's former ruling Baath Party was killed in a drive-by shooting in the northern city of Mosul.

Police also found a man who had been shot in the head left in his car in Taji, north of Baghdad. The bodies of five other men were found shot in the head and dumped near a Shiite neighborhood of western Baghdad, apparently victims of sectarian killings.

U.S. soldiers, meanwhile, killed five insurgents within 24 hours, including one in a shootout south of Baghdad early Wednesday, the military said.

Cheney accepts blame for hunting accident

By Nedra Pickler
Associated Press

White House Secretary Scott McClellan faces tough questioning during his daily press briefing regarding the hunting accident in which Vicepresident Dick Cheney accidently shot a fellow hunter. Cheney recently accepted full blame for the accident.

WASHINGTON — Vice President Dick Cheney on Wednesday accepted full blame for shooting a fellow hunter and defended his decision to not publicly disclose the accident until the following day. He called it "one of the worst days of my life."

"I'm the guy who pulled the trigger that fired the round that hit Harry," Cheney told Fox News Channel in his first public comments since the shooting Saturday in south Texas.

Cheney described seeing 78-year-old Harry Whittington fall to the ground after he pulled the trigger while aiming at a covey of quail.

"The image of him falling is something I'll never ever be able to get out of my mind," Cheney said. "I fired, and there's Harry falling. It was, I'd have to say, one of the worst days of my life at that moment."

Cheney has been under intense political pressure to speak out about the shooting incident, which has become a public relations embarrassment and potential political liability for the White House. Until Wednesday, Cheney had refused to comment on why he withheld information about the shooting, which prolonged the controversy and made him the butt of jokes.

Cheney was soft-spoken and somber during the interviews with Fox's Brit Hume.

"You can talk about all of the other conditions that exist at the time but that's the bottom line and — it was not Harry's fault," he said. "You can't blame anybody else. I'm the guy who pulled the trigger and shot my friend."

Cheney said he had had a beer at lunch that day, but nobody was drinking when they went back out to hunt several hours later.

Texas officials said the shooting was an accident, and no charges have been brought against the vice president.

A report that the Texas Parks and Wildlife Department issued Monday said Whittington was retrieving a downed bird and stepped out of the hunting line he was sharing with Cheney.

"Another covey was flushed and Cheney swung on a bird and fired, striking Whittington in the face, neck and chest at approximately 30 yards," the report said.

"I ran over to him," Cheney said. "He was laying there on his back, obviously, bleeding. You could see where the shot struck him."

He said he has no idea if he hit a bird because he was focused on Whittington.

"I said, 'Harry, I had no idea you were there.' He didn't respond," Cheney said.

Whittington was reported doing well at a Texas hospital Wednesday, a day after doctors said that a pellet entered his heart and he had what they called "a mild heart attack."

Hospital officials said the Texan, though still listed in intensive care, had a normal heart rhythm again Wednesday afternoon and was sitting up in a chair, eating and planning to do some legal work in his room.

Cheney has been roundly criticized for failing to tell the public about the accident until the next day. He said he thought it made sense to let the owner of the ranch where it happened reveal the accident on the local newspaper's Web site Sunday morning.

"I thought that was the right call," Cheney said. "I still do."

Cheney said he agreed that ranch owner Katharine Armstrong should make the story public, because she was an eyewitness, because she grew up on the ranch and because she is "an acknowledged expert in all of this" as a past head of the Texas Parks and Wildlife Department. He also agreed with her decision to choose the local newspaper as the way to get the news out.

"I thought that made good sense because you can get as accurate a story as possible from somebody who knew and understood hunting and then it would immediately go up to the wires and be posted on the Web site, which is the way it went out and I thought that was the right call," Cheney said.

"What do you think now?" he was asked.

"I still do," Cheney responded. "The accuracy was enormously important. I had no press person with me."

Armstrong told reporters that Whittington made a mistake by not announcing himself as he returned to the hunting line after breaking off to retrieve a downed bird. But Cheney, an avid and longtime hunter, said Whittington was not to blame.

Through hospital officials, Whittington has declined to comment.

"He still kind of wonders what all the hoopla is about," said Peter Hanko, administrator of Christus Spohn Hospital Corpus Christi-Memorial.

Standardized testing may be required in universities

By Meagan Stetner
Daily Pennsylvanian (U. Penn)

PHILADELPHIA — Students who thought their standardized testing careers ended with the SAT may be in for a rude awakening. The commission on the Future of Higher Education — led by Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings — is considering standardized testing for colleges and universities.

The commission has not yet come out with a specific proposal, however Commission members said they believe such tests would hold schools more accountable for education, provide more information for potential students, and demonstrate the returns for tuition and federal funding, according to a public Jan. 24 memo from committee chairman Charles Miller to the task force's other members.

"There is gathering momentum for measuring through testing what students learn or what skills they acquire in college beyond a traditional certificate or degree," he wrote, adding that tests seem to be becoming more effective in measuring how students are learning.

However, National Association of Independent Colleges and Universities spokesman Tony Pals called uniform testing "a very dangerous idea" with many unforeseen consequences.

It may, for instance, pose a threat to institutional and curricular diversity between schools and programs "that has made American higher education the best in the world," Pals said. He added that testing could necessitate a standard curriculum across higher education.

However, Graduate School of Education professor Rebecca Maynard said such testing would not likely cause substantial curricular changes. Rather, she said, one of its greatest drawbacks may simply be "the nuisance value of having to take the test."

Wharton junior Sissi Chen said that standardized tests could distract students from coursework and entrance exams for graduate school.

Bush pushes for math and science teachers

By Emily Martin
Daily Bruin (UCLA)

LOS ANGELES — As part of his agenda for the 2007 budget, President Bush plans to bring an influx of math and science professionals into elementary school classrooms across the country. Bush proposed two programs as part of his Academic Competitiveness Initiative: The Adjunct Teachers Corps and the Advanced Placement Incentive Program, which would train a total of 100,000 new teachers qualified to instruct upper-level math and science classes by the year 2015.

Designed to increase the level of expertise in the teaching field, the Adjunct Teachers Corps would encourage math and science professionals to consider careers in teaching, and the Advanced Placement Incentive Program would train current teachers to teach advanced math and science classes, if the measure is passed by Congress.

The Adjunct Teachers Corps program would spend $25 million to increase the number of math and science teachers by training science, math and engineering professionals to teach elementary school classes as adjunct teachers. The proposal suggests that this could be accomplished through partnerships between school districts and private sponsors.

As part of the program, adjunct teachers would be allowed to teach without credentials, which Bush administration officials say sometimes discourages some professionals from teaching.

According to the 2003 Trends in International Mathematics and Science Survey done by the National Research Council, less than 8 percent of elementary school students are taught math and science by teachers with majors or specializations in that field.

The president's budget allotted a combined $147 million for the two-part plan to increase the amount of students being instructed by professionally trained teachers.

"We need to encourage children to take more math and science, and to make sure those courses are rigorous enough to compete with other nations," Bush said in his State of the Union address on Jan. 31.

The goal of the Adjunct Teachers Corps is to create 30,000 new teachers by drawing from what the Bush administration calls "untapped resources" — current and retiring math and science professionals with college degrees.

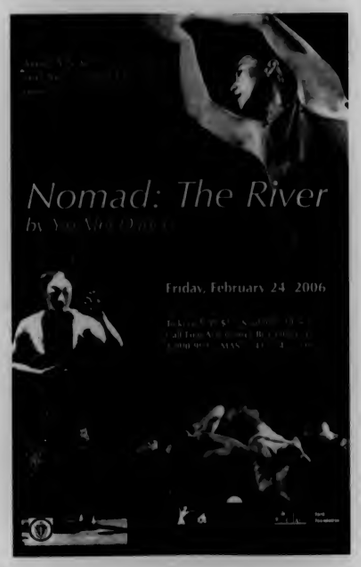
But some education professionals say teachers without a credential, no matter how qualified in their subject, may not be able to properly communicate lessons to students.

"It takes more than professional status in a field to make a teacher," said Fred Glass, a spokesman for the California Federation of Teachers, a statewide organization that represents faculty and other school employees.

Glass said though a credential is no guarantee of a good teacher, knowing teaching methods and child psychology is better than not having any significant preparation for teaching.

Bush's proposal cites some evidence that shows new professionals may be more likely to consider going into teaching if "teacher certification recognizes the training and experience they possess in their field."

Even without the requirement of a credential, Glass said the plan will not be effective because it is unlikely that math and science professionals, especially new graduates, will go into teaching.



"Chances are that if (math and science graduates) aren't already considering teaching they'll still turn to employment opportunities that offer them more money," Glass said.

Jules Guerra, program coordinator for the University of California at Los Angeles Teachers Education Program, said she has seen dwindling numbers of math and science applicants in recent years, which indicates to her that there is a decline in interest in teaching.

We only had 12 applicants for science subject matter, and though the numbers were slightly higher for math, it represents the challenge the program faces," Guerra said.

Guerra attributed this decrease to the salary differences between jobs in teaching and employment in other fields, saying the pay discourages students from going into education.

MA murder suspect returns to state

By Denise Lavoie
Associated Press

LONDON — A British man accused of killing his wife and infant daughter in their suburban Boston home arrived Wednesday in the United States to face murder charges, according to a spokesman for the Massachusetts Port Authority.

A plane carrying Neil Entwistle, 27, landed briefly around 3 p.m. at Bangor International Airport in Maine, said Massport's Phil Orlandella. The plane then continued on toward Hanscom Field, an Air Force base and civilian air field northwest of Boston. His exact arrival time there was unknown.

Entwistle is scheduled to be arraigned at 2 p.m. Thursday in Framingham District Court on two counts of first-degree murder in the shooting deaths of his wife, Rachel, 27, and 9-month-old daughter Lillian on Jan. 20.

Entwistle was handed over the custody of U.S. Marshals at Gatwick Airport at 9:25 a.m. EST, London's Metropolitan Police said.

"We understand that he is returning to the U.S. on a private flight," a police statement said.

Home Secretary Charles Clarke signed an order Friday afternoon authorizing the return of Entwistle to face charges in Massachusetts, following an extradition request from U.S. authorities.

Boston defense attorney Elliot M. Weinstein was appointed Wednesday to represent Entwistle in the Massachusetts courts. He was assigned to the case by the Committee for Public Counsel Services, a state agency that pairs private attorneys with indigent defendants.

"His family is unable to afford counsel in Massachusetts," said CPCS chief counsel William Leahy.

Weinstein told The Associated Press that he was concerned that the case had generated such media interest here and abroad that it would be difficult for Entwistle to get a fair trial.

"I have not met my client, but this is the impression that I get because of the media blitz created," he said.

Entwistle flew to London the day after the shootings. He agreed to voluntarily return to the U.S. during a court appearance last Thursday. His lawyers said he wished to avoid any "additional distress" to the family of his late wife or to his own parents.

Search warrant affidavits filed by law enforcement officials in the U.S. describe how Rachel Entwistle's relatives called police after the couple organized a dinner party, but did not answer their door when guests arrived.

Officers discovered the bodies on Jan. 22, and found Entwistle's white BMW sport utility vehicle parked at Logan International Airport, in Boston.

In the documents, officers describe Entwistle as a secretive man who was sinking deep into debt. The documents say that in the days before the killings, he trolled the Internet looking for sexual partners and information on ways to kill people and commit suicide.

Middlesex District Attorney Martha Coakley said authorities believe Entwistle used his father-in-law's .22-caliber handgun in the shootings, and may have planned to turn the weapon on himself because of his mounting debts.

Instead of committing suicide, he drove the gun back to his father-in-law's house, then fled to his native England, authorities allege.

Hopkinton Police Chief Tom Irvin has said he expects Entwistle to be booked at the Hopkinton police station and held there until his arraignment on Thursday.

Rachel Entwistle's mother and stepfather, Priscilla and Joseph Matteruzzo, are planning to attend the arraignment, said Joseph Flaherty, a family spokesman.

During the arraignment, Entwistle will be asked to enter a plea, and prosecutors will make an argument for bail. In murder cases, prosecutors almost always ask for the defendant to be held without bail, and Entwistle's lawyer has the right to ask for a hearing on that matter.

Entwistle met Rachel Souza, a Holy Cross student from Kingston, in 1999 at Britain's University of York, in northern England, where she was spending the year abroad.

An open letter to Johnny Damon

Matt Brochu

Two months have passed since you sold your soul to the devil for a chance to make it big in the Big Apple. Two months since you surrendered and voluntarily became a hostage behind enemy lines, while giving the Red Sox a steaming turd of a Christmas gift — a Big Dig-sized hole in the Fenway outfield. Two months since you messed with your own teleprompter and went Ron Burgundy on Red Sox Nation, skipping town with a smile and a wave as if to say, "F off, Boston." I think I speak for all of us when I say this: Go (expletive) yourself.

I know what you're thinking. I must not have seen the full-page ad you took out in last Wednesday's Boston Globe. Oh, I saw it all right, and I'll recite it from memory. "Many thanks to the great fans of New England and the city of Boston. It was a privilege and an honor." Needless to say, your full page did nothing more than soak up massive amounts of puppy pee on kitchen floors all over New England last week. Don't get me wrong. Although a bit overused in world of sports, the ad was a nice gesture. And if Red Sox Nation didn't know you as well as we do, we may have actually bought into it.

But Johnny Damon the everyday player and all-around nice guy hasn't been heard from since the 2004 World Series. Instead, a different guy showed up at spring training last year. He was no longer just a baseball player; he was an author, an MTV "Cribs" alum, a walking Puma billboard, and a wannabe celebrity. We embraced Johnny the Marketing Machine because, well, we're Sox fans, and if the hair, the beard, and the "Tony Danza Show" appearances were part of the lead-off-hitting package, then we would gladly take the good with the bad (and the ugly).

So we cheered for you, hoping that the old Johnny was in there somewhere, but we saw through you then, just as we see through your "thank you" ad now. You left the Sox for the same reason I left my job as "plant waterer" at Squire Farm in 1999 — for the money. If you were truly being honest, your note would have looked something like this: "I know you guys must really hate me. I took the money because my wife has an obsession with cute shoes, and let's face it, so do I. I realize I completely deserve to be booed, but could you go easy on me? Seriously, being booed by the city that made my career could end up scarring me for life."

Either way, it's too little too late, Johnny, and when your Bombers come to town on May 1, you will assume your rightful position as Public Enemy #18. Be ready for the signs. "What Would Johnny Damon Do? Turn the other checkbook." Be ready for the t-shirts. "Johnny throws like my homegirl." Be ready for the jeers. "Co-co's bet-ter (clap, clap, clap-clap-clap.) The entire city of Boston will boo, your so-called "great fans of New England" will boo, and the Southwest towers will reverberate with the sounds of objects bouncing off TV screens.

That being said, making the transition to a rival team is never easy. But Adam Banks' move from the Hawks to the District 5 Mighty Ducks in 1992 will look like a cakewalk compared to the year that lies ahead, a formality that you've even acknowledged yourself. "I know I won't be accepted by the fans if I don't play well," you've said. Talk about an understatement. I've spoken with several Yankees fans recently, and they believe their lineup is so unbelievably good that it can withstand an off-year from Johnny Damon with little consequence. Translation? Sure, they'd like to see you succeed, but they would derive just as much pleasure from watching you fall flat on your face. Center field can be a pretty lonely place when 60,000 fans have turned on you, especially with "Weekend at Bernie" Williams patiently waiting to step in if you so much as turn a 52 million-dollar ankle.

Center field can be a pretty lonely place when 60,000 fans have turned on you, especially with "Weekend at Bernie" Williams patiently waiting to step in if you so much as turn a 52 million-dollar ankle.

In the end, at least we've both learned something from this. For the fans, you confirmed what we've always suspected, that this Sox-Yankees rivalry doesn't mean as much to the players as it does to us. On the other side of things, you've learned that if groups of fans were ex-girlfriends, then Red Sox Nation would collectively be Lorena Bobbitt. And while we're being honest, there's something we need to tell you about your wife. To put it lightly ... we can't stand her. She looks like someone "Nip/Tuck's" Christian Troy would bring home from a bar, and we blame her for your move to New York just as much as we blame you. Just thought you should know.

Remember two days ago?

Jennifer Lane

Do you have a love hangover? It's been two days since Valentine's Day. Everything at CVS, Target and Hallmark is now marked down 50 percent. You've exchanged gifts, eaten chocolate or sulked with girlfriends while watching "When Harry Met Sally." The card management teams are rushing to put up their St. Patrick's Day displays. Valentine's Day is over —how do you feel?

Valentine's Day has been very over-commercialized in the past few years. Where has all of the actual love gone? Does the story of Saint Valentine, the Greek gods and goddesses of love, cupid, and all of the other symbols really have no real meaning anymore? No one knows where these tales or symbols originated. Do you know why the colors red, pink and white are related to Valentine's Day? Red symbolizes passion, while white symbolizes purity. Pink is a meeting point between these two colors.

As a child I remember being forced to give valentines to the smelly kid I didn't like, the boy I had a crush on, my best friend, worst enemy and teacher. Kids still have to give valentines to these kids, they have all day Valentine's Day parties (even in preschool) and they give teddy bears to their 13-year-old significant others.

In the morning, some parents give a present and a package of candy to their child before shipping them off to school for some more sugar. Why wasn't there ever a lesson to go with all the cards and candy? I found out about Saint Valentine and the first valentine after being curious about where this holiday originated from and doing some of my own research a few years ago.

So, how did the number of Valentine's Day cards sent reach one billion? Well, with a lack for a real understanding of Valentine's Day that's how. Large advertisements, guilt and competition also contributed to the loss of this holiday's meaning. It's no wonder that the consumers industry turns a very large profit on Feb. 14. Not only have Valentine's Day cards become more popular, but the gifts are becoming more extravagant as well. I often hear, and sometimes say: "Look at what my boyfriend/girlfriend bought me for such and such a holiday."

I wouldn't doubt if many of you are in the state of a love hangover. Not only have you eaten too much chocolate, seen too many cards and sent or received flowers, but you've done all this with much more emphasis than on the other 364 days of the year. Valentine's Day is special; it's the day where you're supposed to be more in love than any other day of the year.

I've got more beautiful things than many girls could ever dream of from my boyfriend and I show them off because I want him and everyone else to know how much I appreciate it. Sometimes, however, this makes your significant other feel two things at the same time: 1) excited that they got the right gift and, 2) fearful of what they're going to have to get for the next holiday. When did the simple idea of a picture or a homemade gift become too difficult? Women and girls all over love simple gifts just as much as the elaborate and expensive ones. With simple gifts and less commercialization, we might once again find the actual meaning of Valentine's Day.

I wouldn't doubt if many of you are in the state of a love hangover. Not only have you eaten too much chocolate, seen too many cards and sent or received flowers, but you've done all this with much more emphasis than on the other 364 days of the year. Valentine's Day is special; it's the day where you're supposed to be more in love than any other day of the year.

Two years ago I had a Valentine's Day party for my friends. We cooked a big Italian dinner for us eight girls and the one boy we allowed to pretend. It was one of the best Valentine's Days I've ever had. We had chocolate, food, friends, no gifts to worry about, and no boyfriends/girlfriends to disappoint or excite. We had each other and we were a great family.

Last year I spent the day with my boyfriend and we fell deeper in love with each passing minute. But I didn't love him more just because it was Valentine's Day. Valentine's Day brings many headaches and heavy hearts. Sadness and disappointment are almost as prevalent as happiness and love. You don't need just one holiday to remind you how to love. Even if pink is my favorite color and I still send a valentine to the smelly kid next door, I don't have a love hangover because I'm drunk with love 365 days of the year.

UMASS THEY ARE A-CHANGIN'

I would like to commend your efforts in putting together what is quite a satisfactory college newspaper. I've been around the country and seen some real trash journalism and thought you should know you're doing good work.

My issue has to do with the outcry against perceived high tuition and fees at the University of Massachusetts with regard to the impact on expected debt upon graduation. As someone who graduated from college in 1988, I imagine that I'm considered "one of them" with regard to this discussion, but I thought I might offer an opinion on three points.

First, I would say that it is laudable for so many students to exercise their free speech rights and weigh in on this issue. Certainly, if students and parents rolled over at every tuition and fee hike, it would only send a message that UMass-Amherst is undercharging for services. The only thing I'd offer here is that personal attacks, such as on government and university officials, take away from the credibility of one's complaint. Those that can enter the arena of ideas and argue the merits of their point without name-calling and diatribes are the ones who truly change people's minds.

When people cast dispersions at the governor or the chancellor, it turns people off and makes an otherwise compelling point seem like sophomoric banter.

Second, I would offer another perspective on a presumption that the chancellor doesn't care about students and wants to create an expensive math and science institution. I am a member the Faculty Senate and have been moved by the chancellor's desire to elevate UMass-Amherst from a "bottom-half" research institution to a "top-half" research institution. As with all great endeavors, this is not an easy or rapid process, and involves an improvement of national and international reputation.

As someone who has traveled the country and many parts of the world over, the words "I went to UMass" are rarely heard in places beyond New England. In order to change this limited reputation, the chancellor knows he must maintain a high-caliber faculty in order to produce a high-caliber graduate. This costs money. We all know that money comes from students (parents), government subsidy and donations. The Massachusetts State Government is working on bringing more federal and state dollars to its state colleges and universities; this won't happen overnight.

Finally, I would like to offer another perspective on the average debt of a UMass graduate (17,500 dollars, an amount that was protested on campus this past fall).

Those of you reading this should understand that this may seem like a lot of money from your perspective as a student, but it is not a lot of money. Entry salaries for the worst paying jobs out of college are all in the neighborhood of 30,000 dollars per year. My personal experience is that of an out-of-state student with a partial scholarship to a school in the Midwest in the mid-1980s. I still had to take out student loans to pay the balance of my bills because my parents couldn't afford to contribute to my education.

My debt after college was over $22,000 in 1988. With a starting salary of 19,000 dollars in 1989, I paid off that debt in less than eight years. My guess is that 17,500 dollars is less than 50 percent of the debt I had after college in 1988 after adjustments for inflation. If you need money and opportunity for college or a master's degree, there are many means to that end. If you are willing to serve, the military can help by paying all of your tuition and fees. Student loans and federal aid are also abundantly available and underutilized. Don't conclude that higher education is a right. "Privilege" may be an incorrect term for it, but most people don't go to college.

Pursuit of higher education requires an individual desire and demonstrated commitment to academic excellence of some form. For those who think a dwindling number of Massachusetts residents attending UMass is a bad thing, I'd ask why. Having a nearly exclusive Massachusetts demographic at UMass may be part of the problem of UMass's limited reputation. The discussion about need for diversity in this university has been well documented. What demographic does Massachusetts produce? Largely white male and female Anglo-Americans. Your diversity is going to come from New York, Texas, California, Florida and international places.

Reputations are earned through excellence. Excellence in academic achievement of the students, the faculty and achievement of the institution as a whole is what makes an institution great. I graduated from Purdue, which had almost 5,000 international students and nearly one-third out-of-state students in a student body of roughly 38,000. The admissions requirements for in-state students are also less than that of out-of-state students.

That's diversity, but until an institution gains a significant national and international reputation, many international students and out-of-state students will not attend that school. This is what the chancellor is after and I hope I can in some small way assist in this university's striving for the greatness it desires and in some cases already so richly deserves. The commissioning class of 2006 in your Army ROTC program is comprised of 50 percent out-of-state students. We have benefited from this approach to diversity.

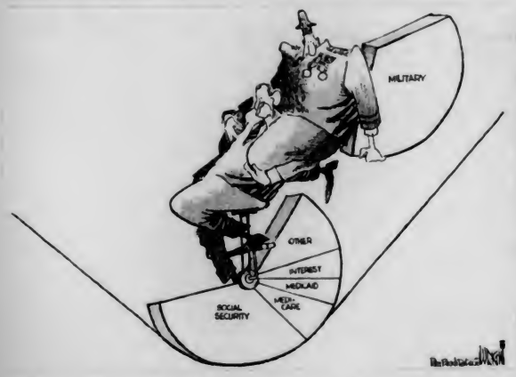
RESPONSE TO 'ALL BUNCHED UP AT BOYDEN'



I was rather appalled to read Jonathan Brandt's assessment of the problem of overcrowding at Boyden gym, especially in regard to the men's crew team's involvement in the problem. Brandt is clearly outraged by how overcrowded the space is, and he is aware of how the men's crew team's eviction from Totman has contributed to the crowd. Yet, he offers a wildly unfair assessment of the situation.

Brandt is placing blame on our coach for not having the athletic director keep the varsity weight room open later or rescheduling our sessions. This is an extremely uninformed conclusion, since the men's crew team does not receive time in the athletic department's varsity weight room. Of course, this has never bothered us, as we've been happily plodding along in our own facilities (a boiler room in Totman) for years, undisturbed. As of late, the space has been deemed unfit for occupation by the state building inspector. Therefore, the men's crew team has been forced to stuff around $5,000 worth of our own equipment (including over 2,000 lbs of weights) into a small closet. To date we have not been offered a fair space, or any space at all, to relocate our equipment to that would allow us to use it again.

Don't get me wrong, we [the crew team] does feel guilty for clogging up the public gym in Boyden, especially since the official occupancy of the room is 110 people and I've seen the attendant's tally as high as 164. We had posted a sign in apology outside of the gym, but we were reprimanded for posting it. I agree with Brandt in his statement that we should not be there at all, but we just have very limited options. With crew being a sport based on leg strength, our team (which is an RSO of fee paying students, despite Brandt's claims) is simply using the only available public gym on campus that has squat racks.

We are not bitter with the Campus Recreation department because they are making an honest effort to help. However, with the athletic director's refusal to let us use the varsity weight room, the condemned condition of our current facilities, and the lack of options being presented to us, the situation is bleak. We are stuck in a bureaucratic bind and to blame us or our coach for the problem is unreasonable.

The destabilization of democracy

Ian Logan

The New York Times reported on Feb. 14 that "[the] United States and Israel are discussing ways to destabilize the Palestinian government so that newly elected Hamas officials will fail and elections will be called again ..."

For those unaware, Hamas won just over half of the seats in the recent Palestinian parliamentary elections. Unhappy with the results, the United States and Israel are working to destabilize the new government largely by withholding money. They hope that by isolating the new government they will produce a shortage of funds for the Palestinian Authority, creating an even more desperate situation in the lives of the Palestinian people.

Moreover, they hope that the Palestinians will not see the destabilization as a result of U.S.-Israeli external pressure but as a result of Hamas' inability to govern. In this destabilization, they are trying to force Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian president, to call new elections. The idea is that after Abbas calls new elections, the Palestinians will make the "correct" choice and vote for the increasingly pro-Western and submissive Fatah party.

This plan however, is bound to fail in reaching its goal of new election results. Its inevitable failure lies in its reliance on a hopeless wish shared by the United States and Israel that the Palestinian people will attribute the grimness of their daily life not to the United States and Israeli policies of withholding money; but rather to a failure on the part of Hamas to govern. This wish is unreasonable because its realization depends on a radical change in how the Palestinian people understand the U.S.-Israeli policy towards them.

The Palestinian people would have to abandon the belief that the United States and Israel are their oppressors, thus reversing an idea that appears so self-evident to the Palestinian people that it is not even open to discussion. After renouncing this belief, the Palestinian people would have to replace it with a new understanding of the situation: that it is Hamas who is oppressing them and therefore new officials (i.e. Fatah party members) are needed.

The Palestinian people would have to abandon the belief that the United States and Israel are their oppressors, thus reversing an idea which appears so self-evident to the Palestinian people that it is not even open to discussion.

This is a pure fantasy on the part of the United States and Israel. Their policy of destabilizing the new government, thus further destabilizing Palestinian life, will not produce hatred of Hamas but will, on the contrary, produce more support for Hamas and specifically more support for Hamas-sponsored military actions, such as suicide bombings in Israel. The destabilization plan will produce more desperation in Palestinian life than already exists, resulting in a renewed appeal of martyrdom.

Having said this, the approach that the United States and Israel are taking towards the new Palestinian government is an extremely unfortunate one. Hamas officials are willing to talk under the condition that both parties be considered equal, yet in place of starting a dialogue with Hamas officials, the United States and Israeli governments have instead given Hamas a set of rules to follow.

By refusing to recognize the results of a free and fair election, regardless of its outcome, the Bush administration has failed to follow its supposed policy of supporting democracy in the Middle East. The United States and Israel are instead employing an oppressive and undemocratic plan which negatively affects, albeit in different ways, both the Israeli and Palestinian people.

By Barry Koltnow
The Orange County Register

LOS ANGELES — Neil Young is freaked out, man.

The iconic singer is so freaked out that he has to put on sunglasses to shield his eyes for fear of revealing too much.

"You're scaring the hell out of me with these questions," he says in the Los Angeles studios of National Public Radio. Young sat down with the Orange County Register after an hour of answering considerably less-scary questions on a radio talk show.

The scary question is question concerned itself with looking in the mirror. The exact question was: "Do you like what you see in the mirror each morning?"

The motivation behind the question was simply to ask the singer to evaluate his career and whether he was satisfied with the musical path he chose. Nothing deeper than that.

But maybe because he is old, maybe because he survived a potentially fatal brain aneurysm last year, maybe because of his father's death, maybe because he recently released an unusually personal and introspective album called "Prairie Wind," and just maybe because of an [illegible] revealing Jonathan Demme-directed performance film called "Heart of Gold," the question threw him for a loop and opened up a stream of reflexive thought.

"I'm not particularly happy with what I see in the mirror," he said with no attempt at self-censorship. "When I wake up, I feel like I'm 24 years old, and I've got a lot of things to do. I've got to get a cool car and go for a ride. All those kinds of things. Then I look in the mirror and I say, 'Oh, now I remember. I'm married, I have a family, we have this school that my wife started, there are battles still to be fought and I don't know if I'm making a big enough difference.' That's what I see in the mirror."

As for his body of work, the original question, Young dismisses it with a wave of his hand and a flippant remark. "Some of it I'm more proud of than others."

Would you expect any less complexity from this man? After all, this is Neil Young, whose music over the last four decades has pretty much defined a generation and a genre. He is the rock singer who mixed musical styles (his latest CD is pure country), and he is not afraid to speak his mind, on politics or any other subject.

In fact, this interview took place a day before last Wednesday's Grammys. Although he knew he was an underdog in his category (he didn't win), there was a slim chance that he could win, and that presented a typical Neil Young dilemma.

"If by some weird chance I win a Grammy, am I going to go off on the war in Iraq, or am I going to thank all the producers? That's the kind of the thing I'm thinking right now. This is a moment in time when I have to decide if what I say in front of a lot of people can make a huge difference. Should I say something trite, or should I say something meaningful."

The smart money would have been on the latter. Young has rarely opted for the trite. This is the same man who wrote the Kent State ode "Ohio," the attack on corporate sponsorship "This Note's for You" and the condemnation of racism in "Southern Man."

"A long time ago, maybe in my early 20s, I decided that I was going to try to sing about things that really mattered to me. Sure, sometimes I'm totally self-engrossed in my own trip, but at other times, I am concerned about what's going on in the world. There are just so many injustices, so many inaccuracies and so many unbalances. I feel a need to illuminate them."

Although he performed with a string of bands in his native Canada (does the Squires ring a bell?), he didn't settle down to California and hooked [illegible] and Buffalo Springfield that [illegible] what was to come.

When the band broke up in 1969, Young began his solo career, releasing two albums ("Neil Young" and "Everybody Knows This Is Nowhere") before joining Stills, David Crosby and Graham Nash in creating a new band. Apparently stuck for a name, they called themselves Crosby, Stills, Nash and Young.

Although he continued to work occasionally with Crosby, Stills and Nash, Young's solo career shifted into a higher gear. With the 1972 release of "Harvest," Young ascended to rock-god status. Although sales of subsequent albums have ebbed and flowed, Young's integrity and respect for him in the music world have remained intact. Whether he was playing rock 'n' roll, country or folk, people paid attention. In 1995, he was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame.

He also has been closely associated with a number of benefit shows, including Live Aid and Farm Aid, as well as the annual benefits for the Bridge School in Northern California near the ranch he shares with his wife, Pegi.

He gets unexpectedly defensive when the benefits are mentioned.

"I'm not about doing benefits for everybody," he said. "I don't feel I was put here, or that I owe it to the world, to do benefits the rest of my life. I didn't start out to save the world and solve all these problems. I did one benefit, and then I did another and

The Sopranos to embark on its sixth season of 'family drama'

By Morgan-Ann Rousseau
Collegian Staff

What is so appealing about gun-toting New Jersey mobsters eating Ziti al-Forno, cheating on and yelling at their wives? Maybe it's the timeless legacy of "The Godfather" that has viewers pledging their loyalty, or perhaps it is simply that the mafia is just the quintessential bad-ass "in-crowd" that everyone regrets to admire. Either way, awards and ratings prove that The Sopranos is one series that fans can't seem to tughet-about.

The sixth season of creator David Chase's dramatic series is scheduled to come out March 12. The season will have 12 episodes picking up where it left off in season five. HBO also announced that in addition to the upcoming sixth season, they will produce an additional eight bonus episodes to debut in January 2007.

The Sopranos has been winning awards for its outstanding dramatic achievements since 1999. At first glance, viewers might be turned off by the show's candid vulgarity: violence, sex and general obnoxiousness on the part of some characters. But after sitting through two or three episodes, the show's charisma becomes clearly defined by its artistic cinematography, sensational acting and the dramatic events that manage to suspend our pseudo law-abiding reality for one hour at a time.

Three-time Emmy winner James Gandolfini stars as Tony Soprano in the hit HBO show. Edie Falco has also earned three Emmys by playing Tony's wife Carmela. The show portrays the not-so-humble family and business sides of Tony's mob boss life, which is plagued with tragedy and turmoil. Suprising?

Tony and Carmella's two kids are Meadow (Jamie-Lynn DiScala) and Anthony, Jr. (Robert Iler). Though the family lives in a good part of New Jersey, Tony's professional life takes place in the bad parts of town. Dealing with bookies, street men, under men, dealers, racketeers and tricky gangsters is no joke. The show conveys the darkest sides of such a lifestyle, which is bleak to begin with. Even considering the glitz of three thousand-dollar Italian end-table statues and the glamour of stolen Hummers at first-rate discount prices — to most shrinks, murder isn't what would be considered a head-healthy business.

So our bulky head-of-the-family man Tony Soprano takes Prozac for his problems and talks about his stressful life with a psychiatrist, Jennifer Melfi (played by Lorraine Bracco).

As episodes pass, Gandolfini's alpha-male dominance helps to clarify his role as leading man — one that men want to model and women hate to admit turns them on.

Taken out of context, Gandolfini doesn't do much to impress. Balding, overweight (unusually chubby-fingered) middle-aged men, well — society has an abundance of that. But Tony Soprano's powerful position combined with his wealth glamorizes the man. Not to mention he's got a steel set of (meat) balls.

Michael Imperioli plays Tony's nephew, Christopher Moltisanti, and Dominic Chianese plays Tony's Uncle Junior. Whether husband and wife or boss and captain, the relationships between each character are full of mistrust and disloyalty.

An enticing part of The Sopranos is that the characters are consistent, right down to minuscule details. The heavy nasal breathing that occurs each time Tony eats, or the glossy crimson polish of each gangster's wife's nails — these stylistic aspects add a distinctive touch to the show.

Even the tacky clothes they showcase add to the authenticity of the personas. When Tony isn't wearing his loud short-sleeved shirts, he's doused in more formal gangster attire, like a black suit and heavy overcoat. Of course his crew defines themselves with polyester pants, running suits, tight knit shirts, and loud silk shirts and slacks. Award-winning costume designer Juliet Polcsa ventured to strip clubs in New Jersey to get inspiration for the clothing.

Hopefully the new season of The Sopranos will continue to showcase the dramatic and disturbing content that adds to the show's ability to intrigue us. To desensitize and mesmerize audiences, then keep them coming back for more. This bona fide American tragedy is an exceptional interpretation of media-glamorized mafia that has fascinated society since the early 20th century.

The cast of HBO's Award winning series The Sopranos is led by James Gandolfini, who plays Tony Soprano the boss of a New Jersey organized crime family.

Michael Imperioli stars opposite James Gandolfini as Tony Sopranos' nephew Chrisopher in the hit series 'The Sopranos.'

Repackaged Python's let each member take his best shot

By Ed Bark
The Dallas Morning News

PASADENA, Calif. — Let's be parochial here.

"Monty Python's Flying Circus," which first assaulted British sensibilities in 1969, made its American TV debut not in New York, not in Chicago, not in Los Angeles but in Dallas on KERA-TV. It was a very good year. 1974. Troupe member Eric Idle remembers it as well as can be expected.

"It was extraordinary," he says during a recent session with TV critics. "I mean, for us it was just an amazement that people were watching it in Dallas of all places and were loving it. And then it spread, you know, went around the PBS network."

Nudge, nudge, wink, wink, "Monty Python" is still being spread thick. The reigning Tony Award winner as Broadway's best musical is Monty Python's "Spamalot," which opened last year. DVD collections also continue to proliferate, even though the five surviving Pythons (Graham Chapman died in 1989) haven't worked together on stage or film since 1983's "Monty Python's The Meaning of Life."

"We've discovered that the less we do, the more money we make," says Idle, 62.

The latest evidence of this is PBS' three-week presentation of "Monty Python's Personal Best." It premieres Wednesday night with an hour apiece from Idle and the late Chapman, whose selections were made by consensus. John Cleese and Terry Gilliam's hours are on March 1, with Michael Palin and Terry Jones closing the deal on March 8.

"There was a definite pecking order. Cleese got first to go, right?" Idle asks producer John Goldstone, who agrees. "And then I got in second ... I don't know how it happened after that."

Goldstone, who had to deal with all the dueling egos, says it "became complicated" by the time Jones' turn came.

"He wanted a whole lot of sketches that everybody had already chosen. So we had to negotiate. But everybody chose 'Fish Latin.' And it's in everybody's program."

The sketches have "been edited to conform to broadcast standards," it says in a disclaimer preceding Idle's hour. "The naughty version is on home video."

The early Pythons were heavy on cross-dressing and effeminate riffs that would flunk some of today's rigid political correctness tests. Idle's "Lumberjack Song," last performed with his mates at the Hollywood Bowl in 1982, is a rather curious and dated choice to end his "Personal Best" hour. Part of its big finish goes like this:

"I cut down trees, I skip and jump.
I like to press wild flowers.
I put on women's clothing
And hang around in bars."

Groan. Holding up far better is the "Silly Olympics." Competitions include the "Steeplechase for People Who Think They're Chickens" and a "Marathon for Incontinents" whose 44 competitors all have "the most superbly weak bladders." Then again, "The 1,500 meters for the Deaf" doesn't sound very funny anymore, and isn't.

Idle says the Pythons won't ever reunite or collaborate on new material, "not even for ready money."

"We hate each other," he says. "There's so much animosity. We're all over 60. I'm sorry to say this, but comedy is really a young man's game. It's sort of about what you had to say when you were fresh and young. I'm perfectly happy to get drunk with the rest of them ... but I think it should go no further. We've earned that, I think."

Still, it's nice being recognized as a comedy pathfinder whose influence spread to these shores and led, indirectly at least, to "Saturday Night Live."

"I love being an older comic now," Idle says. "You're part of a league. It's great. It's like being an old soccer player or an old baseball player. You're in the Hall of Fame, and it's nice. But you're no longer that person in the limelight, on the spot, doing that thing."

Redford to try his luck with TV, after much success in films

By David Bianculli
New York Daily News

When it comes to the future of live TV dramas, there are two very unlikely but formidable champions. One is Batman, and the other is the Sundance Kid.

Or, at least, the passionate, powerful, live-TV-loving actors who played those characters in the movies: George Clooney and Robert Redford.

Clooney's passion for what we now call the Golden Age of Television, in both its dramatic and journalistic achievements, is no surprise. His salute to the legendary CBS reporter Edward R. Murrow in his film "Good Night, and Good Luck," was the best movie yet made about television in the 1950s, and the most impressively faithful to content of the actual news programs re-enacted in the movie.

Clooney also was behind the 2000 live TV remake of the 1964 movie "Fail-Safe," and plans to make a CBS remake of another film, Paddy Chayefsky's brilliant TV satire "Network."

Originally announced as a live production, CBS executives now describe it as a "hybrid," incorporating taped and live segments.

No matter. Add to that his live "ER" episode, and Clooney, as both actor and producer, is embracing live TV these days more than just about anybody. But he's just about to have some competition, or, if they end up working together, an equally maverick ally.

I recently asked Robert Redford whether his early experiences in live TV would inspire him to present live dramas on his Sundance Channel, and his surprising answer was that he was not only receptive, but in the active planning stages.

"I did the last 'Playhouse 90' that way ever done," Redford said, referring to "In the Presence of Mine Enemies," the 1960 episode that closed out the five-year CBS series. "And that was thrilling because that was an anthology of the best literature you could find with the best talent: directing, writing. And it went out after that, Rod Serling along with it.

"So I always felt bad that a certain part of television went away, the anthology and more literate things, the O. Henry stuff."

Redford's remedy is to contact actors and directors, once he develops enough financial support, and offer them the opportunity to star in or direct literary properties that are long-time personal favorites.

"Why don't we plan to take artists like myself, I would do it in a flash, and do short stories, and put them on as originals on the channel?" Redford asked.

"Every artist has a short story," he added. "I know I have two of John Steinbeck's that are dear to me."

Like a TV version of "Network," it's a wonderful idea.

Robert Redford has starred in several films including 'The Horse Whisperer' and 'Indecent Proposal', but now intends to take his talent to the small screen.

Young's 'Heart of Gold' is beating strong with Demme's new film

another. It just happened."

Although a Rock and Roll Hall of Famer, Young said his career is cyclical, and that he already was headed back in a country direction when he was engulfed in a medical crisis. He started writing at a furious pace. An operation was needed to correct the problem, but Young said he wasn't sure he would survive the procedure so he rushed his new country songs into a studio.

Sure, there was a sense of mortality in the songwriting process, but even without the health scare, I think the same things were inside me," Young said. "It's possible that it (the medical condition) might have coaxed them out a little faster.

"All I know is that I was living in the moment. I was going day to day."

Manwhile, filmmaker Jonathan Demme (Oscar winner for "The Silence of the Lambs," but also known for his landmark Talking Heads concert film "Stop Making Sense") was looking for something to do.

"It had been a year since I finished 'The Manchurian Candidate,' and I was itching to make a film. But I wasn't interested in getting involved in a big Hollywood movie with a story. I just wanted to shoot something," he said.

The director said Young had approached him previously to film another project, but Demme was busy on "The Manchurian Candidate." Although he hadn't heard about Young's plan to record a new album, Demme gave the singer a call.

"I know it sounds crazy, but I just picked up the phone and said, 'I think I'll call Neil Young.' It was perfect timing because he was just going into the studio."

Young, who is no stranger to the film process ("Journey Through the Past," "Rust Never Sleeps" and his most recent project, "Greendale"), said he jumped at the chance to work with Demme.

"It's another hash house on the road to success," the singer said with a big laugh. "I had a bunch of songs I believed in, and Jonathan is a great filmmaker. It was a natural progression to make the film. The more cinematic my life becomes, the more I need to involve film in the process.

"Besides, every once in a while, it's a good thing to document what you've done."

In August 2005, Demme's film crew took over the historic Ryman Auditorium in Nashville to film Young and his band over a two-night period.

"We didn't photograph a stop on his concert tour," the filmmaker said. "We staged a concert in order to photograph it. There's a key distinction; this was a staged event. I turned the Ryman into a movie set and invited the audience. This was a movie, and not just a concert."

Young performs 10 songs from his new album and a handful of classic hits, including "Old Man," "The Needle and the Damage Done" and the title song.

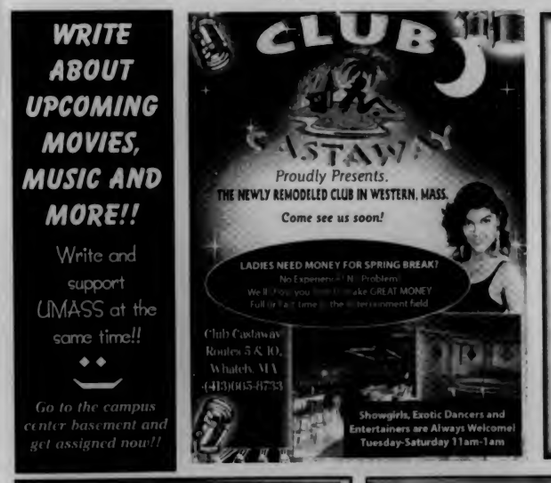
Multi-cultural music jazzes up racial awareness at UMass

By Allie Roth
Collegian Staff

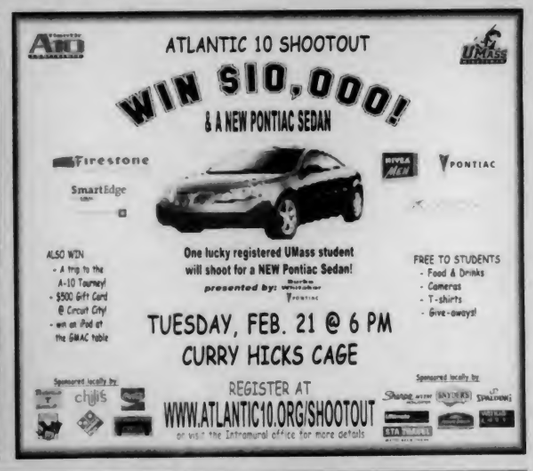
The Afro-Semitic Experience, a 6-piece jazz ensemble specializing in Jewish and African Diasporas, performed last night in the Student Union Ballroom at 7:30 p.m.

Historically, both Jewish and African American cultures maintained profound musical heritages. In addition, many believe a common tie exists between both groups due to their parallel historical record — being held in slavery and living in diasporas. The Afro-Semitic Experience takes these similarities and puts them into a single musical and multicultural "experience." By drawing influence from both Jewish and African American traditional music, they create a unique fusion with a goal: to promote a meaningful message urging for tolerant and peaceful relations between Jewish people and African-Americans.

The Afro-Semitic Experience was founded in 1999 by Jewish-American bassist David Chevan and African-American pianist Warren Byrd, who were, at that time, part of New Haven-based jazz group Jazzology. The two wanted to make a declaration against racism and Anti-Semitism by presenting a positive message about Black-Jewish relations and incorporating their rich heritages. To get their message out, they have performed in The New Haven Advocate's Battle of the Bands (winning second place twice), the Brooklyn Academy of Music, The New York Noise Festival, and the International Festival of Arts and Ideas. In addition, they have been known to play weddings, parties, and bar-mitzvahs — anything to pass on the message of racial unity.

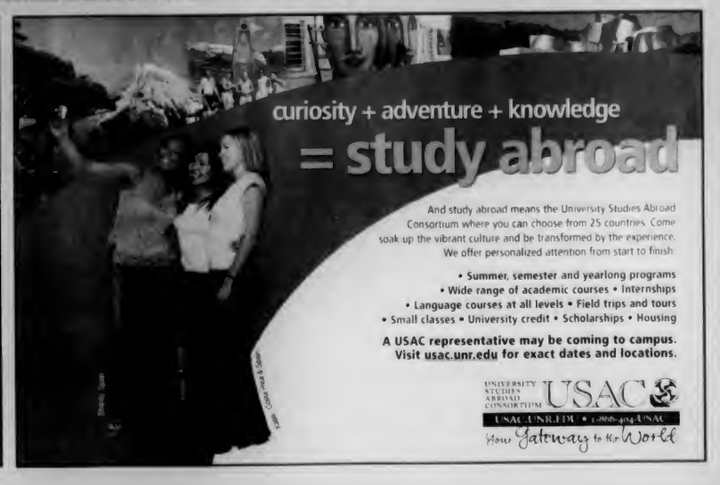


The group brings out feelings of togetherness by taking cues from many different schools of music, including gospel, Eastern European klezmer, traditional Jewish nigunim, African American spirituals, swing, and blues. When all of these musical types are thrown into a melting pot, the outcome is a new sound of blended music — the result that Chevan and Bryd hoped for. The music challenges feelings of tension and distrust that often occur between Blacks and Jews because it links people together in a way that nothing else can.



In a recent performance review, "The Valley Advocate" described their style as "... Jewish wedding, revival meeting and Charles Mingus all at once ... This is multiculturalism with its hair down."

The Afro-Semitic Experience performance is in conjunction with the celebration of Black History Month in February. It is sponsored by the UMass Amherst Office of Jewish Affairs and Hillel House. In addition, such organizations as the Multicultural Students Services, Black History Month Committee, WMUA 91.1 FM, The Center for Student Development, Student Affairs and Campus Life, and the Hillels of Smith and Amherst College have taken part by co-sponsoring this event.



A group of six jazz musicians called The Afro-Semetic Experience showcased a collaboration of African-American and Jewish cultured music at UMass Amherst last night.

While Life and Thomas racked up most of the points, it was junior Stephane Lasme who kept the Minutemen in the game. Despite battling foul trouble, Lasme scored 11 points, pulled down nine boards and blocked four shots.

"He was a warrior," Ford said. "He really battled."

Lasme was forced to pick up the slack down low for UMass as his frontcourt mate, junior Rashaun Freeman, struggled again. Freeman scored just four points in 18 minutes, and was benched for long stretches last night by Ford. Last night's showing followed a three point output in the loss to Florida State.

The Minutemen seemed poised for the upset early, as they held a 12-11 lead midway through the first half, but George Washington responded with an 11-0 run. UMass battled back to draw within four at 30-26, but GW finished the half on a 9-2 run to take an 11-point lead into the locker room.

The Minutemen shot their way back into it the second half as Viggiano added all 11 of his points after the break and Life added 19 points, with the pair combining to hit six 3-pointers in the second half.

Junior guard Brandon Thomas had 13 points in last night's 69-66 loss to No. 7 George Washington.

Morrison leading Zags to the top

Morrison and his teammates. After becoming everybody's Cinderella with trips to the Elite Eight in 1999 and the Sweet 16 in 2000 and 2001, Gonzaga has failed to get past the second round each of the past three seasons.

Thanks to Morrison's off-season work, the Zags have an equalizer. Morrison's first two years were productive thanks to his ability to score on mid-range jumpers. He spent the summer working on his 3-point shot and moving without the ball.

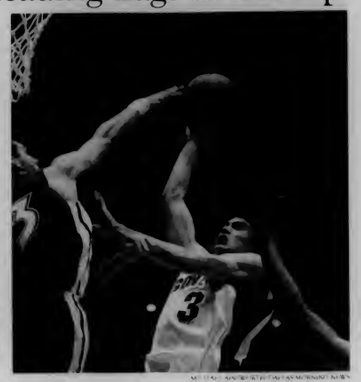
Morrison is shooting 44.5 percent (53-of-119) from behind the line after making 31.1 percent of his 3-pointers last season.

"This team's got an X factor, a wild card," Few said. "When you've got a player like Adam, you can play with and beat any team in the country as long as you've got good players around him. And we do.

"His mental toughness is top of the line, 10 out of 10. He's a great competitor, ultra competitive. That will bode well down the stretch for us. I don't think the moment ever gets too big for him."

Morrison was outstanding in the Maui Classic, averaging 28.7 points and seven rebounds in three games. The Zags lost to Connecticut, 65-63, in the championship game, but they proved they could play with the nation's best.

Morrison had 34 points in an 83-72 loss at Memphis.



"We will never play a player like that again," the Tigers' Shawne Williams said. "He is the best player in the nation, for real."

Morrison brushes off compliments the way he ignores the taunts leveled at him during road games.

"He gets a lot of grief, he's the target every place we go," Few said. "It starts out pretty loud, and at the end there's a lot of respect for him. You need to let the sleeping dog lie. He likes it and responds to it really well."

Most of the grief is directed at Morrison's over-the-ears hairstyle and his moustache. Despite what constitutes a bad "look" nowadays, Morrison has no intention of getting trimmed to give opposing fans less ammunition.

"I hear a little bit of it," he said. "The best thing is to not show any reaction. It doesn't really bother me. Yeah, it inspires me a little bit, but the best thing is to just zone it out and play."

Adam Morrison has lifted Gonzaga to the No. 5 ranking in the country. Morrison's 26.5 points per game average leads the nation.

— took advantage.

Dressed in road whites, the Latvians moved the puck from side to side high in the United States zone. Tribuncovs finally slid a shot through the slot, past heavy traffic and under Grahame to tie it.

That sent the Latvian fans into a frenzy as they rose en masse behind each goal. They were still standing 40 seconds later when their team took the lead.

In the early going it was Irbe, the former Carolina Hurricanes goalie, who looked shaky. The U.S. took a 1-0 lead on a rising wrist shot by Gionta, then added another goal on a Conroy shot from a bad angle that snuck under Irbe's bent arm.

Youkilis to get his shot this year

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FORT MYERS, Fla. — Kevin Youkilis will be 27 by opening day, not ancient for a major leaguer but hardly young for a first-time regular.

Every player's developmental timeline is different; Alex Rodriguez hit 300 homers before turning 27. Youkilis has eight homers despite being one of Boston's top prospects for several years. This season, he should get his first chance to start most games and make up for lost time.

"It's a great dream that I've dreamed of the past couple years," he said. "I can't wait to get out there to show that, hopefully, I'm deserving of the role that they're going to give me."

Drafted by Boston in 2001 after four years at the University of Cincinnati, Youkilis came up as a third baseman but saw action at first base last year. With Kevin Millar gone to Baltimore as a free agent, Youkilis arrived at spring training as his probable replacement with J.T. Snow available as a defensive specialist or for part-time duty.

"Starter" may now be a better description of Youkilis than "Greek God of Walks," the label given him by Oakland general manager Billy Beane in the book, "Moneyball."

"I guess I'm in a trivial pursuit question," Youkilis said. "It's really weird."

He's learned to live with the nickname, even though Greek fans who tell them they're proud of his heritage are disappointed when he tells them he's really Romanian.

"It was great in the beginning. I got a lot of notoriety about it in Double-A. Now it's getting to the point where it's past that time," Youkilis said. "It's a time where whenever anyone writes something about me, it's, 'oh, he has a great on-base percentage.' Well, in order to have a good on-base percentage you've got to hit, too."

Youkilis arrived at training camp on Tuesday, more than a week before the first full-squad workout next Thursday. Mike Lowell takes over at third after his trade from Florida, so homegrown prospect Youkilis moves to first.

"You can't fill Kevin's shoes. He's one of the best clubhouse guys," Youkilis said. "Most people know there's not too many players you can associate my type of game with. I have a different stance than most people."

He got a taste of the everyday rhythm of the majors when third baseman Bill Mueller was injured in May 2004. Youkilis started 30 games during that stretch with a .284 batting average and an impressive .397 on-base percentage.

With a healthy Mueller back at third last season and Millar and John Olerud playing first, Youkilis had just 79 at bats after getting 208 — and a World Series ring — in 2004. Still, Youkilis hit .278 with a .400 OBP.

Since the Red Sox drafted him, he has been popular in trade discussions. But while they parted with top prospects Hanley Ramirez and Kelly Shoppach this past offseason, they guarded Youkilis.

"We think he's ready to assume some responsibility and be a good player in the major leagues," Boston manager Terry Francona said. And maybe shed his nickname.

"If I have a good season and walk a lot, it probably never will go away," he said. "It's not a bad thing."

In 2003, Youkilis led the Eastern League in OBP (.487) with 86 walks and just 40 strikeouts. He also spent most of the summer on base, reaching safely in 71 straight games from May 19 to Aug. 4 at Double-A Portland and Triple-A Pawtucket.

Bloom fails to medal on slopes improving on the technical side of making his way through the moguls. Turns count for half a skier's score and Dawson thought he could make himself stand out by going at them more aggressively — carving is the term — on his way down the steep, slippery hill.

It made a big enough impression to earn him the bronze, the first and only medal for U.S. men or women in their two days on the moguls course.

Travis Mayer, the silver medalist in 2002, finished seventh and announced his retirement, while teammate Travis Cabral came in ninth.

Hegge-Smith won for the fourth time in the last five competitions, the only exception being a second-place finish in the Czech Republic earlier this month. His score of 26.77 was 0.15 points ahead of Ronkainen, who was one of the best in the world earlier in the decade but had been struggling this season.

Hegge-Smith flew higher and was more graceful than anyone on his airs — his skis parallel on the 720-degree, off-axis spin that essentially won it for him on the final jump of the final run of the day.

"I just knew I did what I wanted to do and it was a good run," he said. "There wasn't any room for mistakes so I made sure to not have any. It was one of my better runs ever."

While he and the other medalists will move onto the next ski event, Bloom has a different agenda. It includes heading back to the States and trying to get into some semblance of football shape before the workouts in Indy.

With six touchdowns of 75 yards or more during his two-year college career at Colorado, he figures to get at least a look. Still, at 5-foot-9, 175 pounds, he's small by NFL standards and he'll have to be at his best during the next few months.

He wasn't Wednesday, which left him looking ahead almost before he caught his breath at the end of the run.

"It's great to have that right now — something that's such a big challenge right ahead of me," Bloom said.

Jeremy Bloom's skiing career likely came to an end yesterday after he failed to medal in the moguls event. Bloom will now look to a potential NFL career.

OSU improperly fired O'Brien

By Erica Ryan
Associated Press

COLUMBUS, Ohio — A judge ruled Wednesday that Ohio State improperly fired basketball coach Jim O'Brien in 2004 after university officials learned he had loaned money to a recruit.

O'Brien broke his contract by giving the $6,000 loan, but the error was not serious enough to warrant firing, Ohio Court of Claims Judge Joseph T. Clark said, finding in O'Brien's favor in the coach's lawsuit against the university.

"Because plaintiff's failure of performance was not material, defendant did not have cause for termination," the judge wrote.

He said the university violated the contract by firing O'Brien without compensation.

O'Brien sued the university for $3.5 million in lost wages and benefits after he was fired in June 2004. With interest and other damages, he could receive nearly $9.5 million. Damages will be determined after another hearing.

The coach, who led Ohio State to the Final Four in 1999, had argued that the personal loan to Aleksandar Radojevic, a 7-foot-3 prospect from Serbia, was not a violation because he knew Radojevic already had forfeited his amateur status by playing professionally.

He said he gave the money to Radojevic's family in late 1998 or early 1999 because the player's father had recently died and the family needed money for a funeral.

Radojevic never played for the Buckeyes, and O'Brien said he didn't tell university officials because it was a moot point.

In his lawsuit, O'Brien contended he was fired before any investigation could even determine if he had broken NCAA rules. A provision of his contract said the NCAA had to rule on alleged violations before he could be fired for that reason.

Ohio State president Karen Holbrook testified during the case that there was still justification for the dismissal because the contract also required him to uphold Ohio State's standards.

But in his ruling, the judge disputed the university's claim that O'Brien acted in bad faith and tried to cover up his actions.

"The evidence does not support such a sinister view of plaintiff's misconduct," Clark said.

Holbrook later defended the university's actions, saying in a statement that "we have acted forthrightly in compliance with NCAA rules and in the best interests of the athletics program and the university."

O'Brien, 55, coached the Buckeyes to a 133-88 record that included two Big Ten titles and a conference tournament title in seven seasons.

The NCAA is also investigating alleged violations committed during O'Brien's coaching tenure with the Buckeyes. It is expected to decide within the next few weeks on penalties for the program over the nine alleged violations — seven in the men's basketball program, one in football and one in women's basketball.

A judge ruled yesterday that former Ohio State basketball coach Jim O'Brien was fired improperly by the school in 2004.

Shell returns to coach Oakland

By Josh Dubow
Associated Press

ALAMEDA, Calif. — Art Shell has already written letters to his new players spelling his expectations and began the search for assistants to fill out the Oakland Raiders' coaching staff.

Shell was the last coach hired this offseason, giving him a shorter timeframe to begin preparations for next season — a job that's all the harder because of his own long absence from coaching.

Shell hasn't been a head coach since the Raiders fired him following the 1994 season and hasn't walked the sidelines at all since leaving Atlanta as an assistant more than five years ago.

But Shell brings in a built-in level of credibility that Norv Turner and Bill Callahan — Oakland's last two coaches — lacked. An eight-time Pro Bowler, a two-time Super Bowl champion and a Hall of Famer during his NFL career, Shell's accomplishments have already gotten the attention of his players.

"He's done the things that a lot of us are trying to get done. He's been there. He knows what it takes," receiver Alvis Whitted said. "He knows the price you have to pay. We need that as a team. We just want to follow that example and get back to where we were in 2002."

Shell is tasked with turning around a team that won just 13 games over three seasons since winning the 2002 AFC championship.

Even last year's addition of Randy Moss couldn't stop the slide. Moss, one of the game's biggest stars when he played in Minnesota, is coming off his worst 16-game season with 60 catches for 1,005 yards. He appeared detached and frustrated at times last season and only gave a lukewarm defense of Turner when he was asked about the coach at midseason.

"The only thing I was worried about with our new head coach coming is we have a team full of megastars. There's definitely a superstardom to the Oakland Raiders that's something that someone will have to deal with," safety Jarrod Cooper said. "Anytime you make the Hall of Fame that carries a lot of credibility wherever you go. But that only does so much when it comes to game day."

Moss brings the deep-stroke capability that Shell talked about at his introductory news conference over the weekend. And his playing credentials might give him a better chance to communicate to Moss.

"They have to buy into what we're doing," Shell said. "It's a two-way street between the player and coach. There is trust. I think that's the No. 1 thing between players and coaches. You have to trust the players and the players have to trust their coaches."

One of the biggest areas of improvement needed for the Raiders is at offensive line. The team averaged only 3.8 yards per carry, allowed 45 sacks and committed far too many penalties from the offensive line.

"This offensive line I think can be the leader of this team," Shell said. "We just have to make sure we get them better and I think we can do that. They have a chance to be a great group."

The Raiders still have to decide whether to stick with Collins, who will count $12.9 million against the salary cap next season.

"He is an exciting quarterback," Shell said. "I think he has a chance to be great for us. But those issues will be addressed down the road."

Shell dismissed questions about whether the game has passed him by since he last was an assistant with Atlanta in 2000. He said football has always been about running the ball, stopping the run and making big plays in the passing game.

Other coaches have returned recently after long breaks and had success. Dick Vermeil took 14 years off before returning as St. Louis Rams coach in 1997 and led them to a Super Bowl title in his third season. Joe Gibbs took 11 years off before returning to the Washington Redskins in 2004 and led them back to the playoffs in his second season.

Shell is tasked with turning around a team that won just 13 games over three seasons since winning the 2002 AFC championship.

Even last year's addition of Randy Moss couldn't stop the slide. Moss, one of the game's biggest stars when he played in Minnesota, is coming off his worst 16-game season with 60 catches for 1,005 yards. He appeared detached and frustrated at times last season and only gave a lukewarm defense of Turner when he was asked about the coach at midseason.

Back on the right track

By Mike Harris
Associated Press

DAYTONA BEACH, Fla. — Jeff Gordon walked along pit road at Daytona International Speedway with crew chief Steve Letarte, oblivious to the fans around him.

People clapped and yelled to the four-time NASCAR champion, but Gordon kept talking to Letarte.

"I was just telling Steve that I think we're going in the right direction here," Gordon said, grinning. "I just reminded him not to let any of the outside stuff bother him."

There is plenty of that to deal with — especially the pressure to get Gordon another championship.

Gordon is coming off perhaps the most disappointing year of his career, struggling through the middle of the 2005 season and failing to qualify for the playoff-style Chase for the championship.

Starting with the Daytona 500 on Sunday, Gordon is intent on making a run at another title this year.

At 34, the driver that Dale Earnhardt once dubbed "Wonder Boy" should be entering the prime of his career. As an added bonus, he is three wins away from matching the 76 chalked up by Earnhardt, his hero and early career nemesis.

The responsibility for getting the No. 24 Chevrolet team back into the title fray rests squarely on the shoulders of the 26-year-old Letarte. He has big shoes to fill after Ray Evernham guided Gordon to his first three titles, and Robbie Loomis helped Gordon win his last title in 2001.

Gordon and Loomis missed another championship in 2004, finishing third, but 16 points behind champion Kurt Busch and eight behind Hendrick Motorsports teammate Jimmie Johnson in the closest finish in NASCAR history.

After winning three of the first nine races a year ago, including his third Daytona 500, Gordon's season crumbled. Late in the year, Loomis made the decision to make a change and return to Petty Enterprises. He passed on the honor — and pressure — of being Gordon's crew chief to longtime friend and colleague Letarte.

"Robbie was a tremendous crew chief," Letarte said. "He and Jeff won a lot of races and a championship and he's a first-class guy. He taught me a lot and we still call each other up and talk pretty regularly."

Some wondered whether becoming Gordon's crew chief was a little too much responsibility for someone so young. But Letarte doesn't seem to mind.

"You know, I'm new to being a crew chief, but I've been a part of this team for 11 years," he said. "I've known just about everybody on the team. I worked with Ray. I worked with Robbie. It didn't feel any different to be crew chief. I came to the same shop and I just had a little bit different role."

The new driver-crew chief team got a head start on 2006 by working together for the final 10 races of 2005. Loomis stepped aside early, finishing the season as a team consultant, to give Letarte a jump start on his new job.

It was somewhat embarrassing for Gordon not to make the 10-man, 10-race Chase. But the early start with Letarte resulted in a win at Martinsville, four other top 10 finishes and renewed optimism for this year.

Jeff Gordon is looking to rebound from a disappointing 2005 season in which he failed to qualify for the playoff-style chase for the championship.

"It's obvious those guys work well together, but that's no surprise," said Loomis, executive vice president of race operations for the Petty team. "Jeff has known and worked with Steve for a long time. Both of them are smart and capable people and I think they are going to have a lot of success together."

Gordon is sure Loomis is right.

"Having those last 10 races together really gave us a lot of momentum coming into 2006," Gordon said. "I think we found some things that were important to work on over the winter. Now, we have to make them work for us."

Gordon said winning championships has definitely gotten harder under the Chase format.

"I would say that, with the points system being the way it is, it's more competitive, it's harder to win the championship," he said. "But, at the same time, I think it's easier to have the opportunity to win because if you think about it, as long as you're in the top 10, you got a shot at winning."

Now, all Gordon has to do is make sure he's in that top 10 next September.

Ohno advances in short track

By Paul Newberry
Associated Press

TURIN, Italy — Apolo Anton Ohno managed to stay out of trouble. With no medals on the line, that's all he needed to do.

Ohno shook off a disappointing start to the Turin Olympics by leading the Americans into the relay final with a vintage short track performance Wednesday night. He put his team out front with a gutsy pass of two skaters and gave an emphatic pump of the fist when he crossed the finish line ahead of everyone else in the chaotic 5,000-meter race.

"It was just total instincts," Ohno said. "I just let it go."

He also advanced comfortably from the preliminary heats of the 1,000 — an expected result, but one that couldn't be taken for granted after Ohno's mishap on the first night of short track.

The 23-year-old skating star cost himself a chance to defend his Olympic title in the 1,500 with a boneheaded move in the semifinals. Already in position to advance, Ohno bumped the leader in a turn, wobbled and bobbled before regaining his balance, and wound up missing the final.

"I know what happened," Ohno said. "Everybody knows what happened. I had to come out strong."

The only gold medal Wednesday went to China's Wang Meng, who fulfilled the role of overwhelming favorite in the women's 500. The 20-year-old Wang, competing in her first Olympics, led from the opening gun and held off Bulgaria's Evgenia Radanova by the length of her right blade.

Radanova also won silver in the 500 at the 2002 Salt Lake City Games and has three Olympic medals in all. Canada's Anouk Leblanc-Boucher earned the bronze.

Ohno won a gold and a silver at the last Olympics, and he hopes to lead the men's relay team to its first medal since 1994.

He took control of the semis with one dynamic move, shifting into a higher gear that sent him careening around skaters from China and Italy with 30 laps to go. The crowd let out a gasp, then erupted in cheers at the sight of the soul-patched skater moving so effortlessly from third to first.

UMass battles GW to the wire

UM pushes No. 7 Colonials to the limit but come up short

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's basketball seemed to be within reach of pulling off its second upset in two years at George Washington last night, but ultimately came up short, falling 69-66.

The Minutemen (10-12, 5-6 Atlantic 10) hung tough with the No. 7 Colonials all night, but were never able to get over the hump. Every time UMass drew close, George Washington (21-1, 11-0 A-10) had an answer.

UMass cut the Colonials' lead to less than three points eight times in the second half, but never took the lead. Trailing 65-60 late in the game, it appeared that UMass had run out of gas, but a 3-pointer by senior Jeff Viggiano brought the Maroon and White within two.

On the Colonials' next possession, they ran the clock down to eight seconds before scoring a bucket to give them a four-point lead. Junior James Life gave the Minutemen one last glimmer of hope as he hit a 3-pointer with three seconds remaining. After GW's Maureece Rice missed two free throws with 2.1 seconds left, the ball went out of bounds and George Washington was awarded possession in a controversial call.

UMass's Chris Lowe received a technical for arguing the call, and GW's Mike Hall converted two foul shots with 0.6 seconds remaining to allow the Colonials to escape with the 69-66 win.

"I'm proud of our effort," UMass coach Travis Ford said. "I knew it would be tough, but I'm excited with the way we competed. We played hard, but we just didn't get any breaks."

As has been the case for much of the season, the Achilles heel for the Minutemen last night was turnovers. UMass leads the conference with 16.2 turnovers per game, and committed 29 last night.

"We hattled, but we didn't help ourselves," Ford said. "We'd have momentum but then we'd turn the ball over. We didn't take advantage of our opportunities. I'm disappointed because we put ourselves in a position to win."

Life continued his scoring surge as he led the team with 25 points. Last night was his seventh consecutive game in double figures.

Life added his points from the bench, as junior Brandon Thomas assumed the starting shooting guard position. Thomas, who scored 10 points in a starring role on Sunday against Florida State, turned in another strong performance last night, scoring 13 points and Freshman point guard Chris Lowe and the Minutemen gave No. 7 George Washington a scare last night, but fell 69-66 on the road. UMass is now 10-12 on the season.

Disappointing opener for U.S.

With a full roster of NHL players, it took a late goal by Jordan Leopold to salvage a 3-3 tie against Latvia in an opening game for the U.S. hockey team that felt more like a loss.

When the final horn sounded, the Latvian players raised their arms in triumph while the Americans slowly gathered around goalie John Grahame.

Latvia, with only two current NHL players, rallied from an early two-goal deficit and proved U.S. coach Peter Laviolette had every reason to be worried about this opening matchup in Olympic Group B.

Latvia had the luxury of playing mostly as a team in recent weeks, while the U.S. squad was scattered around North America. Only two American players were in Italy by Monday and the team had just one practice before hitting the ice Wednesday night.

Latvia is coming off a ninth-place finish in 2002, when the Americans earned a silver medal at Salt Lake City.

The Latvians had a chance to win the game in the third when Mark Parrish took a four-minute high-sticking penalty, but their power play was cut short by a Latvian penalty.

Grahame, who made 22 saves, got the start despite not being invited to the Americans' orientation camp in September.

All seemed right for the Americans in the first period, when Brian Gionta scored a power-play goal at 9:44 and Craig Conroy doubled the lead and made goalie Arturs Irbe look bad just 54 seconds later.

Atvars Tribuncovs cut Latvia's deficit to 2-1 with a power-play goal in the first period, and Latvia took over in the second. Poor defensive coverage by the United States yielded numerous odd-man rushes, until Latvia grabbed the lead.

Grahame was forced to dive on his stomach in the crease to grab the puck and stop the pressure with just less than six minutes left in the second period. Brian Rolston was sent off for tripping, and Latvia — in the Olympics for just the third time

Morrison not focused on Redick

By Wendell Barnhouse
Knight Ridder

FORT WORTH, Texas — Adam Morrison takes all kinds of shots.

Three-pointers, mid-range pull-up jumpers, dunks, free throws, fallaways.

Trash talk from fans aimed at his barely-there moustache, his floppy '70s style haircut, his junior-high gym class socks.

And insulin shots.

Morrison, Gonzaga's 6-8 junior forward, was diagnosed with type 1 diabetes while in eighth grade. When he's not playing or practicing, he wears an insulin pump.

During games, Morrison checks his blood-sugar level and, if needed, gives himself an insulin shot, jabbing himself in the stomach.

There's your pressure shot.

"I've had games where I've taken five shots and games where I've taken none," Morrison said. "It depends on how my body reacts to what I've eaten, how the game is going, my adrenaline flow.

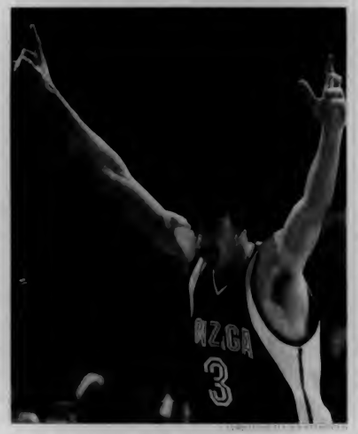
"You've got to be disciplined when you're a diabetic."

Morrison has led Gonzaga to a 21-3 record and No. 5 ranking. He's also engaged in a scoring battle and player-of-the-year race with Duke's J.J. Redick.

"What I don't really like is that people seem to want to pit those two against each other," Gonzaga coach Mark Few said. "That's kind of shallow and unfair. They're two great players trying to help their teams be great."

Entering Tuesday night's game, second-ranked Duke is 23-1 with Redick averaging 28.7 points per game. Morrison, who has been leading Division I in scoring most of the season, is a tick ahead at 28.8 after scoring 33 points in a 97-83 victory at Portland on Monday night.

On Jan. 21, Redick scored 41 against Georgetown in Duke's only loss. Two days later, Morrison had 41 against San Francisco. Just happenstance, says Morrison. He's not caught up in a cross-country scoring battle.



"We're friends, but I'm just trying to win games here," Morrison said. "I want J.J. to do well, but if he scores 31, I don't try to go out and score 36."

Redick and Morrison met a few years ago when they attended Michael Jordan's basketball camp. After every game, they text message each other and talk by telephone every few weeks.

Only the NCAA Tournament would produce a Duke-Gonzaga, Morrison-Redick showdown. Considering how high each team could be seeded, that potential game probably wouldn't happen until the Final Four.

Which would be just fine for Canada rules women's hockey

By Tim Dahlberg
Associated Press

TURIN, Italy — So far they haven't learned much about skating, stick handling or scoring. But the rest of the world may take one lesson away from the women's Olympic hockey, er, tournament.

There's no apologizing in women's hockey.

Not when it really matters. Not even when it's somewhat deserved. Blame the Canadians for that, if you must. They're the ones going around Turin acting a lot like the '27 Yankees.

Three games. Thirty-six goals scored. One goal allowed.

And not one "I'm sorry."

"This is the Olympics, and it matters," offered Canadian forward Hayley Wickenheiser.

Yes it is, and yes it does. Unfortunately, it only matters to Canada and the United States. They will play in the gold medal game Monday because they always play in the gold medal game. They beat each other, but no one ever beats them.

That's ever — as in it has never, ever, happened in 16 years of women's hockey in the world championships or the Olympics.

Which begs the question: What are the other six countries doing here?

Don't ask anyone on the Italian team, because they're not likely to have an answer. They may not even know each other's names.

The team was put together two weeks before the Olympics because Italy is the host country, and it seemed like a nice gesture to fill out the field. It didn't seem so nice when the Italian women were beaten 16-0 by Canada and 11-0 by Sweden only to rebound and score a goal in their final 5-1 loss to Russia.

That's OK, because Switzerland scored only one goal, too, and Germany managed only two.

The fastest game on ice can seem awfully slow when anyone other than the world's two powerhouses are playing. Even when they are, the contests sometimes disintegrate into special team specials when overeager referees blow the whistle for illegal body checking anytime two players get near one another.

The big celebration at the hockey arena the other night came when someone finally scored a fluke goal on the Canadians. The U.S. team had a big scare, winning only by four goals over Finland.

The most intrigue at women's hockey so far has come off the ice, where U.S. coach Ben Smith and the aging star he dumped before the games, Cammi Granato, aren't speaking to each other. That could cause problems because Granato is now an analyst for NBC, but the network decided to keep her in the studio far away from the rink.

Good thing, because fighting isn't allowed in the Olympic Games.

The domination by the American and Canadian teams since women's hockey was admitted to the Olympics eight years ago in Nagano isn't all that surprising. Both have feeder systems through junior hockey, and colleges with established programs to send players through.

Other countries have been reluctant to fully embrace the idea of women playing hockey, though there are some signs that is finally changing. There are more foreign players now at American colleges, and they are almost always the stars of their national teams.

"Our sport hasn't always been accepted by every nation," Canada coach Melody Davidson said.

Those that are accepting it don't seem to be catching up. While other countries are fielding better teams than the ragtag outfits that skated in Nagano, the Canadians and Americans are getting better at a faster pace.

In Canada, it would be like Midgets playing against Pee Wee league. The Canadian women play at a level of 16 to-17-year-old boys, while the other countries are probably two age groups below that.

"It is still a long way to go to catch up to the United States and Canada," said Finnish defenseman (woman, person?) Emma Laaksonen. "I don't know if [it can be done]."

So far, they haven't come close. The United States and Canada outscored opponents by a combined 54-4 in the preliminary rounds, and they're not expected to get much of a test in Friday's semifinals. Both teams are whopping favorites to win by five or six goals against Sweden and Finland before meeting in their inevitable gold medal final.

Olympic officials canned softball from the games for much the same reason, largely the American dominance. That isn't likely to happen to women's hockey because it fills 160 spots and helps level the gender imbalance in the Winter Games.

It looks good to have more women in the Olympics, but what really is the point if they can't compete? Does a 16-0 hockey blowout really add to the Olympic experience?

These are supposed to be the best athletes in the world. Some of them look like they're not even the best on their block.

Here's a suggestion: Reduce the field to four teams for the 2010 games in Vancouver and let them play each other several times.

The marginal teams will get better, fans will get to see more of the United States against Canada, and almost everyone will go home with a medal.

Better yet, the Canadians will have nothing to apologize about.

The U.S. women's hockey team may be the only team capable of upsetting the dominant Canadian team. The U.S. will be without longtime star Cammi Granato, as she was left off of this year's squad.

Bloom turns to NFL dreams

By Eddie Pells
Associated Press

SAUZE D'OULX, Italy — Maybe football really is Jeremy Bloom's thing.

The two-sport star finished sixth on the Olympic moguls course Wednesday in what will probably be the last stop in a skiing career that forced him to put his football ambitions on hold.

America's only medal went to Toby Dawson, who finished third, behind silver medalist Mikko Ronkainen of Finland and champion Dale Begg-Smith of Australia, who has dominated this sport the past few months.

Bloom was one of the faces to watch in these Olympics. His good looks and a good storyline — he gave up football because the NCAA wouldn't let him pursue ski endorsements at the same time — made him one of the most compelling figures in Italy.

But his 25-second run down the mountain was pretty average by his standards — a big splash of snow flew up after he landed poorly on his second jump. He nodded knowingly at the bottom of the hill after his score popped up, placing him in fourth, out of the medals with three more skiers to go.

"I knew I had made a mistake," he said. "I came here to accomplish my goals. I didn't come here to win any certain color medals. I was so close, you know."

The next stop on Bloom's journey will be the NFL scouting combine, which starts next week in Indianapolis. In the buildup to the Olympics, he insisted the journey to Italy was more meaningful to him than the final results.

And in the end, he felt the same way.

"I'm happy with the way I skied and I'm happy with the experience that I had here," said the dominant freestyle skier of 2005. "So there's not much to look down upon."

Fair or not, it still begs the question of whether his plate may have been too full.

Dawson, on the other hand, had pursued skiing with single-minded tenacity during the last four years after he had a self-described meltdown in the qualifying process for the 2002 Games.

This was not about glamour for the South Korean-born, American-adopted 27-year-old, but rather the hard work of

Students, faculty rally for safe return of UMass graduate

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

A crowd of over 100 people rallied on the University of Massachusetts campus yesterday in a show of support for kidnapped journalist and UMass graduate Jill Carroll, learning more about the woman whose now-familiar face has graced newspapers and televisions for more than five weeks.

"She has a passion for telling the story," said Karen List, a journalism professor at UMass, who first met Carroll when she was a student.

Carroll, who received a bachelor's degree in journalism from the University in 1999, became a foreign correspondent not long after graduation. She worked for publications such as the Wall Street Journal, the Jordan Times and most recently, the Christian Science Monitor as a freelance reporter.

Before her graduation, Carroll was the news editor of the Massachusetts Daily Collegian from 1998 to 1999.

Carroll was kidnapped Jan. 5 by a group calling itself the Revenge Brigades. Since her abduction, her hostage takers have demanded the United States to release eight female Iraqi prisoners. The U.S. has since released five, but claims the women's release had nothing to do with the kidnappers' demands.

Last Saturday, a message to the media said Carroll would be killed if her abductors' demands were not met by this Saturday. The U.S. has reiterated that they will not negotiate with terrorists.

The rally, which was sponsored by the Collegian, focused less on the latest demands of Carroll's captors, and more on the hope that Jill will return home unharmed.

"The statistics show that far more of these situations have happy endings," said Matt Viatour, a friend of Carroll, former Collegian editor and current sports writer for the Daily Hampshire Gazette.

List spoke about the reporting Carroll was doing as a journalist up until the time she was kidnapped, which included writing a story about an Iraqi family's devastation following a car bombing.

That article, which was published by the Christian Science Monitor last April, explained how a 3-year-old girl still couldn't move her legs 17 months after the bombing destroyed her house, which she shared with 26 family members.

"Their story would not have been told had Jill not been there," List said.

Before stepping down from the podium, I list asked the crowd to "hold her in your hearts."

Sylvia Langford, Special Assistant to the Vice Chancellor at UMass, referenced the late civil rights activist Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., saying "injustice everywhere is a threat to justice everywhere…

"The kidnapping of Carroll is a threat to that justice," she said. "[Carroll] has avoided propaganda and politics to show the inhumanity of war."

Mohammed Abdelaal representing the UMass Muslim Student Association when he said, "I am very proud of this girl… She [is] a just and fair reporter."

"I'm disappointed with Muslims who misrepresent our religion," Abdelaal said. "Islam is about love and peace."

He said Carroll is "an innocent person who… feels the catastrophes of the Iraqi people."

Some students said after the rally that they were pleased that a representative of Amherst's Muslim community spoke at the event.

"I think it was really important to have him there," said Raquel Prieto, a senior art history major at UMass. "What he said was concise. It reminded people not to stereotype the Muslim world."

Many students were unaware of the rally until they walked by and saw people gathered outside the Student Union early yesterday afternoon. Some even decided to watch and show their support.

"We want her to come home," said Lauren Rosenblum, a junior psychology and Spanish major.

"It's a horrible thing and it's important to support other alumni as a community," said Rachel Wasserman, a senior communications major.

"It's hard to understand how this could happen to someone like her, who was promoting free speech," said UMass Student Government Association President Pavel Payano. "I know everyone at UMass is praying for her safe return."

University professor urges students to 'Use Those Muscles'

By Jake Monte
Collegian Correspondent

Dr. Jane Kent-Braun, professor of exercise science at the University of Massachusetts, urged listeners to engage in activities to build strength, speed, endurance, coordination, and flexibility on Monday, in a lecture entitled "Healthy Aging, Use Those Muscles."

The speech was part of a year-long "Translating Research in Exercise Science" (TREx) lecture series aimed at informing community residents about health issues.

Dr. Kent-Braun stressed that the amount of people over the age of 65 in the country has been increasing in the past 25 years and a significant number of these people cannot engage in simple tasks like stooping or even walking.

In addition, "almost 20 percent of the population over 25 cannot walk two to three blocks without having to stop and rest," said Kent-Braun.

Strength and endurance were the two main criteria Dr. Kent-Braun spoke on.

"As we age, some loss of strength is inevitable," she said.

But surprisingly, she added it has been found that "older adults fatigue relatively less than younger adults." This is due to a greater reliance on oxidative phosphorylation for generating the chemical energy that the muscle requires during contractions.

The old belief was that older muscle worsens in nearly all areas of muscle function.

"It's been changing in last ten years and part of it is because of what we've been doing," Dr. Kent-Braun said.

She drew upon information from scientific journals throughout the lecture, as well as incorporating information her team at Totman gym has acquired.

She works with six graduate students and is currently working on four specific studies. On an average day, she meets with her students, reads scientific literature, reviews data and works on manuscripts.

Danielle Wigmore, a doctoral student in the Exercise Science Department and a research assistant in Dr. Kent-Braun's lab, said, "Working with Dr. Kent-Braun has been a great experience for me. She's a successful and productive scientist who's passionate about her work."

Ian Lanza, another doctoral student, said, "Under the guidance of Dr. Kent Braun, I am using phosphorous Magnetic Resonance Spectroscopy to study skeletal muscle."

Magnetic Resonance Spectroscopy is like "a very high super conducting magnet," Dr. Kent-Braun said, "like an MRI, except instead of getting information about anatomy we get information about — biochemical changes in muscle. That lets us figure out the miles per gallon for the muscle. That's how we've found out that older people generate energy different than younger people. We are some of the only people in the world using this technique."

An interesting feature of Dr. Kent-Braun's speech was her assertion that traditionally, scientists measured the entire circumference of the muscle to ascertain its size.

Now, they've learned to disregard the intramuscular fat and measure only the muscle itself. This has led to different findings in comparisons between older and younger muscles.

"With people living longer, the issue of quality of life becomes very important," said Wigmore. "In our lab, we are trying to understand how muscle function changes as a result of biological aging in hopes of learning how we can intervene and improve physical function… in older adults."

Dr Kent-Braun has been with UMass for six years. She has a Doctorate from the University of Southern California in Exercise Physiology and has done post-doctoral training at the University of Pennsylvania.

Groups sponsor production of 'Platanos and Collard Greens'

By Stephanie Gilmore
Collegian Correspondent

In honor of Black History month, several University of Massachusetts groups recently sponsored a performance of "Platanos and Collard Greens," a play about race relations of the African-American and Latino populations.

The play is based on David Lamb's similarly titled novel "Do Platanos Go Wit' Collard Greens?" "Platanos and Collard Greens" has appeared in many off-Broadway productions and has subsequently begun a college tour. The Student Government Association, along with several other student groups, sponsored the play's performance at UMass.

David Lamb is a professor of criminal justice at John Jay College and has traveled the country, giving speeches regarding race relations between Latinos and African-Americans to various audiences at different universities.

Lamb's play is billed as being similar to Shakespeare's "Romeo and Juliet."

The main conflict in "Platanos and Collard Greens" rests between two lovers from different backgrounds: an African-American college student, Freeman, and a Latino college student, Angelita. Through dialogue, poetry, and humor, the characters' feelings, current stereotypes regarding African-Americans and Latinos, and the mutually portrayal of these groups were presented to the audience.

For example, in a slam poetry-type monologue the actress portraying Angelita revealed how men look at her as a sexual object without a mind. She says it's difficult for her to overcome this belief because it is often reflected in the media. The play mentioned how Jennifer Lopez's biggest "asset" is her butt.

Angelita's mother also struggled with race throughout the play. She opposed her daughter's union with an African-American to such an extent that she faked suffering a heart attack after a routine argument between herself and her daughter.

Some characters in the play find it difficult to grasp why Angelita's mother would be so against this because Angelita's grandmother had a darker complexion than Freeman. This reveals the family's African-American descent as well as the hypocritical and unwarranted disgust of Freeman's heritage. Freeman's dad explained that the stereotypes seem to prevent Angelita's mom from allowing her to be happy for her daughter as well as accept her African-American identity.

At one point in the play, Freeman's father quoted the Biggie Smalls' song "One More Chance," saying that his race was "black and ugly as ever." Through these lyrics, Freeman's father wanted to show that Biggie, like many African-Americans, equated black with ugly. Freeman's father explained that most people want to hide their African American nature as acting as white as possible.

The character Mallory, represented an African-American woman who was proud of being the color of chocolate. In her poetic monologue she asked, "What's wrong with the chocolate." She discussed how music videos portray the Latino women as more attractive and, in a way, superior to African-American women, and says it's not surprising that her peers share this belief.

Historian for the 'Grateful Dead' to speak in open discussions

By Ryan Richardson
Collegian Staff

Next week, Dennis McNally, author and historian for the Grateful Dead, will be in residence at the University of Massachusetts to talk to students and faculty about his experiences outside of academia and writing history for the public.

McNally, who obtained his PhD in American History from UMass in 1978, will be a guest in several classes as well as participate in several open discussions with graduate and undergraduate students from both UMass and Hampshire College.

"I'm trying not to have too many expectations, I just want to let it happen and enjoy it," he said. He was invited back for a week in residence after delivering last year's Five College History Lecture. Throughout the week, he will speak on a variety of subjects.

"You could easily discussion to what you're getting from the audience," McNally said. Having written biographies of the Grateful Dead and Jack Kerouac he has spent most of his career outside of the realm of academia and hopes to offer a unique perspective to students and faculty alike. As a historian, it is likely that he will have a lot to say on that subject.

"I don't think that you can be civilized without a grasp of history," he said. "If you don't have some sense that things are built on the past then you're stuck because the things around you just happen and you don't have a basis to understand them."

McNally believes that history is more than just the memorization of facts, but the story of how things connect and relate to one another, and that everyone is part of a "historical continuation."

According to McNally, it is important for academics to write about history and other fields, to think not just about fellow scholars but to think about broader patterns and helping the population as a whole to better understand their field. He said that he considers himself akin to a substitute teacher for the coming week.

"When I was in the fifth or sixth grade, we had a regular sub from Hawaii and we adored her. I remember a lot of the things that she taught us, but not much of the rest of that year," he said.

Feeling that he was too impatient to teach regularly, McNally thinks that students are more willing to focus and listen with a substitute because there is much less pressure with a sub.

Judge demands release of surveillance documents

By Katherine Shrader
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A federal judge ordered the Bush administration Thursday to release documents about its warrantless surveillance program or spell out what it is withholding, a setback to efforts to keep the program under wraps.

At the same time, the Republican chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee said he had worked out an agreement with the White House to consider legislation and provide more information to Congress on the eavesdropping program. The panel's top Democrat, who has requested a full-scale investigation, immediately objected to what he called an abdication of the committee's responsibilities.

U.S. District Judge Henry Kennedy ruled that a private group will suffer irreparable harm if the documents it has been seeking since December are not processed promptly under the Freedom of Information Act. He gave the Justice Department 20 days to respond to the request from the Electronic Privacy Information Center.

"President Bush has invited meaningful debate about the wireless surveillance program," Kennedy said. "That can only occur if DOJ processes its FOIA requests in a timely fashion and releases the information sought."

Justice Department spokesman Charles Miller said no decision had been made about the government's next steps.

On Capitol Hill, lawmakers also have been seeking more information about Bush's program that allowed the National Security Agency to eavesdrop — without court warrants — on Americans whose international calls and e-mails it believed might be linked to al-Qaida.

After a two-hour closed-door session, Senate Intelligence Chairman Pat Roberts, R-Kan., said the committee adjourned without voting on whether to open an investigation. Instead, he and the White House both confirmed that they had an agreement to provide more information on the nature of the program to lawmakers. The White House has also committed to make changes to the current U.S. law, according to Roberts and White House deputy press secretary Dana Perino.

"I believe that such an investigation at this point ... would be detrimental to this highly classified program and efforts to reach some accommodation with the administration," Roberts said.

Still, he promised to consider the Democratic request for a vote in a March 7 meeting.

Earlier, President Bush's spokesman, Scott McClellan, left the impression that any deal with Congress would not allow for significant changes. He said the White House continued to maintain that Bush does not need Congress' approval to authorize the warrantless eavesdropping and that the president would resist any legislation that might compromise the program. "There's kind of a high bar to overcome," McClellan said.

West Virginia Sen. Jay Rockefeller, the Intelligence Committee's top Democrat, said the White House had applied heavy pressure to committee Republicans to prevent them from conducting thorough oversight. He said legislation can't be considered by the full Senate because lawmakers don't have enough information.

"No member of the Senate can cast an informed vote on legislation authorizing or conversely restricting the NSA's warrantless surveillance program, when they fundamentally do not know what they are authorizing or restricting," Rockefeller said.

It remains unclear what any changes in law may look like. Roberts indicated it may be possible "to fix" the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act to authorize the president's program. Perino said the White House considers suggestions put forward by Sen. Mike DeWine, R-Ohio, the starting point, particularly his proposal to create a special subcommittee on Capitol Hill that would regularly review the program.

DeWine's proposal would authorize Bush's program and exempt it from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. That law set up a special court to approve warrants for monitoring inside the United States for national security investigations.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales testifies before the Senate Judiciary Committee on Capitol Hill in Washington. Gonzales defended the Bush administration's domestic eavesdropping program.

British man pleads 'not guilty' in slayings of wife and child

By Denise Lavoie
Associated Press

FRAMINGHAM — Neill Entwistle pleaded not guilty Thursday to murder charges and was held in jail without bail in the killings of his wife and baby daughter, who were found shot to death in bed at the couple's suburban Boston home.

The crush of media slowed traffic outside the Framingham District Court building. One passing motorist yelled out: "Burn that baby killer."

Entwistle, 27, kept his head bowed as officers led him into the building wearing shackles and a bulletproof vest.

He is charged with two counts of first-degree murder in the deaths of his wife, Rachel, 27, and their 9-month-old daughter Lillian, killed in their home in Hopkinton on Jan. 20. Entwistle flew to his native England a day after the shootings, was arrested there last week, and was flown back to the United States on Wednesday.

Entwistle said nothing during the brief hearing. His lawyer, Elliot Weinstein, entered the plea on his behalf. District Court Judge Robert Greco ordered him held without bail pending a March 15 probable cause hearing, although the case could be transferred to Superior Court before then.

Entwistle was taken to the jail inside the Middlesex Superior Court building in Cambridge.

After the hearing, Weinstein lashed out at the news coverage of the case.

"I don't know that Mr. Entwistle will ever be able to get a fair trial on these charges," Weinstein said. "I am certain that anybody watching this telecast or reading the reporting of today's arraignment has already formed an opinion with respect to Mr. Entwistle's guilt, ... And that opinion is based on absolutely no facts and absolutely no evidence, and that is quite unfortunate."

He declined to take questions, saying: "I am not going to continue the publicity mill that surrounds this case."

More than a dozen of Rachel Entwistle's family and friends filled the first three rows of the courtroom. The women carried bouquets of lilies and roses tied with long white ribbons.

Rachel Entwistle's mother, Priscilla Matterazzo, never took her eyes off her son-in-law.

A family spokesman, Joseph Flaherty, read a statement from the Matterazzos outside the courthouse.

"To think that someone we loved, trusted and opened our home to could do this to our daughter and granddaughter is beyond belief," he said. "From what we have learned through the course of the investigation, we are now only coming to realize the level of his deceit.

"Neil betrayed our trust in so many different ways that it is almost impossible to describe it," Flaherty said.

Prosecutors say Entwistle shot his wife and daughter on Jan. 20 at their home in Hopkinton with his father-in-law's 22-caliber handgun.

UMass's unanswered questions

Katelyn Harding

Although this is my last semester, and I will be graduating with a B.A. in journalism, there are still things about the UMass campus and beyond that even a college degree will not help me understand. I have tried to think of possible answers to these existing questions, but I have come up short. Perhaps these things were just meant to be, and the UMversity of Massachusetts community should just accept them.

Question No. 1:

What is it about writing you and your significant other's initials enclosed in a heart on bar bathroom stalls? Do you think this is a romantic way to symbolize your love for someone? D.S. loves L.B. 4-eva? Too bad I saw D.S. kissing N.H. behind the F.A.C. and then going to the S.O.M. and meeting up with L.B., who was none the wiser.

And what about the "Lisa & Melanie were here '05?" First of all, why were there two girls in the stall at the same time, and what were they doing that made them think it was so important to mark the date on the wall? Do these people come back to check on what they have written and reminisce on the good times they had in the bathroom? For their sakes, I hope not.

Question No. 2:

What is with the multitude of bumper stickers that decorate cars around here? I understand having a few, including good ol' "UMass Amherst," plastered on the back of your car. But is it really necessary to have so many bumper stickers on one's car that you cannot even tell what color it is?

Everyone is entitled to their own opinion, I understand that, but half the time the writing on these stickers is so small no one can read them anyway. The person behind you is trying so hard to read your bumper sticker that pretty soon they will hit one of these precious decorations, and you will have to deal with the fact that they ruined one of your stickers. All for the mere reason that you had to make a statement using your car. If you are going to have a plethora of stickers on your car, at least make sure the writing is big enough so the person behind you can read, "My Kid Beat Up Your Honor Roll Kid" crystal-clear.

Who are the Guitar Dudes and why are we so obsessed with them? My roommate brought up a good point the other night when she said she wanted to know more about them. Although we all laughed and just pretended she was really drunk, deep down I know each and every one of us wants to know what their deal is. How old are they? Do they have day jobs? Do we care?

All we care about is that they are at McMurphy's every Wednesday night, they play good music and it is a guaranteed good time, but what is the obsession? Where will they be in 10 years? These questions may seem trivial, but for some people, they are very important. This is yet another question I will never find the answer to.

Question No. 4:

Where did the sudden inspiration for Chuck Norris jokes come from? In everyone's profiles/away messages/ everyday conversations there are Chuck Norris jokes everywhere. (My personal favorite is: The credits at the end of Walker aren't credits. They are a list of people Chuck Norris has roundhouse-kicked to the face.)

In everyone's profiles/away messages/ everyday conversations there are Chuck Norris jokes everywhere. (My personal favorite is: The credits at the end of Walker aren't credits. They are a list of people Chuck Norris has roundhouse kicked to the face.

These jokes have seemed to pop out of nowhere, and I love each and every one of them, but where did they originate? I remember my first experience with "poking fun" at Chuck Norris began when Conan O'Brien devised a lever on his show that whenever it was pulled, a clip from Walker Texas Ranger would play. UMass kids seem to share the same affinity of making fun of Chuck Norris that Conan does.

Although these are all pressing questions that I'm sure a lot of you have contemplated during our stay at UMass, do not think about them too much, because they do not have answers. People will continue confessing their love for one another on bathroom stalls, plastering bumper sticker over bumper sticker on their cars trying to outdo themselves, the Guitar Dudes will always be fascinating and entertaining and Chuck Norris jokes will always make me burst out laughing. Instead of trying to fight against these forces, just allow them to take their course, and appreciate that they are all parts of our UMass. Or not.

Gilowen Jenkins

Fresh off the emotional hangover that is Valentine's Day, many of us men return to hibernation in the caves. Valentine's Day is perhaps the only day of the year when we men are encouraged to share our deepest emotions towards our significant others. In the mix-up of gift giving and promotional pressure to do so, something seems to get lost (besides control of our emotions).

How easily we dismiss what we are feeling because society has conditioned us to think that it's not "manly." Compassion and love should typify the true meaning of Valentines Day, yet they escape many of us American men the rest of the year.

Now, I'm not advocating us all getting together to have a good cry. Rather, I'm advocating for a larger movement to break that old stereotype that a real man can't be confident as well as compassionate.

Famed feminist Betty Freidan (who passed away recently) was perhaps most famous for sparking a feminist movement with her book entitled "The Feminine Mystique." In the book, Freidan addresses the anxieties that many women feel with their traditional role as a homemaker, a role she found stifling.

Why can't men have a movement to shake off the constraints of the stifling stereotype that macho means arrogant, aggressive, ignorant, crude and simplistic? Where's our mystique?

It seems that everywhere we turn in society, the old archetype dominates. On television sitcoms, a familiar formula still exists, you watch the stupid, lazy, beer drinking, potentially humorous dad/boyfriend goof-ups as the adoring soccer mom/wife girlfriend imparts words of wisdom and then the man buys her something expensive and everything is "hunky dory."

Perhaps I'm overreacting, but I look at my peers and I see that we're all acting out this routine in some way. Moreover, we needn't look far for more evidence of perversion of b.s. masculinity. Our president and vice president take the cake on fake macho bravado. Dick Cheney shot a guy. In the end I think this actually helps him. Imagine what they'll say: "Wow, what a cowboy, I'm not messing with him — he was scary before, but geez."

We can lift up the opposite sex as well as ourselves. It's time to put down our guns, pick up our fishing rods, click off our TVs, pick up our books and delete our porn.

Where are the renaissance men today, and why aren't they running this country? Why can't we have a John Wayne combined with a Bill Shakespeare? Maybe I'm asking too much, but I submit there is a whole group of us who are growing increasingly disenchanted with society's dominating, available male role models.

For whatever reason, it seems that the first people to notice such disenchantment are the marketers and advertisers who want our money. It is they who came up with a new term that's somewhat applicable to this discussion.

For advertisers, this new man is an "uberman," an "ubersexual." According to a head strategist at JWT advertising agency, this "uberman" is one who is "passionate in his relationships, passionate about feeding his senses through color, taste and feel."

According to marketers, "ubersexual" types are people such as Bill Clinton, Bono, Barak Obama, John Stewart, Guy Ritchie, Ewan McGregor and George Clooney. While a new market segment may not be a solution to this problem, maybe it offers some hope.

If we extrapolate and expand upon this definition, perhaps we can be better husbands, fathers, boyfriends and people. We can lift up the opposite sex as well as ourselves. It's time to put down our guns, pick up our fishing rods, click off our TVs, pick up our books and delete our porn.

Let us not be stricken with anxiety on the next Valentine's Day, and let us jump at the opportunity to be men of integrity, passion and tact.

Sadly, as the dominant gender, we have a responsibility to be better. However hackneyed, I think Spiderman's uncle said it best (though I'm certain he wasn't referring to gender relations): "With great power comes great responsibility." Apologies for the comic book quote. What can I say? I'm still a dude who likes superheroes.

The poison of passive activists

Stephen Gladwin

As I enter my last semester at the University of Massachusetts, I have come to the conclusion that my generation has taken a giant step backward from previous generations. We are less adventurous, infantilized by excessive peace and the soft-headed theories grown out from it.

My generation is less prone to challenge itself through ruthless introspection and a re-evaluation of the very values and theories we hold most dear. Massive self-denial is the result, and one of the key enablers is that most cherished of values: activism.

Is it not surprising so many college students cling to activism, emboldened by the promise of unlimited progress? I see my generation not as the savvy children of our Vietnam-protesting parents, but as the last gasp of the Enlightenment. The heady, centuries-old concept of limitless progress has changed from illuminating to darkening. It has kept us from asking about a frightening thought: what if there is no such thing as progress? Have we really become more tolerant and "civilized?"

Consider this: Is George Bush a more competent president than George Washington? Are computers more reliable than typewriters or pen and paper? And, if our generation is indeed "smarter" than previous ones, why do we squander the greater availability of higher education so shamefully with "dumbed-down" classes and black-out drinking? Why do healthy, well-informed students voluntarily take up smoking, when the ample risks have been so readily apparent for so long?

The most poisonous of UMass activism is it has allowed undeveloped, confused, young adults to further deny themselves of what they really want (and need) by mere psychological transference. An example will help illuminate this point.

I knew someone who had two insufferable parents: a chauvinist father and a neurotic, religiously conservative mother who was "trapped" into an early grave of domesticity by having children too early. Inevitably, this person internalized his unpleasant household and grew to hate it, but instead of gaining new personal insight and emotional maturity through fearless self-examination, the person instead did what so many UMass students do and became an over-zealous activist.

I believe the subconscious motivation for such action is, "If I can't change my life, at least I can affect a cause that will help others avoid the situation I'm in," but this is passive. He is not working on his own problems, but merely the problems of others through activism and perhaps hoping subconsciously that through this he can help himself.

This person did not free himself from his parents. Instead, this person projected his anguish onto an external cause (activism).

Activism, like so many other things at UMass (especially excessive binge drinking) is for slaves. It is for those who are too weak to face their shortcomings honestly and who allow themselves to be enslaved by a system that perpetuates self denial and stunted growth.

Meanwhile, the person's conflicts remain unresolved and his emotional growth is stunted.

Activism is thus a perfect crutch for my generation: it appears selfless and "important," but it merely makes self-loathing and self-denial noble. Real activism takes a fully formed, self-realized individual, something that many UMass students are not.

Have you ever looked at the average UMass militant activist? They are often the saddest, most confused beings on campus. At UMass, activists are the biggest bullies of all: they hate much of the world's problems and people (such as those they deem racist), and "pick on" these issues and people, or brow-beat non-activists into action, because they hate themselves (consciously or subconsciously) and their inability to face their problems.

A truly strong soul is hard on itself, not others. Activism, like so many other things at UMass (especially excessive binge drinking), is for slaves. It is for those who are too weak to face their shortcomings honestly and who allow themselves to be enslaved by a system that perpetuates self-denial and stunted growth.

What's worse, UMass activism has denied those students who wish to live a sensible life, full of the only eternal things: love, art, and friendship, free from the hysteria and the self-denial of activism, the opportunity to challenge themselves and grow emotionally and spiritually. You infants who have suckled at the teat of activism have cheapened love. Activism has stunted your emotional growth, and you cannot handle the exquisite highs and lows of love and have relegated it to an unadventurous child's game.

You desperately clutch at your partners and pour your self-loathing onto them, forcing them to play the role of free psychologist, but you cannot offer anything in return because of your arrested emotional development, enabled by the self-denial of activism. You also strive towards a world of boundless peace and happiness, free of conflict and suffering.

Is this nothing more than most Christians' idea of heaven? You want nothing more than heaven on earth. You are indeed doing God's work, you chic atheists. If you really cared about humanity, you would allow space for suffering and chaos, the true builders of the spirit and character.

A concluding specification: my boundless disdain is for what activism has become at UMass, not for activism itself. UMass students have cheapened activism and cheapened life for sensible students. By making noble self-denial and self-loathing through psychological transference onto "big" issues, they aren't capable of fully understanding, because of activism's enabling of their misunderstandings and denial of themselves.

'Wake up Mr. West'

Kevin Dooley

By now, the whole world knows of hip-hop rapper/Jesus Christ impersonator Kanye West. I'll admit that even though I know less about hip-hop than my grandparents, I find some of Kanye's music refreshing to listen to. However, someone needs to tap Kanye on the shoulder and tell him his head is getting way too big. Let me provide some examples of Kanye's plan to take over the world.

Kanye West was a much sought-after record producer in the rap industry before releasing a grand total of two solo albums. In an interview on MTV, Kanye announced that he was insulted by the Grammy Awards when they asked him last year to perform the song "College Dropout" off of his debut album and then did not choose him as the winner for Best New Artist (or something irrelevant like that). That year, Kanye was nominated for 10 awards. What an insult. Kanye

. . . More people tuned into watch American Idol last week than they did the Grammy Awards. I wouldn't worry too much about it, Kanye; the Grammy Awards are completely irrelevant and you're better off trying to become the next Bo Bice than a legitimate musical artist.

The outspoken rapper has also said that "Gold Digger" was the best song of 2005 and was again insulted by the Grammy Awards when they did not nominate the song for Best Rap Song of the Year. According to Kanye in his interview with Rolling Stone, "That's a gimme Grammy."

As reported in this same article, more people tuned in to watch American Idol last week than they did the Grammy Awards. I wouldn't worry too much about it, Kanye; the Grammy Awards are completely irrelevant and you're better off trying to become the next Bo Bice than a legitimate musical artist.

Kanye also said to Rolling Stone that he should be a character, or more accurately, a griot (a West African storyteller) in a modern version of the Bible. He claims the legitimacy for putting him in the Bible is that he has changed the way music has sounded more than one time. He took matters one step further when recently posing as Jesus Christ suffering on the cross on the cover of the same issue of Rolling Stone magazine.

I wonder who's been persecuting Kanye. It surely can't be the dreaded white man. I see plenty of white people who support Kanye and love his music. Judging by how many Facebook pictures there are of UMass students attending the Halloween night concert he put on at the Mullins Center, it looks like he is well supported by us white people. By the way, Kanye is currently number nine for most popular musical artists in the Facebook Pulse. I thought I would share that little piece of information for the 10 of you who don't check on Facebook every five seconds like someone who is suffering from OCD.

Everyone remembers when Kanye announced to the world, and a startled Mike Myers, that George Bush doesn't like black people. Now, I'm going to save my bashing of Bush for another article, since all us liberals who read the Daily Collegian on a regular basis get enough orgasmic Bush reading to last a lifetime.

Kanye was simply irresponsible when making this statement. He needs to stop seeing this world as black and white and playing a kindergarten version of the blame game, also known as politics. You try getting supplies to a city that tragically was hit with a category four hurricane and then watched its only protection, the levee system, give way to the Gulf of Mexico. I cave it to one of Kanye's friends for some more headaches.

On his second album, Kanye released the mega-hit "Gold Digger," a song about a woman getting all of his money. Wow, this guy has had a tough life. Move over, Jesus.

Anyways, the opening of this song begins with a featured spot by actor Jamie Foxx. Jamie Foxx is a really funny guy, but he is one in now a long list of celebrities and actors who think anything they touch will turn to gold. (See Paris Hilton's valiant attempt at an album and the state of California as evidence.)

Jamie Foxx begins the song by mimicking legendary singer Ray Charles, "She take my money, well I'm in need ..." Then Kanye jumps right in and makes his case about golddiggin' women. Throughout the song, you hear Jamie Foxx in the background repeating that same line over and over again.

Foxx did a spectacular job playing the role of Ray Charles in the movie, "Ray," but Jamie, pal, you aren't Ray Charles. Give it up. I don't want to find you walking the streets impersonating Ray Charles while your buddy Kanye does a reenactment of the crucifixion of Christ right behind you.

were very fortunate that Buffalo beat Vermont; otherwise it would have been us and Vermont, which might have been a classic of a game."

Nowadays, Keenan says he'll go out of his way to visit The Gut anytime he is within a couple hours — and has been there as recently as December — because it still houses pictures from the two teams doing battle from the 1971 and 1972 seasons. It brings back memories of a place that saw some of the most heated hockey games in the entire country between players who were sworn enemies — but it was that intense competition that has now turned these former players into friends.

When Keenan runs into former Catamounts, such as Dave Reece, they remind him that, "UMass was far and away the most anticipated game in that era."

But though the players have become friends, that doesn't mean everyone involved in the rivalry has.

"All-American UVM defenseman George 'Earthquake' Kreiner told me a decade later that coach Jim Cross considered UMass their most important opponent, and [Cross] actually hated me, though we've never actually met. That's intense," Keenan says.

He also recalls a distinct homeice advantage the Catamounts had back in the day.

"There was a live catamount caged behind the visiting team's goal, snarling in a way that convinced us he had been deprived of his dinner," Keenan says. "It wasn't fond of crowds, and it disliked Minutemen."

As did everyone in Burlington at the time.

But through all of the loathing, there was a respectful passion that consumed both sides of the competition. It has created such a tremendous memory for all of those involved, making them more than eager — now as much as ever — to look back and reflect upon their glory days.

Sixth straight A-10 title on the line

the A-10 this season.

His time broke the record held by Paul Beaulieu, who set the UMass record in 1981.

O'Brien said Korhonen was very deserving of the honors he received.

"This week we're going to have him try to continue the racing performances and efforts that he started with earlier in the season," he said. "You know, this is now his fifth race and hopefully he'll continue to travel that ladder upward."

Though plagued with a nagging injury to his throwing hand for the first two meets of the season, shotputter Calicchio has made his presence felt ever since returning and is sure to continue to do that on Saturday. He is currently ranked second in the A-10 and O'Brien even sees him improving the mark he posted last week at Boston University.

O'Brien added that the addition of the University of North Carolina Charlotte, which holds a great reputation for its indoor and outdoor track teams, will make everyone, including his Minutemen, perform even better.

"We received an extra boost from Charlotte and it will make all the rest of the competitors in all the events compete on a much higher level," he said.

The men aren't the only ones that are sending talent to Rhode Island this weekend, however.

The women also have a skilled squad that includes the likes of freshman Jordan Veney, sophomore Kristen Hakanowski and senior Elisabeth Budd. Veney has broken and re-broken the UMass women's indoor shot put record at her last three meets.

With her most recent throw of 45 feet, 5.5 inches, she's received nothing but praise from UMass coach Julie Lalreniere.

"She's going to continue to set records," Lalreniere said. "She's that good."

Bukanowski has excelled at the pole-vault event all season, but didn't quite to live up to her potential last week, failing to clear 12 feet. But Lalreniere has all the confidence in the world in her pole-vaulter, who is currently ranked number one.

"She looks good," Lalreniere said. "She should take this."

Lalreniere expects her upperclassmen to perform just as well as her younger athletes.

Budd has performed exceptionally well in the 500-meter this year, and her coach thinks she is due for a great race.

"We have a few shining stars and we're going to focus on that," Lalreniere added.

Tough losses plague Minutemen

Junior forward Brandon Thomas scored 10 points against Florida State and added 13 points in the 69-66 loss to No. 7 George Washington.

basketball this week after recovering from La Salle's 65-44 thrashing at the Mullins Center.

"Were disappointed we lost but I think we did some really good things in both games," Ford said. "I really liked the way we competed. We ran our offense a lot better. When you're on the road against very, very good teams, you have to play perfect. But we played really well so hopefully those games can give us some confidence."

St. Bonaventure has been the A-10's punching bag for the last couple of months — its only win was against lowly Richmond — and UMass has a chance to grab a win from a weaker conference opponent. But after inconsistent play this season and a young back court that is prone to turnovers (29 team turnovers against GW), nothing is going to be taken for granted.

The Minutemen had an opportunity to shock the Colonials and hung with them until the final buzzer. UMass pulled within one point on two occasions but couldn't get that momentum basket to tie the game or pull ahead — a couple of bounces here and there and fans might be talking about the second upset of GW in two years. Ford will be reviewing game tapes over the next couple of days to see if he can dig up any positives from Wednesday's game.

"We had our chances to win the [GW] game," Ford said. "We got in some serious foul trouble at the end. When you go on the road and you play against the No. 7 ranked team in the country and you turn it over 29 times and only lose by three, then there has to be some positives."

UM looks for fourth straight win

The Bonnies on the other hand are a team on the downfall. With an overall season record of 8-15, there is only one team in the A-10 lower than them in the standings (Fordham).

The last time the Minutewomen faced St. Bonaventure, the light at the end of the tunnel was dim — very dim. After falling to the Bonnies, 68-62, the Minutewomen's record slipped to 3-11, and the contest marked the third straight conference loss.

Less than two weeks following that loss, UMass began its late-season surge and would inevitably turn its season around completely.

"We're resilient," Dacko said. "These young ladies have proven to be resilient, they scrap and now they know how to win ball games."

Led by sophomores Pam Rosanio (12.7 points per game) and Kate Mills (2.8 blocks), the Minutewomen have been able to make something out of what was once a lost season.

One aspect that Dacko views as an attribute to the team's new ability to win games is its capability to make free throws. After the conclusion of the 2004-05 season, the Minutewomen's free throw percentage was a mark of .584, making 232-of-397.

After the team's 68-63 win over Fordham on Sunday, the Minutewomen moved up to No. 1 overall in free throw shooting in the A-10, making 301-of-424 this season so far, and holding an impressive mark of .710.

"It's been quite a turnaround for us," Dacko said. "We try to focus on free throws everyday in practice and it's a mindset. [Free throw shooting] has proven to win ball games for us and we have to keep doing that."

UMass skiers enter final stretch

"The women could absolutely [move up the standings]," UMass coach Justin Rouleau said. "It wouldn't be inconceivable for Boston College to be fourth one day and [UMass] first both days."

Rouleau said it would take a lot more for the men to improve their current standings, however, as they are mathematically eliminated from first place.

"Even second place is a pretty big step. They could do it, but it would take a disaster [on the part of Colby or Plymouth State], but slalom is like that. Colby-sawyer had a disaster [last week, which put] Plymouth State in first place, so it is possible," Rouleau said. "It will probably come down to Saturday's [slalom] race more than [Friday's giant slalom]."

If the men are going to advance, they will need the help of their top skier, Rush Hawkins. The junior is still suffering from a leg injury, which has been re-aggravated several times this season, but is still slated to race this weekend.

Examinations have shown that Hawkins' anterior cruciate ligament (ACL) has been stretched past its normal range. Hawkins is going to require surgery, but Rouleau has said he will wait until after the season to undergo treatment.

On the women's side, however, the injury bug has not been so merciful. Senior Caitlin Doughty's knee injury, suffered two weeks ago in a crash during the giant slalom portion of the Brown Carnival, turned out to be a fully torn ACL. The injury has ended her season, and career, as a skier.

Fellow senior Lisbet Rauh will move up the roster and take Doughty's place as the number two skier for the Minutewomen.

"We're going to go by the overall rankings for our [roster order]," Rouleau said.

Rauh is currently a top 10 skier in the conference.

"Lisbet is our No. 2 girl [behind Eliza Hawkins] now, and she stepped up great for us last weekend," Rouleau said.

Rauh placed fifth overall for the women in both the slalom and giant slalom at last weekend's Boston College Carnival.

Reliving an old rivalry

Jeff Howe

(Eds. Note This is the first part of a two-part series examining the history of UMass hockey. This edition deals with the rivalry between the University of Massachusetts and Vermont over 30 years ago. The second edition will appear in Wednesday's Collegian, and it will deal with the relationship between Don Cahoon and Jack Canniff.)

They were hated, but they were treated like celebrities. They were mercilessly booed on the ice, but outside the rink, their drinks were on the house.

That was just how things worked when the Massachusetts Redmen met up with Vermont back in the 1960s and '70s. As two perennial ECAC contenders, the rivalry between UMass and the Catamounts was of classic proportion, and with Vermont joining UMass in Hockey East this season, that historic rivalry has a chance to be revitalized some 30 years later.

Even though they were both Division II programs, former Boston College coach John "Snooks" Kelley told the Boston Globe in 1972, "If those two teams were in Division I, they would be fighting for the playoffs right now."

"The teams were so even no matter what year it was," former UMass coach Jack Canniff says. "It was like the Yankees and Red Sox."

"When we look back on those games, they were the highlight of our career," UMass' all-time leading goal and point scorer Pat Keenan says. "We especially liked going to UVM's building even though we were considered mortal enemies."

Canniff took over the struggling program in 1967 and quickly breathed a new life into the Redmen, leading them to the 1972 ECAC Division II Championship, the only one the Maroon and White have ever laid claim to.

And though the meetings between UVM and UMass fell mostly in favor of the Catamounts, Canniff's club found the majority if its success in 1970 and 1971, when the Redmen won three of the five games between the two.

The series came to a head on March 10, 1971, in the semifinal game of the ECAC Championship at UVM's Gutterson Fieldhouse. Trailing 2-1 in the third period, the Redmen made a furious attempt to tie things up late in the game, but Catamount goalie Dave Reece shunned aside the relentless offense of his opposition.

"We really applied heavy pressure all the way through the third period, and I thought we deserved better fate," Keenan says. "We just didn't cash Dave Reece played a big game, but so did [UMass goalie] P.J. Flaherty. That was just one of many highlights we have in that building."

Massachusetts forward Pat Keenan (4) fires a shot at Vermont goalie Dave Reece during the 1971 hockey season.

It was one of the most disappointing losses in the program's history, but with all of the respect that the two teams and fan bases had for each other, the UVM faithful were glorious in defeat and paid homage to the Redmen later that night.

"When we played at UVM's Gutterson Fieldhouse, spectators would be on the verge of physical involvement during the game," Keenan says. "But the same fans treated us like visiting celebs and bought us beers after our 1971 playoff loss. In subsequent years, fans would engage me, making it clear our games were more compelling to UVM than those against higher profile schools like UNH or local rival Middlebury. It was just better than other games."

The Redmen nearly had their crack at revenge in the 1972 ECAC playoffs. With UVM ranked No. 1 and UMass at No. 2, there was a potential date awaiting at Gutterson — where the Redmen won a 4-3 overtime thriller in December of that season — in the championship game.

UMass waltzed through the first two rounds, knocking out St. Anselm, 5-3, and Merrimack, 4-2, at Orr Rink, home to Amherst College and also the Redmen since there was no money for their own arena on campus at the time.

But for once, there was a kink in the Catamount armor.

"We were really enthusiastic about getting another crack at Vermont after they beat us the year before," Keenan says. "And after we just finished a strong performance at home, we heard on the radio that Buffalo beat UVM in Burlington quite handily. That was a surprise, and it was certainly a disappointment even though [by Vermont losing], it guaranteed us home-ice advantage."

Behind the efforts of Keenan's hat trick, Flaherty's resistance in net and the surprising contribution of Chico Shea, who scored three goals of his own, the Redmen proceeded to blow Buffalo out of the building in the championship game by a score of 8-1, slating them on top of the Division II college hockey world. Though they didn't get their opportunity for revenge, Canniff wasn't necessarily disappointed the way Keenan was.

"That's him. That's not me," Canniff says with a laugh. "We

Minutemen await VT at the Mullins Center

BY JON PELLAND
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Throughout the course of a 34-game season, a team will see many highs and lows. The Massachusetts hockey team is no exception to the rule. So far this season, the Minutemen (11-17-0, 8-13-0 Hockey East) have faced their fair share of both. Looking back, one of the highlights has to be the 2-1 victory they enjoyed over Vermont on Nov. 22.

This weekend the two schools will wrap up their season series as the No. 15 Catamounts (17-9-4 9-8-4 HEA) visit the Mullins Center for a pair of games on Friday and Saturday night. Both games are scheduled for 7 p.m.

In that game back in November, the Maroon and White were only able to muster a mere 11 shots on Catamount goalie Joe Fallon. That is a season low for a team that averages 27.8 shots per game. Freshman Chris Davis was able to seal the victory for the Minutemen with a late third-period goal.

Back when the Minutemen traveled to Burlington for the midweek match up just before Thanksgiving, their season was off to a rocky start. Before that win, UMass was 2-7 overall to begin the 2005-06 campaign.

On the flip side, UVM was out of the gates on fire in their first season in a new conference. At the time the Catamounts were the No. 5 team in the nation and were enjoying a 9-2 record.

Over the course of the past three months, a few things have changed. UVM has dropped ten spots in the national rankings and have been unable to sustain the level of play that fueled their 7-0 start to the season. In their last eight games the Catamounts are 2-5-1. However, that doesn't give UMass head coach Don Cahoon any comfort.

"They're a good solid team that has been nationally ranked for most of the season. There shouldn't be and certainly won't be any lack of respect for their ability," Cahoon said. "Just as they know about us, we know quite a bit about them. They've got some really good top end guys and they seem to play really good team defense."

For the Minutemen the past three months have been a roller-ercoaster ride. After beating Vermont in Burlington they took down another nationally ranked team in Colorado College, but then slipped into a lull just before and just after the winter break. Since returning to action UMass is 6-6 which includes big wins over New Hampshire and Boston College, but also includes disappointing defeats, twice at the hands of UMass-Lowell and Boston University.

"We know what makes us tick a whole lot better than we did then. We found a way to understand ourselves better," Cahoon said. "We need to do the things that we're proficient at and bring us success. That's been made very clear to us in some successes and failures that we've had."

Although this is UVM's inaugural year in the league, the Catamounts and Minutemen are hardly strangers to one another. The two schools have met on the ice 37 times since 1927 with the Catamounts holding a 23-10-4 advantage.

"[UVM has] been a team we've played since I've been here and a team I've competed against with different programs for many years in the past," Cahoon said. "They've got a strong tradition and hockey is very important to the university and the community. [They're] a perfect fit for our league."

NOTES: Earlier this week it was announced that UMass senior captain Marvin Degon is a finalist for the 54th Annual Walter Brown Award, which is given to the best American-born college hockey player in New England. This is the second consecutive year Degon has been nominated for the award.

"It's very well-deserved and he's had a great year," Cahoon said of his captain. "He's meant an awful lot to this team for four years and I can't imagine where we would be without him."

Minutewomen on fire

BY ERIC ATHAS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

There was much talk about streaks during the first half of the 2005-06 season for the Massachusetts women's basketball team — losing streaks. The Minutewomen lost four in a row between Dec. 1-10 and six in a row between Dec. 31 and Jan. 15. Since then, however, the chatter regarding the Minutewomen is now revolving around a different type of streak — the winning kind.

When UMass (9-14, 6-6 Atlantic 10) takes the hardwood against Xavier (17-7, 8-5 A-10) tonight, it will be looking for its fourth straight win, since knocking off Rhode Island Feb. 2 at the Ryan Center, and it would be its seventh win out of the last eight contests.

Coincidently, Xavier is also working on a streak of its own, winning five out of its last six.

On the other end of the spectrum, St. Bonaventure, which UMass will face Sunday at 2 p.m. at the Mullins Center, has dropped four straight games, capped off by a 62-41 loss to George Washington on Feb. 12.

With UMass putting up 57.4 points per game as a team this season, and Xavier averaging a whopping 71.7, the Minutewomen's fate will be left up to defensive execution.

"Our focus is defense, we've been focusing on defense all week," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said.

While Xavier has several weapons that it can utilize tonight, the name Tara Boothe is one that the entire A-10 fears.

Boothe is averaging and A-10-high 20.5 points per game, is second in the conference in rebounding with 8.9 per game and holds the best field goal percentage, with a mark of .512.

"We need to just limit [Boothe's] touches and need to be able to really focus on defense," Dacko said. "We need to not get in a run game with them, because we're not going to win that battle."

UMass looking to rebound

BY ROB GREENFIELD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The road trip began over a week ago. It involved planes, buses, a trip to sunny Florida, a double-back to the nation's capital, then a long ride to upstate New York.

Now, after the Feb. 12 contest against Florida State began the Massachusetts men's basketball team's (10-12, 5-6 Atlantic 10) southern journey, the Minutemen will conclude the longest road trip of the season against St. Bonaventure (7-16, 1-11 A-10) on Sunday at 2 p.m.

The Bonnies have just one win in the conference season and will be a significant step down fo UMass after Wednesday's game against the mighty George Washington Colonials.

This game, however, will not be a show-up-and-win affair for the Minutemen. They have suffered three straight losses to worthy opponents. They have played well in the last two games against the Seminoles and Colonials on the road, but didn't have enough gas to finish the job.

Now, on the last legs of a taxing road trip, the Minutemen face a down-and-out opponent that can take the role of spoiler if UMass doesn't take care of business on Sunday.

"We've been on the road a lot lately and that's something that concerns me," UMass coach Travis Ford said in a phone interview yesterday. "It's been a very tough and grueling schedule as far as how much we've been on the road. The biggest concern for me is that we respond and have enough energy after being on the road for so long."

After coming so close against GW — those who remember last year's upset would have had flashbacks — a game against a lesser opponent could be the perfect remedy to a rough stretch with hard losses and long days; or it could be an opportunity for the Minutemen to fall further from the winning path and play down to their competition.

"It is a grind. We're in a tough stretch," Ford said. "I think [the players are] doing well mentally and physically. They understand what's at stake, coming up we do have some games that we need to win. Hopefully, we can put all

Ford knows that this UMass team was beat by better teams in Florida St. and GW. But the Minutemen, by Ford's admission, played well in both contests and competed in games where most had written them off. It would have been easier for the UMass psyche if those two losses didn't come in the middle of an extended trip away from home, where constant travel is draining and staying in a routine can be a difficult task.

The Minutemen, despite having nothing to show for their efforts except two L's in the loss column, played good

The regular season is winding down for the Massachusetts ski team, as the Maroon and White competes in its final two events this weekend in New Hampshire.

Today the team travels to Mt. Sunapee for the Colby-Sawyer Carnival giant slalom. Tomorrow UMass will complete this year's carnival season at the St. Anslem's Carnival slalom.

With the regular season finished, the Minutemen and women will spend next weekend competing in both the NCAA and the Eastern Collegiate Ski Conference (ECSC) regionals for a chance to compete in the national events.

Last season's finale was momentous for UMass, as the men and women both had a second place finish in each event. The weekend was capped when Rush and Eliza Hawkins earned season MVP honors for the men and women, respectively, in the MacConnell division, named after former UMass coach Bill MacConnell.

The team hopes to have similar success this year, as both the men and women will need help to move up in the standings. The women have the better chance of advancing this weekend. They are currently second in the ECSC standings, just two points behind leader Boston College.

The men, however, have a steep hill to climb to reach any better than their current standing of third. The Minutemen are nine points behind first place Plymouth State, and seven back from Friday's host, second place Colby-Sawyer.

As the season begins to take its homestretch, the men's and women's track and field teams travel to Kingston, R.I. for the Atlantic 10 Championships on Saturday.

Since the meet is restricted to only those who qualified during the season, the men's team will send 28 athletes and the women will send 16.

Three of the men who will represent UMass are expected to do exceptionally well this weekend. Seniors Andy McCarron and Jon Korhonen and sophomore Sean Calicchio have been dominating performers all season long, and UMass coach Ken O'Brien had something to say about each one of them.

McCarron, who has been described as the team leader, is a 5,000-meter extraordinaire and has improved with almost every meet.

"Andy's been one of our most consistent runners in recent years," O'Brien said. "So we're looking forward to having a chance to put him in that race, and I'm sure he'll react to it like he has [at] the last several Conference Championship events."

3 students struck by car

Three students were hit by a car yesterday afternoon on the University of Massachusetts campus, according to UMass police.

Police said three women were crossing Massachusetts Ave. at the intersection of Sunset Ave. near the Southwest Residential Area at 4:40 p.m. when they were hit by a Nissan Maxima.

All three victims were transported to an area hospital. As of press time, two had been released and one was still being treated for a head injury. All of the victims were conscious when police arrived, UMass Police Sgt. Ian Cyr said.

Police withheld the identities of the victims as of press time as kin had not been notified.

There were three people in the car that struck the women, all of whom were uninjured.

Police identified the driver as Felicia Nitch, 18, of West Springfield. Nitch is a student at UMass. As of press time, she had not faced criminal charges related to the accident.

The two other passengers in the vehicle were only identified by police as students from Westfield State College.

Police said the accident is still under investigation. Drugs and alcohol do not appear to be factors in the accident, Cyr said.

"We are investigating environmental conditions … With respect that the sun may have played a factor in visibility," said Cyr, who added that the accident appeared to have occurred at a "low-speed."

Last Tuesday, two union workers were hit by cars while protesting outside the construction site of the new North Residential Area. The victims were identified as Stephen Keane and Daniel Redmond of Holyoke. They were treated at Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton for their injuries.

All of the car accidents remain under investigation.

Drivers hurt in auto crash

HADLEY — A college-aged woman was flown by helicopter to Baystate Medical Center in Springfield after the vehicle she was driving was involved in a head-on collision on Route 9 early yesterday morning, according to Hadley police.

The second driver, a male under 25 years of age, was taken to a nearby hospital by Amherst Fire Department, but his condition and the identities of both victims were unknown at press time, according to police.

The female driver was unconscious when authorities responded, and had suffered lower body injuries.

The accident occurred at 6:30 a.m. in front of the Hadley Garden Center, and closed Route 9 for the majority of the morning, while State Police investigated the accident. The cause of the accident was unknown at press time.

Hadley Police reported that the female driver was traveling east in her Chevrolet Cavalier, before it collided with the male driver's red Volkswagen, which is registered to Phillip Prouty of Feeding Hills.

The Cavalier was registered to Deborah Stano-Clement, whose address was unknown.

Hydraulic equipment was used to free both drivers from their vehicles, which were both destroyed.

Sweatshop workers speak out against Wal-Mart

BY JENNA MICHELI
UMASS STUDENT

Editor's note: This article is a special addition to the Massachusetts Daily Collegian. It was written by a UMass student, who attended an event at Mt. Holyoke College Feb. 5 that showcased the human rights abuses carried out by Wal-Mart.

"Wal-Mart is bad at every level," were the first words I heard at the International Wal-Mart Workers Speaking Tour that took place at Mount Holyoke College on Feb. 5.

I have never been a big fan of Wal-Mart, except for the fact that it's the only place where a college student — and most of the population — could possibly get laundry detergent that will last a month for $2.50. A person who buys products at such a cheap prices can't help but think, "This is just too good to be true," all while smiling back at the Wal-Mart's smiley face trademark.

Well, I have always hated to be the bearer of bad news but, it is too good to be true, not for the person who is buying that laundry detergent, but for the people on the other end of that low cost; the Wal-Mart workers.

The three people I heard speak at this tour were Damarys Meza of Nicaragua, Estela Orjuela of Columbia and Flory Arevalo of the Philippines. They each shared their experiences of working for companies that are producing goods for Wal-Mart and the hazardous, inhumane conditions they must work under. Stories of severely dirtied bathrooms, unattainable quotas and the physical pressures that are put on their bodies as a result of their work were the stories that filled the evening while I sat and absorbed these women's frustrations.

One of Wal-Mart's signature advertisements, calling attention to the store's low prices. Sweatshop workers have spoken out against the high cost of these low prices.

Meza, 28, works as a final inspector at the Wal-Mart-brand jeans company, Faded Glory and White Stag, making 39 cents an hour. She is an active union member and secretary for Free Trade. Meza told the crowd of about 80 how she is not allowed to go to the bathroom during her shift, which starts at 7 a.m. and ends at 5 p.m, and how she must always be on her best behavior due to the fact that she is constantly being watched because she is an activist in the union.

Meza also mentioned the fact that Wal-Mart used to demand 10,000 jeans a week from her factory, but now demands 20,000. She must inspect 1,000 jeans a day, which, if you break it down into the hours she works in her shift, is 100 jeans inspected per hour.

Meza also shared with us the fact that her factory only hires people under the age of 30 because they want young people with "agility." That makes a lot of sense since, in order for their quotas to be met, they need to work at the fastest speed possible from a human being. Since human beings are not machines, this leads to age discrimination. She also pointed out that if a woman gets pregnant, she is fired, putting pressure on the female workers to not start a family.

Meza explained other aspects of her workplace as well, including the dirty little secret behind Wal-Mart's code of conduct. The code, which describes a promise of ethical behavior towards the workers, was only printed in English. Posting the code became purposely self-defeating because Nicaragua's main language is Spanish. In addition, the printed code is locked in the manager's office, away from workers. The code of conduct is an outline for how Wal-Mart is supposed to act in the consumer market and can be held up in US courts if violated.

The Wal-Mart in Hadley has been the site of several protests in the past year, including one in which sweatshop workers spoke out against the conditions they've endured.

Flory Arevalo, 37, is from the Philippines, and also spoke out, describing many of the same working conditions as Meza. Arevalo works in a factory that makes blouses and sweaters for the brand No Boundaries, which sells its clothing in Wal-Mart stores around the country. She gets paid 62 cents an hour. Arevalo makes slightly more money than her coworkers because she is the secretary of the union in her factory; most factory workers make 46 cents an hour.

Not only is Arevalo not allowed to go to the bathroom, she also cannot get water during her work day. Her days consist of eight-hour shifts, and she is required to work 3 hours of overtime each day as well. However, she doesn't make any extra money by working overtime. Therefore, Arevalo's typical shift at the factory becomes a 12-hour shift, instead of an already tiring eight-hour shift.

Even though there is a union, the people at her factory do not get health benefits and many of the workers get sick due to the hazardous conditions they work under and the filth that accumulates in the factory that is not properly cleaned. Additionally, Wal-Mart is trying to get rid of the unions in the Philippines as we speak. Arevalo specified a health problem her factory went through in 2003, when many of her co-workers had contracted Hepatitis and were sent home with no pay or health care. At the end of her speech, Arevalo said she is not asking for much when it comes to her activism; all she wants is respect and equal pay for the work she puts into this factory and asked for help from American consumers with her efforts.

"We're not machines, we're human beings," she said.

Last to speak was Estela Orjuela from Columbia, who works for the cut-flower industry on a plantation owned by Dole, which sells 80 percent of their flowers to Wal-Mart. Orjuela told the crowd that she has been working 15 hours a day since December because Valentine's Day was coming up in February. Not only does she not get overtime pay, she also is on her feet for extended periods of time, while constantly performing repetitious movements with her hands as she cuts the flowers. As a result of the hard work, carpel tunnel syndrome runs rapid through the plantation.

Orjuela told us that when they complain about the pain they are experiencing due to the unrealistic quotas that are set, they are told by the managers that they are "good for nothing and don't want to work". Since it is cheaper for them to hire temporary workers, the workers at her plantation try not to complain, even though the pain is overbearing at times. Due to the temp employees' situation, Orjuela has tried to organize a union. When her managers found out, they told her that she didn't even know her rights and that she doesn't have anything to demand, due to her "perfect" working conditions.

When Orjuela arrived in the United States, the first thing she did was visit a Wal-Mart to see how much the flowers

U.S. calls for 'national unity government' in Iraq

BY ROBERT H. REID
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD — The U.S. ambassador delivered a blunt warning to Iraqi leaders Monday that they risk losing American support unless they establish a national unity government with the police and the army out of the hands of religious parties.

Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad delivered the warning as another 24 people, including an American soldier, died in a string of bombings, underscoring the need for the country to establish a government capable of winning the trust of all communities and ending the violence.

Such a government is also essential to the U.S. strategy for handing over security to Iraqi soldiers and police so the 138,000 U.S. troops can go home. But talks among Iraqi parties that won parliament seats in the Dec. 15 election have stalled over deep divisions among Shiites, Sunni Arabs and Kurds.

During a rare news conference, Khalilzad said division among the country's sectarian and ethnic communities was "the fundamental problem in Iraq," fueling the Sunni Arab-dominated insurgency and the wave of reprisal killings.

"To overcome this there is a need for a government of national unity," which "is the difference between what exists now and the next government," he said. The outgoing government is dominated by Shiites and Kurds.

Khalilzad said Iraq's next Cabinet ministers, particularly those heading the Interior and Defense ministries, "have to be people who are nonsectarian, broadly acceptable and who are not tied to militias" run by political parties.

Otherwise, he warned that "Iraq faces the risk of warlordism that Afghanistan went through for a period." Khalilzad was born in Afghanistan and served as U.S. envoy there.

To underscore his remarks, Khalilzad reminded the Iraqis that the United States has spent billions to build up Iraq's police and army and said "we are not going to invest the resources of the American people and build forces that are run by people who are sectarian" and tied to the militias.

British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw, who arrived in Baghdad late Monday, was expected to reinforce Khalilzad's message during meetings with Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari and other Iraqi leaders.

There was no response from al-Jaafari's government to Khalilzad's warning, but a prominent Shiite politician, Jalaladin al-Saghir, said the comments were "unacceptable" and constituted interference in the affairs of a sovereign state.

"We all want a national unity government and the U.S.

Austrian court convicts man of Holocaust denial

BY VERONIKA OLESEN
ASSOCIATED PRESS

VIENNA, Austria — Right-wing British historian David Irving pleaded guilty Monday to denying the Holocaust and was sentenced to three years in prison, even after conceding he wrongly said there were no Nazi gas chambers at the Auschwitz concentration camp.

Irving, handcuffed and wearing a navy blue suit, arrived in court carrying a copy of one of his most controversial books — "Hitler's War," which challenges the extent of the Holocaust.

"I made a mistake when I said there were no gas chambers at Auschwitz," Irving told the court before his sentencing, at which he faced up to 10 years in prison.

He also expressed sorrow "for all the innocent people who died during the Second World War."

But he insisted he never wrote a book about the Holocaust, which he called "just a fragment of my area of interest."

"In no way did I deny the killings of millions of people by the Nazis," testified Irving, who has written nearly 30 books.

Irving's lawyer immediately announced he would appeal the sentence.

"I consider the verdict a little too stringent. I would say it's a bit of a message trial," Elmar Kresbach said.

Irving appeared shocked as the sentence was read. Moments later, an elderly man who identified himself as a family friend called out, "Stay strong, David! Stay strong!" before he was escorted from the courtroom.

Irving, 67, has been in custody since his November arrest on charges stemming from two speeches he gave in Austria ambassador is no more eager than we are to reach such a government," al-Saghir told The Associated Press. "It is the Americans who push toward sectarianism by their ever-changing points of view. We feel uneasy about some of the U.S. agenda."

Al-Saghir said the Americans had installed former members of Saddam Hussein's Baath party in the Interior and Defense ministries and "Shiites are upset about this."

In the latest bloodshed, an American soldier was killed Monday by a roadside bomb near Karbala, a Shiite shrine city about 50 miles southwest of Baghdad. The death brought to at least 2,274 the number of members of the U.S. military to have died since the beginning of the Iraq war in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

A suicide bomber detonated an explosives belt on a bus Monday in Baghdad's Shiite district of Kazumiyah, killing 12 people and wounding 15, police said. Earlier, a bomb exploded next to tea stalls near Liberation Square in central Baghdad, killing at least four day laborers and wounding 14, police said.

In Mosul, 225 miles northwest of Baghdad, a suicide attacker blew himself up in a restaurant packed with policemen eating breakfast, killing at least five people and wounding 21, including 10 policemen, officials said.

Two more civilians died when a car bomb exploded in Madain, southeast of Baghdad, police said. Eleven people, including three women, were wounded.

A coalition of Shiite religious parties won 130 of the 275 seats in the new parliament. Although they have agreed in principle to a unity government, Shiite leaders insist their strong showing in the election gives them the democratic right to control key levers of power.

A Kurdish alliance won 53 seats and two Sunni Arab blocs together took 55 seats — a major increase over Sunni representation in the outgoing parliament. Iraqis have until mid-May to form a new government, but U.S. and Iraqi officials warn the process could take longer because of political differences.

Mistrust and bitterness among the communities run deep. Much of it is rooted in oppression of Shiites and Kurds by Saddam's Sunni-dominated regime and fanned by the current insurgency. Shiites and Kurds dominate the security services and most of the insurgents are Sunni Arabs.

Several Shiite parties are believed to control armed militias, some of which date back to the Iran-Iraq war of the 1980s when many Iraqi Shiites fled to Shiite-dominated Iran. Kurds maintain the biggest armed force — the peshmerga — which they maintain is the legitimate security force of their autonomous government in the north.

Shiites demand that Sunni Arab parties work actively against the insurgency. Sunnis insist on drawing a difference between "legitimate resistance" to foreign occupation and terrorism that targets civilians.

Kurds zealously guard the self-rule they have enjoyed since 1991, and many of them want to expand their autonomous region to oil centers around Kirkuk, claimed by Kurds, Arabs and Turkomen.

U.S. Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalizad, shown above, has spoken on behalf of the U.S. government, calling for a "national unity government" in Iraq.

She explained that in order to buy a bunch of the flowers she made, she would have to work for two and half days since she only gets 70 cents an hour. Man convicted for calling Holocaust a hoax in 1989 in which he was accused of denying the Nazis' extermination of 6 million Jews. He has contended that most of those who died at concentration camps such as Auschwitz succumbed to diseases such as typhus rather than execution.

The court convicted Irving after his guilty plea under the 1992 law, which applies to "whoever denies, grossly plays down, approves or tries to excuse the National Socialist genocide or other National Socialist crimes against humanity in a print publication, in broadcast or other media."

Austria was Hitler's birthplace and once was run by the Nazis.

Irving's trial came amid new — and fierce — debate over freedom of expression in Europe, where the printing and reprinting of unflattering caricatures of the Prophet Muhammad has triggered deadly protests worldwide.

Kreisbach said last month the controversial Third Reich historian was getting up to 300 pieces of fan mail a week from supporters around the world, and was writing his memoirs in addition to [illegible] the working title "Irving's Gulag."

Irving was arrested Nov. 11 in the southern Austrian province of Styria on a warrant issued in 1989. He was charged under a federal law that makes it a crime to publicly diminish, deny or justify the Holocaust.

Irving had tried to win his provisional release on $24,000 bail, but a Vienna court refused, saying it considered him a flight risk.

Within two weeks of his arrest, he asserted through his lawyer that he had come to acknowledge the existence of Nazi-era gas chambers. Before the trial began, Irving told reporters he now acknowledges that the Nazis systematically slaughtered Jews during World War II.

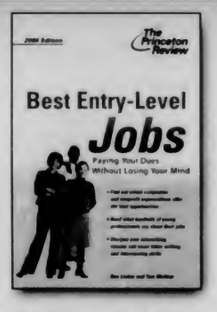
"History is like a constantly changing tree," he said.

In the past, however, he has claimed that Adolf Hitler knew little if anything about the Holocaust, and he has been quoted as saying there was "not one shred of evidence" the Nazis carried out their "Final Solution" to exterminate the Jewish population on such a massive scale.

Vienna's national court, where the trial is being held, ordered the balcony [illegible] to prevent projectiles from being thrown down at the bench, the newspaper Die Presse reported Sunday.

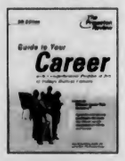
It quoted officials as saying they were bracing for Irving's supporters to give him the Nazi salute or shout out pro-Hitler slogans during the trial.

In 2000, Irving sued American Holocaust scholar Deborah Lipstadt for libel in a British court but lost. The presiding judge in that case, Charles Gray, wrote that Irving was "an active Holocaust denier .. anti-Semitic and racist."



Irving has had numerous run-ins with the law over the years.

In 1992, a judge in Germany fined him the equivalent of $6,000 for publicly insisting the Nazi gas chambers at Auschwitz were a hoax.



David Irving, shown above, was recently convicted of claiming that the extent of the Holocaust was much less than has been portrayed.

Bush proposes cut to the Perkins Loans

Thomas Skelly, director of Budget Service for the U.S. Department of Education, is a supporter of the proposal to cut the Perkins Loans.

By Bradley Wolyten
UWM Post (U. Wisconsin-Milwaukee)

MILWAUKEE — For the fourth year in a row, President George W. Bush has proposed cuts to education funding that will affect college access and affordability for students nationwide.

"For those students who still have unmet needs and families who can't afford to contribute, the Perkins Loans fill in the gap," said Bruce Caplin, national co-chair of the Coalition of Higher Education Assistance Organizations Grassroots Action Network.

A lobbying firm for schools and other organizations who work to promote access to higher education, COHEAO focuses on legislative and regulatory advocacy for federal Perkins and other campus-based student loan programs.

The Perkins Loan is awarded to students with exceptional financial need. The school acts as the lender using a limited pool of funds provided by the federal government.

"The Perkins Loan is the best student loan available," Caplin said. It is a subsidized loan, with the interest paid by the federal government during the time a student is in school and the nine-month grace period that follows. There are no fees and the interest rate is five percent over the 10-year repayment period.

The amount a student receives is determined by the school's financial aid office. For undergraduate students, it is capped at $4,000 per year with a cumulative limit of $20,000. Graduate students are capped at $6,000 per year with a cumulative limit of $40,000.

Bush's budget completely eliminates the Perkins Loan program, a program that offers benefits other loans do not. If enacted, more than 670,000 student borrowers would lose out on partial or total loan forgiveness if they became teachers, law enforcement officers or if they serve in the military.

It is "vital" that students announce a public and vocal opposition to Bush's proposal, Caplin said.

"Congress is going to hear from student loan professionals at the school because they're the closest to the fight," Caplin said. "Certainly members of Congress will listen to them, but the folks they will listen to the most are students who are Perkins Loans borrowers."

If elected officials don't hear from students and faculty, they will assume it's not an important issue, Caplin said.

But not everyone views the elimination of Perkins Loans as a detriment to students.

"Students, of course, are taxpayers, and will be, so they have to look at how the government spends all of its money (and) what priorities are being funded," said Tom Skelly, director of Budget Service for the U.S. Department of Education.

Loans other than Perkins Loans are available in a variety of denominations and amounts, Skelly said.

"Why do you have a separate Perkins Loan program when you already have all these other programs providing the same kind of service?" Skelly said.

The Direct Loan service provided by the Department of Education offers loans with an interest rate that will increase to 6.5 percent July 1, still 1.5 percent higher than Perkins Loans.

Banks and other lenders have high interest rates and many begin collecting immediately after the loan is given, Caplin said.

"You're talking about interest rates that are essentially credit card rates," Caplin said. "You don't stand a chance of paying that back."

But the federal budget views Perkins Loans as inefficient, Skelly said. "Most of the Perkins loans go to maybe 1,000 undergraduate students."

According to the Coalition of Higher Education Assistance Organizations, there are about 1,600 colleges and universities that participate in the Perkins Loans program. More than 600,000 students received Perkins Loans in 2005, and in 2004 that number was 70,000 students higher.

"In the big scheme of things, Perkins (Loans) ... pack a big punch," Caplin said.

The U.S. Department of Education estimated that some $7 billion in loans are outstanding and that it will take 10 years for students to pay that back.

Bush's budget also proposed increasing Pell Grants by $100 each year for the next five years.

"So that would be at most $500, while the average Perkins loan is $2,000," Caplin said. "When you do the math, the net loss to students (in federal and each year) would be at least $1,500."

"Folks are trying to do away with it because they want the money for deficit reduction," Caplin said.

But Skelly of the U.S. Department of Education disagreed. "You could say it's paying off the deficit, paying for special education, agriculture subsidiaries, the war in Iraq; it doesn't have any tag that goes with it," he said.

Federal estimates for the amount of money in the federal Perkins Loans program ranges from $3 billion to $9 billion.

Since 1958, $7.8 billion in federal contributions have appropriated more than $25.7 billion in loans to students. That's roughly 25 million awards in aid, Caplin said.

"It's not a matter of affordability," Caplin said. "It's a matter of access. If this program goes away, that will deny access to tens of thousands of students."

The University of Wisconsin-Madison loaned more than $13.5 million in Perkins Loans to more than 5,200 students during the 2004-2005 academic year, the most recent year for which information is available.

"We're not too pleased about the proposal (to eliminate Perkins Loans)," said Susan Fischer, director of the Office of Student Financial Services at UW-Madison.

"(Eliminating Perkins Loans) would leave a hole in students' awards that we couldn't fill," Fischer said. "We'd be looking for alternative loans that are more expensive than any federal loan." Perkins Loans have benefited students for almost 50 years as a "good, solid" program, Fischer said.

"It's a good, solid loan program," Fischer said. "Why you would want to eliminate a proven program that is currently working well and smoothly is beyond me."

Police were called to Townehouse 88 on 50 Meadow St. on Friday at 12:43 a.m. for reports of noise violations. Loud music and bass were reported coming from the residence. It took two officers to clear the house of party goers after the music was turned down.

Reports of a suspicious male lurking around the Boulders apartment complex was placed at 10:01 a.m. The caller stated the person was a Hispanic male creeping around the bushes and looking into the windows of lower level apartments. He was described as having black hair, a thin mustache and wearing maroon pants and a dark blue, puffy jacket. Maintenance was alerted of the suspicious male and has reportedly seen the subject before.

Police arrived at 5:50 p.m. to the Triangle Family Dental of 203 Triangle St. in response to an alarm that went off in the kitchen. The police deemed it a false alarm and blamed a bunch of balloons moving through the kitchen for triggering it.

Police were called to Bertucci's of 51 East Pleasant St. in response to a disturbance report. Police arrived at 9:33 p.m. and were told of problems with a customer who refused to leave when asked. Upon police's arrival, the male ran out the door to the back parking lot. He was estimated to be 18 to 20 years old, wearing a gray sweat suit, and is reported to be the boyfriend of an employee who was not working that night.

Police were called to 73 Rolling Green of 422 Belchertown Rd. at 10:15 p.m. in response to noise complaints. Warning citations were issued to Christopher Watkins, 20, and Christopher Rahn, 22, for noise and having an unlicensed keg. The crowd of roughly 100 people, who were gathered in the apartment, was asked to leave and the residents were advised of no further warnings.

Saturday February 18

Brian J. Anderson, 24, of 11 Fernwood St., North Andover was arrested for OUI and a marked lanes violation at 2:23 a.m. The incident occurred at 200 Pine St. when a car driving down the wrong side of the road, struck another vehicle. There were no injuries reported and the two cars were towed to Amherst Towing and College St. Motors.

Steven A. Micel, 23, of 50 Meadow St., 13, and Kevin F. McNeil, 23, of 70 Shields Rd. in Mashpee were arrested at 2:20 a.m. for unlawful noise, a violation of town bylaws.

Police were called to 1040 North Pleasant St. at 1:27 p.m. for reports of a stolen vehicle. The vehicle, a white 2001 Mitsubishi Eclipse had been parked overnight at Puffton Village and allegedly stolen at some point that night. The vehicle, equipped with LoJack, was later recovered at 2:22 p.m.

Language study may be crucial for nation

By Meagan Steiner
Daily Pennsylvanian (U. Penn)

PHILADELPHIA — Struggling through "Intermediate Arabic" may do much more than fulfill graduation requirements. The Committee for Economic Development, an independent reorganization that studies ways of promoting economic development in America, released a report Feb. 9 with recommendations on how to enhance diplomacy, national security and economic growth.

The report calls for increased foreign-language and culture study at all levels of education and for more study-abroad opportunities at colleges and universities.

"Among the reasons that the U.S. has gotten into so much trouble in our activities abroad is lack of knowledge -- our ignorance of the cultures, the histories, the languages," said Committee Trustee John Brademas, president emeritus of New York University and a former Indiana congressman, who co-chaired the effort.

Finance professor Jamshed Ghandhi said that while foreign-language and culture education do not directly affect the economy, Americans must understand the thoughts and behaviors of others to succeed in global relations.

Ghandhi added that studying abroad, which the report encouraged, is central to this.

"You cannot hope to understand a culture ... effectively unless you have lived in it on a day-to-day basis, not as a tourist who wanders in and out of international hotels," he said.

Eastern Languages and Civilizations professor Joseph Lowry said that foreign language proficiency is not necessary for the U.S. economy because English is so widely studied in other nations. However, he noted its importance for those involved in international business dealings.

At Penn, Lowry said, there is a rising number of students studying Arabic, and these students are more likely to be interested in the language for potential careers in government, intelligence and foreign policy.

College sophomore Suleyman Saleem said that he is learning Arabic because it is applicable to current and future politics and economics.

"In a post-9/11 world, it's very important that the West and the Middle East get along and everyone focuses on how to keep peace," he said.

The report cited Arabic, Chinese, Hindi, Japanese, Korean, Farsi, Russian and Turkish as critical languages for national security.

[illegible] Marines were eager to discover the [illegible] detected by seismic sensors.

A Malaysian team using sound-detection gear picked up noises, too.

"We have a sound," said Sahar Yunos of the Malaysia Disaster and Rescue Team. "Knocking, something like that."

A rescue dog also stopped three times at one spot away from where rescue workers were digging.

There was no visible sign of the school. Rescue workers were digging at two places — one where the school was believed to have sat close to the mountain, the other 200 yards down the hill, where the landslide could have carried it.

Dozens of U.S. Marines and Philippine soldiers, along with local miners, were digging in a watery, boulder-strewn spot around the school's original site, using shovels on the muck and moving it with body bags, while draining the murky water in large bottles.

The search was a painstaking process as the crews went yard by yard. At one of the highest points, local troops planted a Philippine flag.

The Marines were from the five-man Third Intelligence Ground Sensor platoon, accompanied by 15 armed Marines.

They deployed nine seismic sensors that can detect vibrations underground. With everyone standing still, one man then used a steel bar to hit on a rock several times and waited for any kind of response underground.

Four sensors detected some "noise" or vibration, but the men could not tell what it was.

They were followed by the 15-man Malaysian team using sensor gear called Delsar and employing similar techniques.

Five Taiwanese, who brought heat-imaging equipment, arrived to check for signs of life, too. Rescuers radioed for water pumps and floodlights to continue working after dark.

President Bush called Philippines President Gloria Macapagal Arroyo Monday to express sympathy for the disaster.

"The president offered our sincerest condolences over the loss of life," his press secretary, Scott McClellan, told reporters as the president traveled to the Midwest to make a policy speech on energy issues.

Some officials were talking about leaving the village as a massive cemetery, similar to tsunami-ravaged areas elsewhere in Southeast Asia where digging out bodies was simply too difficult and dangerous. With no one left to claim them, unidentified bodies already are being buried in mass graves.

Search for miners continues

By Olga R. Rodriguez

SAN JUAN DE SABINAS, Mexico — Emergency crews using picks, shovels and their hands tunneled feverishly through dirt, wood, metal and rock Monday in an attempt to reach 65 coal miners trapped by a gas explosion 600 feet underground.

Priests and pastors above led hundreds of the miners' friends and relatives in prayer for the men trapped by Sunday morning's explosion at the Pasta de Conchos mine near the town of San Juan de Sabinas, 85 miles southwest of Eagle Pass, Texas.

Women wept openly and swayed with their arms in the air as the religious leaders spoke, and men wiped tears from their eyes.

"We are waiting for a miracle from God," said Norma Vitela, whose trapped husband, Jose Angel Guzman, had previously told her of problems with gas in the mine. She said the father of four, who earns $75 a week, could not afford to quit.

The trapped men had carried only six hours of oxygen, but officials said they believed a ventilation system that uses huge fans to pump in fresh air and suck out dangerous gases was still working.

Juan Rebolledo, vice president of international affairs for mine owner Grupo Mexico, said oxygen tanks were scattered throughout the site, but it was impossible to know if the trapped miners had access to any of them.

Thirty hours of digging had pushed rescue teams 400 yards into the mine, about 100 yards from where two conveyor belt operators were believed to be trapped, said Sergio Robles, director of emergency services for Coahuila state.

But others were thought to be trapped as far as one to three miles from the mine's entrance.

Robles said rescuers avoided using electric gas-powered machinery because of the presence of explosive gases.

At least a dozen workers who were near the entrance at the time of the explosion were able to escape. They were treated for broken bones and burns.

Asked if he believed there were more survivors, Robles said: "It would be difficult because of the presence of gas. But we are holding out hope of finding someone alive."

President Vicente Fox's chief spokesman, Ruben Aguilar, said Monday that "the government has a lot of hope that everyone will get out alive."

Robles said the roof of the mine was better reinforced after 400 yards, giving rescuers hope that they might be able to advance more quickly.

Worried family members held an all-night vigil at the site, huddling near bonfires and wrapped in blankets to protect against the bitter cold. Some pitched tents, while others slept on small cots or upright in plastic chairs.

After the sun rose, entire families with children in tow huddled outside the mine's gates to wait for the latest news.

"The only thing we want is information and all they tell us is that they don't know," said a sobbing Yadira Gallegos, whose 28-year-old brother-in-law, Jesus Martinez, was just finishing his first week at the mine.

"What we want is for them to tell us what is happening and if they have advanced or not," said Francisco Ordonez, 41, whose 23-year-old brother, Jose Alfredo Ordonez, and a cousin were still trapped in the mine. "People are starting to get desperate."

The explosion occurred about 2:30 a.m. Sunday as the miners were in the middle of their overnight shift.

Consuelo Aguilar, a spokeswoman for the National Miners' Union, said there had been concern over safety conditions in Grupo Mexico mines. She called for an investigation into the cause of the accident and the responsibility of company officials.

Rebolledo said safety conditions met Mexican government requirements as well as international standards "but accidents can always happen."

He said the union had raised no major disagreements over safety in annual meetings with the company and mine administrator Ruben Escudero denied any company negligence, saying, "These mines can't operate if they don't meet the established minimum requirements."

Pedro Camarillo, a federal labor official unrelated to Olivia Camarillo, told reporters during a news conference that officials found nothing unusual during a routine evaluation on Feb. 7.

As well as mining coal, Grupo Mexico is the world's third-largest copper producer, with operations in Mexico, Peru, and the United States.

Coahuila's worst modern mining disaster occurred in 1969, when more than 153 miners were killed in a pit at the village of Barroteran. In 2001, another 12 people died in an accident at a mine near Barroteran.

Vocalizing on the wrong notes

David B. Lawrence

If you read the opinion and news pages in this paper, you might think that students here at the University of Massachusetts are irate over a recent increase in student fees that was passed by the University's board of trustees.

Don't be so easily fooled.

There is a vocal minority of students here that likes to be angry. This semester the target of their anger happens to be the Board of Trustees. I'd like to make it clear that the board should not take this anger seriously. It is nothing personal, factual, logical, or political. This group of students, centered around the SGA, schizophrenically chooses something to rage against each semester, then attacks it with impressive, though unfounded, passion and anger— leaving petty details like classes and the handling of appropriate student government business by the wayside.

I've seen this pattern recur too many times. As a columnist, I have the unfortunate duty to stay up to date, and to occasionally weigh in on whatever issues are upsetting the vocal minority that likes to shout. Last semester it was Vice Chancellor Michael Gargano and Chancellor John Lombardi, who incurred their random wrath. Prior to that, student government member Patrick Higgins was the unfortunate victim of the UMass lynch mob.

> Today we have to wonder, are the members of the Board of Trustees 'rats'? No. Do they have the best interests of the University of Massachusetts, and of its student body, in mind? Yes, of course they do.

Moving further back, loud complaints about book prices, election policies, flag flying, football playing soldiers, abortion demonstrations, and appointed Senate seats have been made with fervor.

Was Higgins a KKK member? No, the party in student offices was out of line but the drawing was taken too far out of context. Is Chancellor Lombardi elitist? No, just because he wants UMass to be an 'elite institution' (a very, very good thing) doesn't mean he is an 'elitist' (a bad thing).

Those have been the questions of the past. Today we have to wonder, are the members of the Board of Trustees 'rats'? No. Do they have the best interests of the University of Massachusetts, and of its student body, in mind? Yes, of course they do.

If the vocal minority genuinely cared about UMass, and thought about the facts, they would see that raising costs to keep up with inflation is necessary if we don't want to cut services. If the UMass lynch mob listened to the Board of Trustees, they would agree that since we've raised fees less than other New England flagship schools, we're not doing so bad comparatively. If the angry few looked at federal financial aid policies, they'd see that raising costs doesn't affect the price to the poorest students, because aid and loans will increase to cover the difference.

Of course the Board of Trustees isn't composed of 'rats'. Of course they have our interests, the students' interests, in mind. Hopefully, they also know that the angry few don't speak for the students. Hopefully they realize that the vocal minority blows a lot of hot air, and this time it happens to be in their direction. Hopefully they'll forgive us calling them 'rats'... it's just that time of the semester.

I do wonder about the issues that have been missed that are actually worth getting angry about: Eduardo Bustamante promised us textbook rentals in his campaign, even though the contract between UMass and Follett is public. We've had single digit voter turnout in student elections. The Massachusetts State Legislature underfunds our campus, but out of stubbornness student leaders have rejected offers from the trustees to work together and lobby for more funding. The student newspaper is now under the financial supervision of the student government.

Occasionally I am even compelled to wonder how much good all of this passion and energy could do for the students here at UMass, if it were rationally directed. If the vocal minority took an honest look at our situation, our student services, our student government, and set about to improve those things by working with the administration rather than against it, so much progress could be made. We have a group of hard working men and women in the administration, who sacrifice their time and energy for the students on this campus. We could do great things working together with them.

They shouldn't have to read the things that have been written about them on these pages lately. Lombardi works hard for us. Gargano works hard for us. The trustees work hard for us. It isn't fair that we direct such hateful speech towards them, particularly when it is completely unfounded. Let's save our anger for the things that matter. Let's do some good for UMass.

Kicking them when they're down

Mike Sances

I could tell you what I really think about rioting over a cartoon, or about religion in general, but it seems to me a little too easy to criticize the people way over on the other side of the planet, or to focus on horrible situations over which we have no control, and thus no responsibility.

I hear the monotone of the intelligentsia and the muted exclamations of the punditocracy, and they all say the same thing: that we are witnessing a "clash of civilizations" between East and West, or that the real battle is between moderate and radical Islam. It's a great way to feel good about ourselves, and to forget about the war or Abu Ghraib, but it's a terrible way to improve the world.

I was recently informed that I have the right to print virtually any profanity I desire on these pages, with the exception of the "F word," whose latter three characters would appear as asterisks. As I understand it, the Constitution also protects my right to write a column asserting that Arabs are fundamentally subhuman. But I'm not going to do either of these things, for what one hopes are obvious reasons.

Yet it is not at all obvious that printing a cartoon denigrating the Prophet Mohammed, though well within our rights, should not be done. The contradiction smells like a double standard, and the double standard smells, to me at least, like racism.

But let's first examine another double standard concerning free speech. Brendan O'Neill, deputy editor of the contrarian online journal Spiked, wrote an interesting column on this subject that was reprinted in the December 29, 2005 issue of the Christian Science Monitor. In it, O'Neill compares the ostensibly similar cases of Orhan Pamuk, a Turkish novelist who was jailed for reminding his countrymen about the Armenian genocide; and David Irving, a British historian jailed by Austria for asserting that the Holocaust never happened. The major difference between the two cases was that Pamuk's attracted international support, while Irving could find no serious defenders. "If we truly believe in freedom of speech," wrote O'Neill, "then we must defend Irving as vigorously as we defend Pamuk."

On one level, O'Neill was right

> Free speech is clearly a complicated animal, and it would probably be impossible to formulate some universal standard we could apply to every conceivable situation. Enter the magic that is judgment...

certainly, the right to free speech means nothing if it does not mean a right to say something unpopular, even atrocious. But context matters, as do consequences: as one reader pointed out in a letter responding to O'Neill's piece, denying the Holocaust in Austria, in light of its history and its geography, would be tantamount to needlessly shouting "Fire!" in a crowded theatre, prohibited by law in the United States. Denying the Holocaust in, say, England, would be a different matter.

Free speech is clearly a complicated animal, and it would probably be impossible to formulate some universal standard we could apply to every conceivable situation. Free speech is clearly a complicated animal, and it would probably be impossible to formulate some universal standard we could apply to every conceivable situation. Enter the magic that is judgment in cases like the Danish cartoons, as in the case of Irving, we can't allow ourselves to be lazy and to fall back on the law. We must instead ask ourselves if printing such cartoons is appropriate, considering both the social and cultural context, as well as what the consequences of printing them might be.

At this point, those consequences are readily apparent, and include not only the quiet offense of millions, which have already led to several deaths worldwide. It is not "letting the terrorists win" to refuse to publish the cartoons (which I doubt anyone would be advocating absent the violent reaction), and in fact no one was back in September, when they were first printed) – it is merely common sense.

And it is common decency. These riots did not happen in a vacuum, after all, the context is that in the past five years the "advanced" countries have invaded two predominantly Arab nations, Afghanistan and Iraq. Meanwhile, anti-Arab hate crimes have continued since the attacks of 2001, as well as since the bombings in London this past summer. In short, Arabs and Muslims have been undergoing racist oppression for years in the West, as well as facing Western-sponsored state repression in their native countries. This was true even before 9/11, but it's gotten worse since. Printing these cartoons, which we know will be read as a giant slap in the face by Muslims the world over, only adds insult to injury. That's a fact that's got nothing to do with riots.

Reflections on alcohol policy

Ed Cutting

The problem I have with the sophomoric new alcohol policy is that everyone in Whitmore appears to have forgotten that Americans rebel against stupid rules.

Yes, UMass has an alcohol problem. It isn't exactly fun to be in a place where drunken yahoos urinate in dormitory hallways or spin tires in the parking lot. But we already have rules and laws to deal with these sorts of things. Wouldn't it be better for UMass to actually go after the two percent of the students who are causing these problems rather than to continue to harass the 98 percent of us, who simply are trying to get an education notwithstanding the indifferent and often adversarial university?

There are real fourteenth Amendment issues of "due process" and "equal protection" raised when housing officials are free to define anything they damn well please as a violation of this new policy. And how long will it be before the kids who stack beer cans in dorm windows realize that they are actually engaging in symbolic political speech and go to the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) or Foundation for Individual Rights in Education (FIRE) and bring a First Amendment suit against UMass?

There is a big difference between a keg of beer and a wooden table. There is a big difference between buying beer for half the dorm and having a beer company poster of a cute girl (or boy) on your wall. All of these are now considered "alcohol violations" with equal sanctions. Does anyone in Whitmore understand why I am using the word "sophomoric" to describe this policy?

It also ignores the fact that drugs now are a bigger problem than alcohol. Students are dying from drug overdoses, not alcohol. A bag of heroin is now cheaper than a six pack of Bud Lite and far easier to conceal. Forget banning ping pong balls, we need to ban heroin and cocaine.

The Town of Amherst also needs to address the fact that most of the drug dealing gang members whom Police Chief Scott drove out of Holyoke now live in the South Amherst apartment complexes. Student Affairs needs to realize that while it isn't fun to confront potentially violent offenders enforcing the existing rules is a whole lot more effective than making new ones. Sophomoric regulations will never affect the problematic two percent, all they will do is incite rebellion amongst everyone else.

Doesn't the generation that came of age during the turbulent '60s remember its own college days? It was pre-marital sex rather than underage drinking but the generational conflict was essentially similar and UMass attempted to impose chastity via fiat. It worked really well then and it will work equally well now. Why exactly does anyone think that brute force will be more effective in 2006 than it was in 1966?

> Academic freedom can not exist in a caged gulag; the elimination of student rights will destroy the UMass experience and turn this place into nothing more than a more expensive version of an on-line college.

With the new federal requirement that students repay financial aid awards if they don't complete the semester, suspended students today face consequences similar to those of an earlier era, who knew that they would be drafted if they didn't stay in college. Historians tell us that it was the draft threat that actually fueled the riots then. Does anyone truly not expect history to repeat itself?

And why is it that someone in the war zone of Iraq has more civil rights than a UMass student?

"In loco parentis" is inherently stupid. It existed before the era of civil rights, a time when women were fired upon pregnancy and employers posted signs stating that "Irish Catholics Need Not Apply." The age of adulthood was 21 instead of 18 and college students were legally considered the wards of their parents, the university the adoptive parent of these children.

We are not going back to an era where college students aren't allowed credit cards anymore than we are going back to one that banned birth control devices. Students won't tolerate being treated as children anymore than blacks will tolerate being told to sit in the back of the bus. What Dr. Gargano fails to understand is that he is confronting a civil rights movement that hasn't yet congealed into a coherent message, respecting the rights of others would gain him respect.

Even if it is logistically possible for UMass to maintain the martial law environment, even if it is possible to increase repression without exacerbating resentment (as happened to the British in Northern Ireland), the well-intended people supporting this rape of student rights will find that they have destroyed what they valued most. Academic freedom can not exist in a caged gulag; the elimination of student rights will destroy the UMass experience and turn this place into nothing more than a more expensive version of an online college.

One learns at least as much outside the classroom as inside it. Without the freedom to make bad choices (and to learn from the consequences) how is one to learn to make good ones? Alcohol is present in the business world and wouldn't we rather kids make mistakes here where the consequences are far less? And what are the social consequences of a generation of young people being taught that might makes right and that it is acceptable to oppress the powerless, what will they do when they get into positions of power in the future?

And if someone would have a polite conversation with those little darlings who found it cute to squeal tires at 2 a.m. the other night, we all would greatly appreciate it.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

YES YOU CAN-NABIS

The decriminalization of marijuana in Massachusetts is quickly becoming a reality. Last week the state committee on Mental Health and Substance Abuse voted 6-1 in favor of sending a decrim bill to the House and Senate for a vote. This bill will make simple possession of marijuana (under 28.5 grams) a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine of $250 (maximum).

You cannot be arrested, it will no longer be a felony, and you would not risk losing financial aid as a student under the Higher Education Act as you do now. There is still a long way to go before this bill becomes law, but drug law reform in this state has never been closer. The UMass Cannabis Reform Coalition has been supporting this bill throughout the year by gamering signatures and a letter campaign informing our legislators about where we stand on this issue.

Within the month, we will be lobbying personally at the statehouse for this bill and another medical marijuana bill coming up for a vote soon. If you're tired of seeing people get busted for pot or just tired of being a paranoid stoner, we urge you to visit our office in Room 322 in the Student Union, see our table in the campus center concourse, or come to our weekly meetings on Monday nights at 7 p.m. at the office (this week's meeting will be tonight due to the holiday) and help us fight the good fight.

'JUBA' OF ARABIA

"I'm going to give George Bush a small present. I have nine bullets, with each I'll shoot someone and, before your eyes, I'll give the present to Bush," says the masked gunman as he points his sniper rifle from the back of his van, talking at the camera. The video camera rolls as he tilts the rifle (an Iraqi-designed Dragunov) towards his target. The targets appear to be either American or Iraqi security forces. The sniper then shoots nine targets.

They call him "Juba."

He is supposedly a member of the Iraqi insurgency who claims to have killed hundreds of Iraqi and US soldiers. The sniper fires only once before moving from his position leaving behind a note and one shell casing. The note found says: "What has been taken in blood cannot be regained except by blood" and signed by the "Baghdad Sniper." These items were only found after the US forces searched buildings for some time.

Juba's existence has not been confirmed by any military source, claiming he is only an urban legend. US soldiers have been led to believe that each sniper attack was committed by the same person who is what gave rise to the name "Juba," though others claim it is actually many snipers.

Some tapes recently surfaced that shows the supposed Juba talking to the camera as he aims his weapon and allegedly shoots nine victims with one shot. But the camera doesn't show if the victim has actually died. All one hears is a gunshot which is edited in. Most of those videos are shot from a hand camera on the ground, not from the actual sniper's position. It's just the same thing insurgents do with mortar attacks.

So what should we believe is that there is one man out there killing a supposed 149 times? In a propaganda context it doesn't matter at all. It could be one man or 10 or if he even exists outside these videos. It's just a hero for the Iraqi insurgency to rally around. Every side has heroes. But from a realistic point of view, this Juba is really a face given to a number of insurgent snipers.

Even the video is incredibly faked. There's no way someone could take out nine soldiers without notice and for them all to be instant kills. All that was needed was for one of them to just be injured, call out "Sniper!" and the whole encampment would be under alert. The sniper would also need nobody to hear any bullets hitting, nobody to hear any grunts or death noises from soldiers getting hit, nobody to notice any of the fallen bodies, and then do that nine times in a row.

This all goes to show that when the United States leaves Iraq, I wouldn't be surprised at all if civil war between the Iraqi insurgency and the Iraqi Security Forces ensues and it all goes back to hell.

Poor script plagues 'Freedomland'

By Jake Monte

If you see a trailer, and can't read who the praise is attributed to because it's written in small print, and the shot of the quote lasts for a millisecond, it's most likely Wireless Magazine. Audiences haven't quite wised up to it yet, because now Sony Pictures is advertising "Freedomland" with quotes from Wireless Magazine, banking on the hope that moviegoers don't know the unreliable reviewer.

But as we can now predict like clockwork, "Freedomland" is terrible. Fortunately, reading this review guarantees you a ticket out of an hour-and-a-half of misery. The first half-hour isn't quite misery inducing – the film is two hours long – because during that first half hour, we are quietly being led into hell by a magician that has us blindfolded.

"Freedomland"
Directed by Joe Roth
Starring Samuel L. Jackson Julianne Moore Edie Falco
Columbia Pictures
Rated R
112 mins.
Grade D

That magician is director, Joe Roth, and his magic act is to keep us interested with enough cuts to put MTV to shame, a hand-held camera and extremely dramatic acting. It creates the illusion of a film that, while very flawed, may turn out to be interesting.

But when Roth drops the camera tricks, the film is revealed in all its horrific inferiority. The story is about Brenda Martin (Julianne Moore), a suspiciously hysterical woman, who stumbles into the Dempsy Medical Center with blood on her hands. She recounts her story of the night's events to Detective Lorenzo Council (Samuel L. Jackson). He listens to her tell of a carjacking in an isolated section of town where she could only have been to get drugs. She has a history of drug addiction but claims she was only looking for a shortcut. Then, as if having forgotten to mention it, she finally tells him her son was in the car. Karen Collucci (Edie Falco), gets involved as an activist who helps find missing children. The group of them decide that the only place a child could have been dropped off and not been found for quite some time is in Freedomland, an abandoned home for abused children.

As the film unfolds, it becomes clear early that the audience is not going to go along with it. Her son could have been kidnapped by aliens for all we care. While it may have made an interesting pitch, the film doesn't have enough intelligence to command our attention. Dialogue like, "Brenda, I want to find your son," makes the audience feel like saying, "Tell us something we don't know."

The film, with its melodramatic acting and annoying mysteriousness, feels like it's on a few too many cups of coffee. But what the director and actors are so anxious about and trying to compensate for Is the unfocused story that manages to get tangled up In a race conflict between two towns, Dempsy and Gannon, which has nothing to do with anything.

Julianne Moore, while admittedly a wonderful actress, gives a thoroughly confusing performance. The same is true of Samuel L. Jackson. The simple fact is that the lines don't work. Where the script is at fault and where the acting is the problem is a difficult distinction to draw. Both performances are uneven. Julianne Moore's ability to mold herself into a completely different character is impressive But at one point she has to tell Lorenzo she loves him. The line comes out of the blue and left most of the theater laughing. We should have seen some evidence of this "love" earlier in her performance.

"Freedomland" is like an annoying child who thinks he or she can dance and is screaming, "Watch me! Watch me!" The child can't relax and let the act speak for itself because the act is terrible. There hasn't been a film this bad since Samuel L. Jackson's "The Man." Make a note to self: "Read reviews before seeing another Samuel L. Jackson film. He apparently doesn't know how to pick scripts." Wireless Magazine said "Freedomland" "has enough twists and turns to leave you breathless." That may be true, but only from laughing at its stupidity.

Jazzy piano trio The Bad Plus plays to variety of audiences

By Walter Tunis

Where are lines of allegiance drawn between jazz and rock when an instrumental trio is as comfortable playing "Iron Man" as it is "Ms Funny Valentine"?

How do you tag a piano, bass and drums unit that is equally at home at pop gatherings like Lollapalooza as it is in the hallowed jazz confines of New York's Village Vanguard?

For The Bad Plus, such labeling can be as divisive and short-sighted as favoring the sort of audience it plays to.

"Audiences can be different depending on the environment," said Bad Plus bassist Reid Anderson recently by phone while awaiting a flight to Spain at New York's Kennedy Airport. "But we don't discriminate. It's not fair to judge beforehand what's going to work for an audience and what won't."

"To me, music expresses emotion and feeling. It's the whole idea of imagination. 'What can you create?' 'What can you sound like?' Those are really good questions to ask yourself when you're writing music."

Though the piano trio is one of the more storied band formats in jazz, Anderson, drummer David King (both Minnesota natives) and pianist Ethan Iverson (originally from Wisconsin), largely set aside tradition when exploring the music that has surfaced on four fine albums for Columbia – a major label hardly accustomed to recording and promoting instrumental music by an up-and-coming band.

"We have no particular reverence for the traditional roles of the instruments in a piano trio," Anderson said. "We are truly interested in being ourselves. Our music is based more on the fact that we're friends. If we played different instruments, we would still be playing together."

"That's why it's very important to us that The Bad Plus be a band. It's not like the leader/sidemen model one hears so often. This is our music. It comes from each one of us."

The Bad Plus's beginnings can be traced back to when King heard Anderson sing in a junior high rock band over 20 years ago. Though The Bad Plus was formally christened in 1990, the three members devoted considerable time to separate projects before a self-titled indie debut album surfaced on a Spanish record label in 2001.

Pop and rock inspirations regularly surfaced in its choice of cover material (Blondie's "Heart of Glass," Black Sabbath's aforementioned "Iron Man," Aphex Twin's "Flim"). But the band's original work revealed a volcanic and purposely democratic jazz lexicon that balanced pop-friendly lyricism with darker, free-style improvisation.

"The foundation of our music, really, is trust," Anderson said. "We all have absolute faith in each other. There is not a moment that is not cared for by everybody. There is no complacency. There is no coasting."

A 2002 performance at the Village Vanguard led to the record deal with Columbia. That quickly spawned such critically lauded Bad Plus albums as "These Are the Vistas" (2003) and "Give" (2004) and a set at the 2004 Bonnaroo festival. Last year came the live "Blunt Object" album, which transformed the Queen anthem "We Are the Champions" into a percussive, piano-heavy firestorm.

"We always try to bring the same energy," Anderson said. "But we also don't assume an audience won't respond to one kind of energy over another. That's become really clear. Well, it's clear to us, anyway."

"It's like playing 'Iron Man' for a Vanguard audience We just do what we do and see what happens."

AOL markets 'gay music'

By Jim Farber
New York Daily News

Does music have a sexual orientation?

Apparently America Online thinks so.

Call up their massively popular AOLmusic.com site, scroll through their "musical styles" choices, and right below "soundtracks" and just above "classic rock" you'll find a heretofore undiscovered genre known as "gay and lesbian" music.

If nothing else, this begs some intriguing questions about your CD collection:

How, exactly, would a CD become gay?

To THIS gay man, the absurdity of the question begs the most blinkered suppositions:

Was the CD abused by an LP when it was young?

Did it lack a proper stereo system to guide it while it was growing up?

Or maybe it was the product of some "intelligent design" decision at the manufacturing level — the technological equivalent to the so-called "gay gene."

AOLmusic isn't the only ironically minded company thinking gay these days. Sony BMG has just proudly trumpeted a new label meant to tout lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender artists called Twist. Its first releases arrive this June.

On the surface, this all reads as terribly liberated, as if the conglomerates were saying: "Look how gay-friendly we are! We're promoting you guys to the hilt."

Unfortunately for, say, Twist, most gay musicians would sooner be shoved into the "spoken word" category than be ghettoized by their sexual-object choice. It's not that many don't want to be known for who they are. It's that they make music for the same audience any artist does: as large and lucrative a one as possible.

By labeling their music "gay," it sends the message to straight people that they can't possibly relate to what they're singing about.

Is this something tomorrow's Elton John would want to tell his potential listeners?

In the case of AOLmusic, the "gay and lesbian" music section makes assumptions about taste that necessarily stumble into stereotype. Take a look at what AOL considered "gay music" in its debut week:

A show tune (from "Rent"), a song from a fashion-oriented sexpot (Gwen Stefani) and a dance cut from — guess who? — Madonna.

Why not go all the way and throw in something from Judy Garland?

The only two acts included in the pop top 10 of late that have openly gay members are the one-named singer Antony and the Scissor Sisters, who, at least in England, have enough presumably straight fans to have hit No. 1 on the charts several times.

Of course, AOL didn't become a major corporation by being dumb. Stereotypes have some basis in truth. If you go to a Pet Shop Boys concert in New York, it's a safe bet a hefty percentage of those attending have been to a bar named Splash. And, of course, we've all gone to Broadway musicals and found ourselves wondering, briefly, why the line at the men's room is so much longer than the one at the women's.

What's irritating about the growing "gay" demarcation for music isn't only that it's nonsensical. It's that it purports to be cutting edge while hinging on something as old as the proverbial hills: targeting a market.

Worse, this particular targeting operates on an antique model. For years, gay media sold itself to the advertising world on the strength of the community's uncommon amount of disposable income, generated by having no kids to support.

But with gay couples currently crowding the nation's fertility clinics and adoption houses, it's no longer a sure thing that they can, at whim, spend $300 on a throw cushion.

If AOL and other media outlets are so eager to codify gay taste, maybe they should go all the way and create their own version of the Kinsey Scale. Brainstormed by the famous sexologist in the '50s, Alfred Kinsey's scale rated people's orientation on a measure of 0 to 6.

"0" was the "most straight," "6" the "most gay," with all kinds of tantalizing gradations in between.

For the musical equivalent of "0" you'd have, say, Buju Banton (the dance hall star whose songs call for gay people to be slaughtered en masse). For "6" you could have something by Morrissey, whose lyrics epitomize that famous "gay sensibility" more fittingly than anyone since Oscar Wilde.

The problem is, Morrissey has never declared his sexual orientation. And what would we do with someone like Rob Halford, singer of the metal band Judas Priest, who has come out but who makes the most conventionally macho music on the planet?

Maybe this "gay music" stuff isn't as easy as it looks.

Calle 13 starts a reggaeton revolution

By Jordan Levin
Knight Ridder Newspapers

MIAMI — It may have been a cold and quiet weeknight outside, but there was a fire onstage at Miami's Pawn Shop.

Pounding the air, rapper Residente strode the stage, the white-hot center of a whirlwind of rhythms and rhymes, looking ready to chew up the mike and spit it out along with the rat-a-tat-tat of exhortations and puns, words and ideas ricocheting off each other too fast to follow.

Behind the keyboards, small, bearded Visitante presided over a musical cauldron, three blistering percussionists, a funky deep bass guitar, wailing saxophone, a sweet-faced girl singing incantatory melodies, rhythms bubbling on top of a deeply infectious groove.

The music industry crowd, jaded types usually intent on cocktail politicking, was cheering and pulsing along with them. "Atrevete!" Residente howled, in Calle 13's anthem to get real and get down. "I dare you! Get hyper! You're on fire!"

Hard to tell whether heads or hips were spinning faster.

If you had to label Calle 13's music, you'd call it reggaeton. But the hottest new group to emerge from the Puerto Rican genre that's exploding among both Latinos and Anglos stateside is the most radical reggaeton yet.

Led by two step-brothers, rapper lyricist/frontman Rene "Residente" Perez and composer/bandleader Eduardo "Visitante" Martinez, Calle 13 is pushing the boundaries of reggaeton to encompass a different set of music and ideas.

"They're different," says Raymond Delgado, a reggaeton producer, at the Pawn Shop for Calle 13's performance. "Reggaeton always has the same beat and style. They're an artistic evolution."

Or maybe a revolution. It's a fusion of funk, hip-hop, reggae, salsa, jazz, Brazilian and more. Their lyrics, full of irony, wordplay and cultural politics as well as sex, Calle 13 is an electric jolt to a genre that, for all its explosive success, is already dragging with mechanical boom-chi beats and formulaic booty-miami choruses.

Even who they are breaks with the hardcore barrio cliche — they're white, middle-class, with art school educations. The step-brothers didn't start Calle 13 because they wanted to be stars, but because they had something to say and reggaeton seemed the best way to say it. "I thought it could convey a complicated message in a way people would understand," Residente says.

KRT

Eduardo 'Visitante' Martinez, bandleader, composer and keyboard player for the versatile reggaeton band Calle 13, speaks to the audience during a show.

"I liked certain things about reggaeton, like that it was from Puerto Rico," says Residente. "But I didn't like the lyrics. Some are OK, but a lot of them are empty. But one aspect that I like is that it's the poetry of the street, that it's not perfect, and still it's been accepted by everyone."

Street poetry from Calle 13 has hit it surprisingly big in Puerto Rico. Their debut album, released amid underground buzz last November, has already sold more than 100,000 copies on the island. They've had two Puerto Rican radio hits, "Se vale todo" ("It's worth everything"), a nonsense ode to a woman's body, and "Atrevete te, te!" ("I dare you!") which urges a girl to drop her Coldplay-loving pretensions and connect to her roots and her gut via reggaeton.

Jose Tillan, vice president of talent and artist relations for MTV Latin America, compared them to Public Enemy, whose politically outspoken songs and edgy production earned them both commercial and artistic success in the late 1980s. "You don't need to be vulgar to be a bad ass," Tillan said. "There's room for everything. A Tribe Called Quest was different from NWA, but they were both urban.

"There's a lot of depth to Calle 13. Maybe it's not a club staple like Daddy Yankee megahit 'Gasolina.' It's not based on one song, but on the concept and the artist. It's musical and we need more of that."

The street that's the source of Calle 13's name is far from the crime-ridden alleys that most reggaetoneros claim as their real and artistic home.

Visitante, whose father is Residente's stepfather, regularly visited what became his surrogate family and brother on 13th Street in El Conquistador, a housing development in the San Juan, Puerto Rico suburbs.

Residente studied in arts schools in Puerto Rico and Georgia, and created songs, poems and videos. Visitante studied at music conservatories in Puerto Rico and played in an Afro-Caribbean fusion band. They designed their album art and directed their high-concept videos — the one for "Atrevete" features a chorus line of clone-like babes in platinum wigs, and an odd assortment of wildly dancing characters.

Calle 13's songs, all in Spanish, are often like dark, comic monologues, with Residente talking to himself or imaginary characters, dizzyingly dense with wordplay, Puerto Rican slang, rhymes, political and cultural references that send the meaning of a single line careening crazily from one end to another.

In "P$-di-di-di" he brutally mocks celebrity hip-hop producer Diddy, who launched a Latin label last year, as a carpetbagger clueless about Puerto Rican culture.

There's plenty of sex and innuendo, but it's playful and sarcastic, rather than leering and brutal. "Let me suck on your belly button — I'll have you talking Chinese," he raps in "Se vale to-to." Visitante's music incorporates everything from funk to cumbia, new wave to cartoon soundtracks, adding meaning and irony to melody and rhythm.

They've ventured into overt politics with "Dear FBI," which attacks the agency for the controversial killing of Puerto Rican independence activist Filiberto Ojeda Rios last fall, and "Balas Locas" ("Crazy Bullets"), decrying the often deadly Puerto Rican custom of firing guns into the air on New Year's Eve

That complexity has earned them attention outside the pop music world

"It was a mix of all these stereotypes, but at the bottom it had this ironic point of view," says Mayra Montero, a well-known Puerto Rican novelist and journalist, of the first time she heard the group. "They're giving another orientation to reggaeton. For me, Residente is an adult. He is vindicating reggaeton, vindicating being Puerto Rican."

Their success so far has surprised the pair. But Residente says he doesn't care how big their audience is, as long as they're listening. "I just want to communicate my ideas," he says "It's very important to me that people understand what I'm saying."

UM splits two with Catamounts

puck over Quick's leg pad and into the net.

UMass captain Stephen Werner took the lead back for the Minutemen with his team-leading 11th goal of the season. The play began when the Catamounts turned the puck over in the neutral zone and Chris Capraro dished the puck to Werner.

The captain, freshman Chris Davis and Capraro then skated in on Russell with a three-on-one opportunity. Werner skated in to the left point and opted to shoot the puck rather than feed one of his teammates. The decision turned out to be the right one as he went top shelf to beat Russell.

Friday night's game was a hard fought battle where neither team gave the other much to work with. The first period alone only yielded 10 shots with just three of them going to the Minutemen.

After neither team could record a score in the first, the Mass Attack tallied a power play goal early in the second period. Marvin Degon controlled the puck at the point and passed it off to Anderson below the left face-off circle. Seeing Cory Quirk set up on the other side of UVM goalie, Joe Fallon, he slid the puck across the crease. Quirk one-timed it into the net for his eighth of the season.

KAREN WINCHESTER/COLLEGIAN

Captain Matt Anderson leads the Minutemen with three game-winning goals on the season. He is third on the team in scoring with 16 points.

The power play proved effective for the Maroon and White again in the third period. With Matt Syroczynski in the box for interference it was Degon's turn to light the lamp. The captain unleashed a rocket from the point that found the back of the net.

"We were trying to shoot almost off the sides of the net because they block a lot of shots so they were coming out to the middle," Degon said. "The guy was a little off me so I just shot it towards the post hoping someone would tip it or it would go in."

In a move to try and get a score up on the board, Sneddon pulled Fallon with three minutes left in the game. This time, however, the strategy didn't work out as Werner scored an empty-net goal to ice the game.

Wicker, Ian Walsh, Mike Ley and Scott Darwin further played spoiler, placing second in the event ahead of UMass.

With the win, the Bonnies closed out as 2006 A-10 Champions, with 701.5 points. The Minutemen, in second, finished nine points behind SBU with 692.5.

The third-place finisher, Xavier, totaled more than 265 points less than the Minutemen, with 424.

"We raced 54 individual swim events, and five relays," UMass men's coach Russ Yarworth said. "And through all that, the meet comes down to nine points. Our swims could have been better, and theirs too."

Yarworth pointed out three events on the last day in specific – the 200-yard freestyle, 200-yard backstroke and 100-free – as events that hurt the Minutemen down the stretch.

"I felt we had some real strong power and depth in those events," Yarworth said. "We didn't do quite what we wanted to do in those events, if you look at the score."

But that isn't to say Yarworth wasn't pleased with the outcome. He was still very much proud of his team's effort.

"Both teams are equal, they just had nine more points," he said.

In what could potentially be a very positive sign, Yarworth will graduate no seniors, leaving him with a virtually unscathed cupboard for next season.

Sophomore R.J. Rappe repeated as the one-meter diving champion, taking first with a score of 615.15, to give the Minutemen the initial lead after day one.

At the beginning of the season, Newcomb had set a goal for his Minutewomen to achieve. After placing fourth in the 2005 Championships, the 22nd-year coach challenged the women to take third, launching themselves in the upper tier of the conference.

In his words, they finished "second-and-a-half."

Going into the last women's event of the day, also the 400-free relay, the Minutewomen were tied with the Bonnies. This would be another first and third finish between UMass and SBU, with SBU taking first and powerhouse Richmond – the 2006 A-10 Women's Champs – coming in second.

While the Spiders ran away with this one, taking the championship by nearly 300 points, the Minutewomen passed Newcomb's final exam by finishing with 467 points, just eight points behind the second-place Bonnies.

"Each team is different. This team is really relaxed," a hoarse-voiced Newcomb said. "They set up a great environment. We really wanted to go in there and get after it. They went into meet not scared at all, not intimidated, and we went after it knowing we had the confidence in ourselves. I am extremely proud of this team."

Embodiments of Newcomb's words were evident all over the pool. Freshman Karen Upperco showed all the calm and poise in taking the one-meter dive, with a score of 490.70, while the 200 free relay team set a new school record with a time of 1:35.73.

More impressive was the fact that Upperco was down 25 points at one moment in the event, upon which she bounced back to win.

"That takes a certain amount of concentration and nerves," Newcomb said of Upperco's comeback. "She doesn't let things faze her. Just from the way I see her, she doesn't really change her facial expression a lot. She's very focused."

Newcomb spoke volumes about other key performances from Nicole LeBarge, Aimee Bourassa and Liz Lovejoy ("she was on fire"), who were all integral components to the women's success.

UM succeeds despite Hawkins' injury and eighth, respectively.

The men were not as successful in battling the elements, however, falling to third overall after the second run. Sophomore Jason Small had the best performance for the Minutemen, placing second overall, just .11 seconds ahead of his teammate, junior Rush Hawkins.

Friday marked the first time this season Small has finished ahead of Hawkins in a race both skiers finished. Senior Pat Bachant finished eighth on the day, and freshman Alex Zahoruiko and senior Patrick Hofer had top-25 finishes to round out the men's best five.

The men finished third overall behind Plymouth State and host Colby-Sawyer, effectively locking them into third place in the ECSC standings.

On Saturday the Maroon and White traveled to Pat's Peak for the St. Anslem's Carnival slalom. The Minutewomen needed to victory to pull into a tie with Boston College for the overall lead in the MacConnell division of the ECSC.

They fell just short, finishing second to Boston College, putting them one point back and in second place overall. Hawkins repeated Friday's performance with another second place finish to lead the Minutewomen, while Rauh and Collins finished 10th and 15th overall.

The men improved on Friday's race, finishing second as a team, despite not having a skier in the top-5.

Small again led the Minutemen with a sixth place finish, while Hofer, Zahoruiko, Bachant and sophomore James Green all had finishes in the top-15.

The one big name missing from the list, Rush Hawkins, did not finish his second run Saturday, despite getting two chances to do so.

The skier before Hawkins had knocked a gate out of the ground and was never replaced before Hawkins began his second run. When Hawkins saw the gate still lying on the ground on his way down the mountain, he stopped and requested a re-run.

After some debate among coach Rouleau and the jury that day, Hawkins was granted the re-run, but broke a binding on one of his skis causing his boot to come loose from the board.

Already due to have surgery on his knee in April after the season, it seems Hawkins is struggling to stay on the slopes this season. However, his attitude remains positive.

"That's the kind of kid Rush is," Rouleau said. "He's seen this many times before, and has broken his bindings before. He just went to his supplier to get [the skis] fixed and get them ready for Regionals this weekend."

With all of the results in, the individual awards were given out for the season's best male and female skiers. Eliza Hawkins won her second straight individual title as the MacConnell division's best female skier, while Jason Small barely missed his first title, finishing a close second. Rush Hawkins, last year's best male skier, finished fifth overall.

Small may have won this year's award, however, were it not for a rules change that changed how the racers were rated.

In recent years, each skier's two worst finishes were discounted, including races that were not finished. This year, however, every race counted, and it affected Small's place in the standings.

"Had they thrown out the two worst races like they have in years past, Jason would have won by nearly 40 points," Rouleau said. "Instead, with the rule change, he missed it by less than 10."

The Hawkins siblings and Small will be joined by Rauh, Collins, and Bachant at the Division I NCAA regionals on Friday. The top 15 men and women from Division II ECSC are invited to the event each year. The six skiers will compete in the slalom, but will miss the giant slalom event, Saturday, because ECSC regionals are held on the same weekend.

UMass places ninth

By Domenic Poli
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts track and field teams traveled to Kingston, R.I., on Saturday for the Atlantic 10 Championships. In the last meet before the New England Championships next weekend, the men placed fifth out of eight teams, while the women finished ninth out of 11.

"I thought the team did just exactly what we hoped it could do on the upper end of our performance level," head coach Ken O'Brien said. "I thought the team itself and several individuals had an outstanding day."

Just a couple of those several individuals are senior Jon Korhonen, sophomore Nils Fischer and junior Erik Hoagland.

Korhonen came in 2nd in "a very competitive 3,000 meter run" finishing with a time of 8:31.63. He placed just over a second behind Sean Quigley, who is one of the nation's best long distance runners, according to O'Brien.

Fischer, a dominant cross-country star, claimed 7th place in the mile with a time of 4:18.10, the fastest of his career.

O'Brien knew Fischer could deliver such a performance, with the right strategy. They found one and stuck to it.

O'Brien told Fischer to "try [to] get off to a little bit of a slow start and keep himself away from some of the physical contact that was going to occur in the race."

O'Brien wanted to let the other guys tire each other out and let Fischer mellow somewhere behind them.

"I didn't want Nils to get tied up on a fist fight like that, so we actually set it up so that he would come up from behind," he said. Doing so allowed Fischer to post the fastest mile of his career.

Hoagland, whom O'Brien paid special homage, became the first Minuteman to win both the long jump, which he did with a record-breaking performance, and the triple jump at the A-10 Championships. These accomplishments won him the honor of Field Event Athlete of the Week.

O'Brien added that Brandon London and Mark Anderson who placed second and third in the high jump also provided "critical performances" for the Maroon and White.

This upcoming week is one that O'Brien refers to as "a short week" with the New England Championships beginning on Friday, as apposed to Saturday. With this in mind he will try to rest his athletes the best he can.

"Since it's a championship level meet, we'll probably reduce our workload a little bit. We'll get a little bit of rest from the physical and the emotional part of [last week's] meet," O'Brien said.

The Minutemen finished the day with a total of 83 points.

As for the women, they tallied 38 points to come in ninth place.

"I don't think it went great," said UMass coach Julie Lafreniere, later adding the disappointing meet was highlighted by some solid performances.

One of these performances was by sophomore Kristen Bakanowski. She cleared a height of 11 feet, eight inches to repeat as the A-10 Indoor Pole Vault Champion.

The other performances were third place finishes by freshman Jordan Veney in the shot put, sophomore Christina DeRosa in the 5,000-meter and senior Elisabeth Budd in the 500-meter.

"We only brought 16 athletes and I feel like we went down there with a competitive mindset. It's test for us and we just still have a longer way to go."

The lowest point, however, may have been the pulled hamstring suffered by freshman Dionise Miranda.

"She pulled it pretty good," Lafreniere said. "Her indoor season's definitely done. A pulled hamstring can take 3-6 weeks of rehab."

As for the rest of the Minutewomen, Lafreniere said that her team's regime won't change and that they will keep trudging along.

"We're just going to keep training. Just like we've been all winter."

Villanova climbing the basketball ranks

By Dan Gelston
Associated Press

VILLANOVA, Pa.—After Villanova knocked off No. 1 Connecticut, Randy Foye's cell phone wouldn't stop ringing. Congratulatory messages kept flashing on his computer.

Suddenly, it hit the 6-foot-4 guard. If this was the response after a victory over the top-ranked team, how would people react if the Wildcats ascended to No. 1? And wouldn't that ranking give only further motivation to opponents?

"It's just a bigger target now on our chest if it happens that we come out No. 1," Foye said.

No worries for now. Even with wins over the Huskies and No. 17 Georgetown, the Big East-leading Wildcats (21-2, 11-1 Big East) moved up to No. 2 Monday in The Associated Press' college basketball poll.

Never mind how the Wildcats might handle No. 1. The bigger question might be, what took so long to return to national prominence?

"Given the circumstances, I understand why it took longer," fifth-year coach Jay Wright said.

From injuries to scandal to disputed calls, Villanova's return to the elite was more rocky road than rapid rise. Now, with two 10-game winning streaks in the same season for the first time in school history, the Wildcats are one victory from matching the best start in school history set in 1937-38.

"Now that we've got a good thing going here, I'm happier that it worked out that way," Wright said. "Everyone feels they earned it. You kind of know who your friends are. There was plenty of time for people to show whether they were loyal to the program or not."

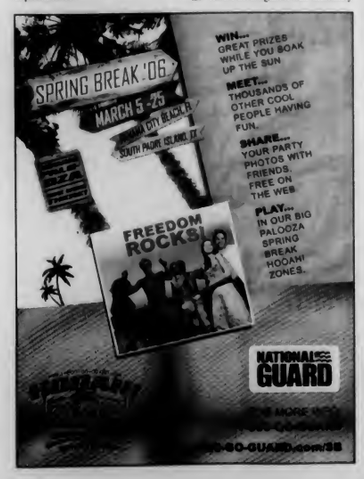
When Wright returned to the program where he served as an assistant under Rollie Massimino, the expectation was for NCAA tournaments to again become the norm. Instead, the Wildcats played in the NIT his first three seasons, had a losing record in 2002-03 and the program was stung by an NCAA investigation that ultimately led to probation.

Three years ago, Villanova was hit by a phone-card scandal that turned a 15-10 start into a 15-16 finish when several players were ruled ineligible. That forced the Wildcats to play with a seven-man roster and the staggered suspensions lingered into the next season, when nearly two dozen games were missed by five suspended players.

"It was real hard, but it was a great learning experience," Allan Ray said. "It taught us how to deal with adversity."

For a while, it seemed as if affliction after another derailed every bit of momentum. Consider 6-foot-9 senior center Jason Fraser, a prized high-school recruit who now serves as a role player. Seven—seven!—operations forced him out of nearly two-dozen career games.

Fraser originally was projected to start in the frontcourt with Curtis Sumpter, perhaps the Wildcats' most versatile player. Instead, Sumpter was knocked out of last season's NCAA tournament after he tore a ligament in his left knee, and was likely lost for this season when he tore the same ligament again on a routine lay-up in a preseason drill.



"Most teams would go, 'Oh, man!' and have their heads down," Ray said. "We just looked at it like it's just another obstacle we have to overcome."

Of course, Ray, already knew something about handling adversity.

In the 20th anniversary season of its lone national championship, Villanova returned to the NCAA tournament for the first time since 1999. The Wildcats beat New Mexico and Florida before losing to North Carolina, without Sumpter, on a disputed call.

Ray was whistled for traveling in the final seconds, wiping out a would-be basket and sending eventual national champion North Carolina to a 67-66 win. Ray hasn't been able to stomach watching the replay again since catching it later that night at the hotel.

"We knew we never should have been in that position last year anyway for the game to be decided on that call," Ray said.

face. But we switched to a man, so we knew we had to buckle down on defense."

The defensive change seemed to work in the second half, as Collins was held to zero points in the final 20 minutes of play.

There were then two ties and six lead changes lead changes until the Minutewomen took the final lead of the game when a Gulak layup made it 26-25 with 4:37 left in the first half.

UMass never gave up the lead from that point on, but St. Bonaventure was able to make it interesting late in the second half. The Bonnies cut a 10-point deficit down to just three at 45-42 with 7:52 remaining in regulation. St. Bonaventure was able to get within one point a few minutes later, but UMass was able to hold on by going 9-for-9 from the free throw line in the final 5:39 of the game.

Leading the way for the Minutewomen was T. Tatham and sophomore Kate Mills. T. Tatham notched her sixth career double-double, finishing the game with 10 points and 12 rebounds.

Freshman Stelanie Gerardot tallied eight points, three assists, one rebound and one steal in her first career start on Feb. 5 against St. Joe's.

"Going to the foul line is outstanding. That's what we have to do to win ballgames."

Four UMass players finished the game in double figures.

"Four people in double figures is outstanding," Dacko said.

Legendary broadcaster Curt Gowdy passes away at age 86

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FORT MYERS, Fla. – Curt Gowdy, one of the signature voices of sports for a generation and a longtime broadcaster for the Boston Red Sox, died Monday at 86.

He died at his winter home in Palm Beach after a long battle with leukemia.

Gowdy made his broadcasting debut in 1944 and went on to call the first Super Bowl in 1967 as well as 13 World Series and 16 All-Star games. He also called the famous "Heidi" pro football game in 1968.

In 1951, Gowdy became the main play-by-play voice on the Red Sox broadcast team. He left in 1966 for a 10-year stint as "Game of the Week" announcer for NBC. He also was the host of the "American Sportsman" series.

"He's certainly the greatest play-by-play person up to this point that NBC sports has ever had," NBC Universal Sports chairman Dick Ebersol said from the Turin Olympics. "He literally carried the sports division at NBC for so many years on his back. He was a remarkable talent and he was an even more remarkable human being."

Born in Green River, Wyo., Gowdy brought a warm feel to the broadcast booth, his commentary always full of good humor and enthusiasm. Baseball commissioner Bud Selig called Gowdy "one of the legendary broadcasters of our game."

"His distinct voice was a comfort to a generation of baseball fans in New England and throughout the country," Selig said.

In his 1966 essay "Hub Fans Bid Kid Adieu," published in The New Yorker, John Updike said Gowdy sounded like "everybody's brother-in-law."

Veteran NBC broadcaster Dick Enberg said that if Gowdy were calling a game, "you know it was a major event."

"He was the first superstar of sports television because he did all of the big events – the World Series, the Super Bowl, NCAA basketball, the Olympics and his outdoor sportsman show," Enberg added. "He's the last of the dinosaurs. No one will ever be the voice of so many major events at the same time ever again."

George Bodenheimer, president of ESPN and ABC Sports, said Gowdy's contributions were "indelible." He said Gowdy was a "pioneer in our business and set the highest of standards for everyone in sports broadcasting."

College basketball broadcaster Dick Vitale of ESPN said he heard of Gowdy's death in a phone call from Texas Tech coach Bob Knight.

"Gowdy had a love affair with the microphone and the fans had a love affair with him," Vitale said. "American sports fans truly lost an icon, a legend who never felt he was bigger than anyone else. He had that humility that made him special, and he made everyone feel like they were so important."

Former Red Sox star John Pesky, speaking from Boston's spring training camp in Fort Myers, remembered Gowdy as "a peach of a guy." Pesky, 86, said Gowdy was always in the clubhouse before games and always eager to talk.

"He was really easy to speak to," Pesky said.

The award-winning broadcaster began his career in Cheyenne, Wyo., in 1944 standing on a crate, giving a football play-by-play in subzero temperatures. He moved on to minor league baseball broadcasts and recreations of major league games on KOMA radio in Oklahoma City.

In 1949, he joined Mel Allen to broadcast games of the New York Yankees and, two years, later, he became the No. 1 broadcaster for the Boston Red Sox, leaving in 1966 to spend 10 years as NBA's announcer for its game of the week.

NBA superstars set bad example

Rob Greenfield

So this is what it has come to. All of the bickering, whining, complaining, grimacing and downright lack of effort has finally caught up with basketball.

The National Basketball Association has something to answer for now. Ever since its athletes have been coddled, tailored to, worshiped and idolized, the NBA's players have become the models for what you don't want kids to emulate.

Let me explain. I went to a Boston Globe Sports discussion session a couple of weeks ago. It's an annual gathering of some of the modern sports minds to discuss different aspects of the contemporary sports world. This time it happened to be a panel of ESPN big wigs and Globe sportswriter Jackie MacMullan, who was leading the discussion.

After the hour-and-a-half of discussing the impact of ESPN on the coverage of sports in the United States (which included some interesting talks about ESPN compromising its journalistic integrity by promoting the athletes too much and losing objectivity) the question-and-answer section rolled around, and I decided to speak up.

Being the avid basketball fan and rabid anti-NBA enthusiast – that I am, I decided to ask MacMullan about professional basketball, since she covered the NBA for many years and continues to write about the Celtics.

I asked her about the impact of television on athletes, whether their egos had become so inflated that the rules – whether they are set by officials, general managers, owners or coaches – simply don't apply to them anymore, and that everyone was letting them get away with it because of their marketing value.

MacMullan has been around basketball for a long time, and she told me a couple of stories that would make the every-day worker's skin crawl.

In one scenario, she was on a bus ride in Hawaii going to an NBA preseason game. Some of the players on the bus, including Lorenzen Wright and Calvin Cato, forgot that she was there and starting talking. The conversation turned to taking charges: Cato chimed in, saying that he doesn't take charges because it hurts; Wright then topped that, saying that he doesn't take charges because he doesn't get paid specifically to take charges.

After that story I went through a mini-depression about what basketball had become, then she continued. MacMullan told me about Stephon Marbury, the Coney Island legend, getting handed everything from when he was 10-years-old. He was given shoes, clothes, jerseys and everything else you can possibly imagine.

Now, Marbury isn't getting along with one of the most successful coaches in basketball history, Larry Brown.

That is inexcusable, and it leads me back to the original point.

I was coaching at the Boys and Girls Club of Newton last weekend. I go there to referee and do spot coaching duty if someone doesn't show up. It used to be a great environment, where kids could come to have some fun playing a game that they loved, and pal around with some good people while they were at it.

But this last weekend changed something in me. It made me angrier than I have ever been in a basketball gym. I took over as coach for a team that was talented enough to win ballgames, but couldn't put any W's on the board for some reason.

I couldn't figure out why until I started coaching, then it became obvious.

It was their attitude.

These kids were 11-years-old and they wouldn't even listen to their coach, who, unfortunately, happened to be me that day. I couldn't take a kid out of the game without him giving me attitude and throwing his hands in the air.

The best player on the team – and this happens with almost every team in the league – yells at his teammates who aren't as talented because they're ruining the game for him. Remember, these are 11 and 12-year-olds. How sad is that?

The most talented players, even at the youth levels, are allowed free reign to say, and do, whatever they want, whenever they want – even if that means yelling at teammates, coaches and officials.

Now, someone reading this might call me crazy. They are just be kids being kids right?

No. I helped coach my high school freshmen team this last season, and we were having the same problems with these 14 and 15-year-olds as we were with the middle school kids – players yelling at each other, players yelling at coaches, players pouting, and all of the disciplinary nightmares you can think of.

So why am I upset?

I'm upset because this is not the children's fault. The kids will emulate their role models, even if that means it's Iverson, Bryant, Anthony, or any other NBA player who has been coddled since Day One and has problems with authority.

That is why these kids complain, why they are uncoachable from such a young age – because that's what they see on TV from these NBA "stars." And until that stops, youth coaches like myself and all of the other dedicated volunteers will struggle to find a reason to stick around.

Canadian hockey back in action

By Greg Beacham
Associated Press

TURIN, Italy – No more Swedish surprises. Hockey is Canada's game, and this gold-medal match was a fitting finale for the most dominant women's tournament ever.

The Canadians scored with pinpoint passes and dazzling pirouettes, soft wrist shots and firm tip-ins. The 4-1 victory Monday night wasn't the rematch with the U.S. everyone expected, but Canada still sent upstart Sweden home with the same thrashing it had planned for its American archrivals.

When the fourth goal bulged Swedish goalie Kim Martin's net, the teenager shrugged her shoulders slightly and looked straight ahead – perhaps all the way to Vancouver in four years, when the world might have a chance against Canada.

Behind Martin, its 19-year-old wall of a goalie, Sweden managed a 3-2 shootout win over the U.S. on Friday in a semifinal immediately called the biggest upset in the sport's history.

But starting with Gillian Apps' goal on a surreal backhand just 3:15 in, Canada showed it wouldn't change because its opponent did.

The relentless forechecking, heady passing and sturdy defense – improbably questioned by the cocky Swedes before-hand – were practically flawless in a game just as one-sided as every other in their 46-2 march through Italy.

When it was over, the Canadians roared off their bench and hit goalie Charline Labonte so hard, they dislodged the net from its moorings. Danielle Goyette, their 40-year-old three-time Olympian, skated by herself to mid-ice to throw her glove and stick, while Becky Kellar wrapped herself in the flag.

Jayna Hefford added a goal and an assist, also Caroline Ouellette and Cherie Piper also contributed goals while Canada dominated the first two periods. Gunilla Andersson scored just the second goal of the tournament against Canada in the third, ruining Labonte's shutout bid long after the Swedes still had hope.

Any doubt was frozen early at the Palasport Olimpico, a rink kept chillier than a Canadian prairie wind to improve the ice quality. Frostbitten fingers didn't deter the hundreds of proud Great White Northerners who drank hot chocolate, wrapped themselves in beach-towel-sized maple leaf flags and rang cowbells amid chants of "Go Canada Go!"

The Canadians have two gold medals and a silver from the three Olympic women's hockey tournaments, finishing second in Nagano and winning in Salt Lake City. The Swedes had to be content with merely their nation's best finish in an international event – and they'll be just fine.

Sweden already won its biggest prize in the semifinals: no North American team had ever lost in an international tournament except to each other. The gap might be shrinking, but it's still awfully big when Canada is on its game.

UMass wins on the road

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

Powered by a Herculean effort from junior center Rashaun Freeman, the Massachusetts men's basketball team was able to snap its three-game losing streak at St. Bonaventure on Sunday, winning 72-64.

It wasn't easy for the Minutemen (11-12, 6-6 Atlantic 10), as they turned the ball over 23 times and shot just 48 percent from the foul line, but Freeman's 25 points and career-high 19 rebounds were enough to get by the Bonnies (7-17, 1-12 A-10).

Freeman and the Minutemen will look to carry the momentum from the win into tomorrow night's game against Charlotte at 7 p.m. at the Mullins Center.

The outburst by Freeman follows a three-game stretch during which he averaged just 3.8 points per game.

"This game was personal for me, as the fans and teammates know I have struggled the last couple of games," Freeman said. "My focus was to bounce back and lead our team as I usually do."

While Freeman clearly led the way on Sunday, it was the entire frontcourt that propelled UMass to the much-needed victory.

Junior forward Stephane Lasme scored 11 points and pulled down a career-high 15 rebounds, while sophomore forward Dante Milligan chipped in with seven rebounds off the bench. UMass held a 54-33 edge on the glass.

"We needed a big game from our big men," UMass coach Travis Ford said. "What I have been preaching to them for the last few days was for our bigs to step up and dominate a basketball game. I said that in our pregame talk: whatever "dominate" means to our bigs, then go out and do it."

Even with the dominant performance turned in by UMass' post players, the Bonnies hung close for much of the game. With the game tied at 46 midway through the second half, UMass went on a 10-4 run, sparked by eight points by Freeman.

Both Freeman and Lasme stepped up their production after the break, as Freeman scored 14 points and grabbed 13 boards in the second half, while Lasme scored all 11 of his points and added 11 rebounds in the second frame.

"I knew I had to be aggressive," Freeman said. "That's what you have to do. What you do in the second half is what gets you the win."

The Minutemen held a 37-32 lead at halftime, as they shot 53 percent from the field and 57 percent from 3-point land in the first half. The Maroon and White shot 47 percent from the floor for the game.

Junior captain Rashaun Freeman bounced back from his recent struggles with 29 points and 15 rebounds against St. Bonaventure on Sunday.

UMass got another hot start from junior swingman Brandon Thomas, as he scored all eight of his points in the first half. Thomas has averaged 10.3 points in the last three games since returning to the starting lineup.

Senior forward Jeff Viggiano was in double-figures for the third game in a row, adding 10 points.

St. Bonaventure was led by Ahmad Smith's 21 points and Michael Lee's 18.

The win was just the third of the season for UMass away from the Mullins Center, and ended a span of six of eight games on the road.

The matchup with Charlotte tomorrow begins the homestretch of the season, as UMass will play three of its final four games at home before the Atlantic 10 Tournament begins on March 8.

Minutemen split with UVM

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

The rollercoaster season for the Massachusetts hockey team (12-18-0, 9-14-0 Hockey East) continued this weekend when it split two games with the Vermont Catamounts (18-10-4, 10-9-4 HEA). The Minutemen prevailed 3-0 Friday night and were 12 seconds away from a series –and season sweep — of UVM when the Catamounts tied the score and went on to take the game in overtime, 3-2.

UMass returns to the ice this weekend when they take on the Huskies of Northeastern. The home-and-home series kicks off on Friday night in Boston then shifts to Amherst for the conclusion of the season series at the Mullins Center on Saturday night. The puck will drop both nights at 7 p.m.

On Saturday night with 2:17 remaining in the regulation, the Minutemen bench was assessed a two minute penalty for having too many men on the ice. Junior Chris Capraro was sent to the box to serve the penalty for the team. Catamounts' coach Kevin Sneddon took advantage of the opportunity and sent an extra attacker out on the ice.

Redshirt junior Matt Anderson had two penalties in the second game against Vermont this weekend. The second penalty led to UVM's first goal.

"We had the power play late and we looked down the bench and thought who do we put out there for the goalie around the minute mark," Sneddon said. "We gave the ball to a freshman."

That freshman was Peter Lenes. The move proved to be a good one as it was Lenes who tied the game at the 19:48 mark to send the game into overtime.

In the first overtime, the Catamounts controlled the puck along the low boards. In one sequence, a Vermont forward made a move to UMass goalie Jon Quick's left. The freshman saved the initial try but Lenes was there to stuff the rebound in past Quick's left leg pad.

In the overtime period – just the second of the season for the Maroon and White – it was Lenes scoring again, sealing the win and a weekend split for UVM.

The winning goal unfolded much the way the tying goal did. Lenes was able to beat Quick with a wrap-around try on the left side of the net. After the game UMass coach Don Cahoon voiced his displeasure about narrowly missing out on a weekend sweep but said his team will move on.

"A real tough one to swallow simply because of the way it unfolded," Cahoon said. "It hurts us because we just lost a couple of points. The effect of it should be we'll learn something from it and move forward and just keep doing what we're doing."

Junior Mark Matheson kicked off the scoring the in the first when he beat UVM goalie Travis Russell for just his second tally of the season. Jamie Sofon worked the puck to Matt Anderson who fired a shot on Russell. After the puck was stopped, Matheson netted the rebound to take the lead for the Minutemen.

With P.J. Fenton sent off the ice with a game misconduct for hitting from behind, UVM tied the score, 1-1, with a power play goal at 19:43 of the second period. Brad Leisenring slid a nice pass to Jeff Corey who shot the

Minutewomen trying to finish season strong

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team split a pair of games this weekend as it continues to finish the regular season on a strong note.

The Minutewomen (10-15, 7-7 A-10) suffered a disappointing 77-50 loss to Xavier (18-7, 9-5 A-10) on Friday night at the Cintas Center in Cincinnati, but were able to get back to their winning ways just two days later when they defeated St. Bonaventure by a score of 66-55 on Sunday afternoon at the Mullins Center.

UMass will be back in action when it takes on Saint Louis at 8 p.m. on Thursday night in Missouri.

UMass started the weekend off with a tough loss on the road against Xavier on Friday night. The Minutewomen cut a 29-point deficit down to 14 points halfway through the second half, but that was as close as they would get.

Xavier came out of the gates strong, making nine of its first 12 shots, and finishing the first half shooting 71 percent from the field. The Musketeers took a 21-6 lead just 7:30 into the game, and led by as many as 19 points later in the half.

UMass used a 9-2 run in the last five minutes of the half to cut Xavier's lead down to 12 points at 34-22, but the Musketeers would not let up. Xavier ended the first half with a 15-2 run of its own, to take a 49-24 lead into halftime.

The Minutewomen began to make a comeback early in the second half, but Xavier proved to be too much for UMass that night. The Musketeers held the Minutewomen to zero field goals in the final 7:26 of the game and gave UMass only its second loss in the prior eight games.

Sophomore Pam Rosanio led UMass with 11 points and seven rebounds, while junior Tamara Tatham tallied 11 points and four boards.

Sunday afternoon brought about a different fortune for the Minutewomen, as they were able to get back on the winning track with a 66-55 victory over St. Bonaventure in front of 1,121 fans at the Mullins Center.

After a back and forth first half that saw seven lead changes, UMass held the lead throughout the second half, holding on to win its fourth home game in a row. The Minutewomen went on a six minute scoring drought in the second half, allowing the Bonnies to get within one point at 47-46 with 6:44 left in regulation. But a basket by T. Tatham just 19 seconds later started an 11-2 UMass run that put the game out of reach, and gave the Minutewomen their seventh win their last nine games.

"We played some defense today," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said after Sunday's win. "We made some big defensive stops. We made a defensive adjustment. We went to a man-to-man because they were really hurting us when we were in the zone. We were able to hold them, even though we weren't scoring. So that was important for us."

The defensive change proved to be the turning point of the game, as the switch to a man-to-man defense shut down St. Bonaventure senior guard Stefanie Collins. Collins got the game started by hitting two consecutive three-pointers to give the Bonnies a 6-0 lead early on.

Senior Patrycja Gulak's layup just over two minutes into the game started a 9-0 UMass run that gave the Minutewomen a 9-6 lead about five minutes into the game. But Collins had the hot hand in the first half, hitting five of her first six attempts from behind the arc, and proving why she ranks as the best three-point shooter in the Atlantic 10.

"We came out in a zone," senior Katie Nelson said. "We knew we had to get out on the shooters, but we weren't doing a very good job of that. She [Collins] was just shooting in our face, even if we had a hand up; she was just shooting in our

Cage hosts shootout

The Atlantic 10 Shoot-Out will make its stop at the University of Massachusetts tonight at 6 p.m. at the Curry Hicks Cage. The Shoot-Out takes place on the campuses of each of the 14 schools in the Atlantic 10.

This is the sixth year of the annual Shoot-Out.

The Shoot-Out is a shooting competition featuring two-person teams.

Teammates alternate shots and have 30 seconds to shoot from designated spots on the court worth varying point totals to achieve the highest point total possible.

There are three divisions in which participants compete: men's, women's and co-ed. The top two teams in the co-ed division will square off during half-time of Wednesday's men's basketball game against Charlotte.

The winners of that shoot-out will then advance to the Atlantic 10 Shoot-Out championship, where they will face the top co-ed teams from the other schools in the A-10.

The teams that qualify for the co-ed Shoot-Out championship will receive an all expense paid trip to the Atlantic 10 Tournament in Cincinnati which begins on March 8, where they will compete for the $10,000 grand prize.

Other prizes being offered at tonight are a Pontiac G6, an iPod, a $500 gift certificate to Circuit City and many other gift certificates to local businesses. All competitors will receive a free t-shirt, free food, a free camera and many other giveaways.

Last year, UMass set an all-time participation record with 348 teams, and event organizers are expecting to top that record this year.

UM second in A-10s

By Brendan Hall

At last weekend's Atlantic 10 Swimming and Diving Championships, it turned out to be a position that neither team has been used to in some time.

For one, it was favorable – for the other, not so much.

Amidst the shouts and howls of some 2,000-plus fans on Saturday night at the Flickinger Complex in Buffalo, the Massachusetts swimmers and divers competed extremely well in the A-10s, but in the end the Minutemen and women both succumbed to the same opponent: the St. Bonaventure Bonnies.

The men placed second, nine points behind the Bonnies, and will not be the A-10 champs for the first time since the 1999-2000 season. The women placed third, reaching UMass coach Bob Newcomb's pre-season goal and reaching their highest placement since winning the A-10's in 2001.

One of the more hotly contested A-10 meets in recent years, the Minutemen held a slim four-point lead over the Bonnies heading into the final day of competition on Saturday. The two depth-filled teams battled back and forth, bringing the meet down to the final event of the night.

In that fateful 400-yard freestyle relay – in which the Minutemen were behind by one point heading into the event – UMass' quartet of Ryan Swisher, Gordon Leonard, Greg Chartier and AJ Vozella finished third, while SBU's Alex Moniot, Roman Margulis, Patrick Doret and Michael Bodaki ended up in first.

Weathering the storm

By Jeremy Rice

A very eventful Presidents Day weekend began a day early for the Massachusetts ski team, as they endured 90 mile-per-hour wind gusts, downed trees and the threat of lightning on its way to a pair of top three Eastern Collegiate Skiing Conference finishes.

The Maroon and White will compete in the NCAA regionals Friday before competing in the ECSC regionals Saturday and Sunday.

Starting the event on Friday instead of Saturday to avoid the holiday rush of tourists, the Colby-Sawyer Carnival giant slalom was barely finished, and to some on the hill that day, never should have.

After a relatively normal, though windy, first run on Mount Sunapee in New Hampshire, the skiers returned from lunch to a completely shut down mountain. A warning of lightning in the area forced the mountain to shut down all activities until the weather had passed.

"I've never had a day like it and I don't think I'll ever have one like it again," UMass coach Justin Rouleau said.

Even after the storm blew over, 90 mile-per-hour wind gusts made the race extremely dangerous, and even downed a number of trees in the same area where the athletes were skiing. Several times the event's jury, comprised of coaches from some of the teams competing that day, was faced with the decision of possibly calling the race.

"I was not on the jury that day, [but] my colleagues decided to have that second run no matter what, quite literally," Rouleau said. He also said had he been on the jury that day, the race never would have continued under those conditions.

It should also be noted here that after the first run, UMass had the best overall time and was ahead before the race was stopped during the second run.

The race continued with a shortened course that reduced the number of gates from 35 to 15, and though no more trees fell once the skiers got back on the slopes, the wind never let up.

The gusts were so disruptive to the racers that many of them went into a full "tuck" to make themselves more aerodynamic – a maneuver usually only seen by athletes in the super g and downhill races performed at the Olympic level, it made skiing giant slalom very difficult.

"It was without a doubt one of the most interesting and dangerous days I've had in 12 years of coaching and 28 skiing," Rouleau said.

At the end of the day, the women's team pulled out a much needed victory in their pursuit of first place Boston College, who finished second. The Minutewomen had three skiers in the top ten, led by sophomore Eliza Hawkins, who finished second. Seniors Lisbet Rauh and Shaleighne Collins finished sixth

Accident victim suffers broken nose, lost teeth

One University of Massachusetts student who was hit by a car near the Southwest Residential Area on Monday suffered from a broken nose and had several teeth knocked out, according to the UMass news office.

Candace Letizia, 20 of Washington dormitory had to be taken to Baystate Medical Center in Springfield and treated for the serious injuries. She and another Washington dorm resident, 20-year-old Lora Bash, ended up on the windshield of a Nissan Maxima when they were hit at 4:40 p.m.

Letizia has since been released from the hospital, and is recovering from her injuries at her parents' house.

The third accident victim, Kate Darling, 19 of Pierpont dormitory and Bash were treated and released from Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton.

"[Police] haven't even had a chance to interview the victims yet because they had to be transported to the hospital," UMass Deputy Police Chief Patrick Archbald said yesterday. "The case is still very much ongoing."

Police have charged the driver of the vehicle, UMass student Felicia Nitch, 19 of West Springfield, with failing to stop for a pedestrian in a crosswalk.

UMass police told the Massachusetts Daily Collegian on Monday that Nitch was 18 years old, but they now say that she is 19 years old.

The accident occurred on Massachusetts Ave. near the intersection of Sunset Ave., in front of WFCR-FM radio.

Police said the three students were crossing the street heading north when the car hit them at a "low speed."

No passengers in the car were injured, police said. The passengers have only been identified as students from Westfield State College.

Drugs and alcohol do not appear to be factors in the crash, police said.

"We are investigating environmental conditions ... With respect that the sun may have played a factor in visibility," said UMass Police Sgt. Ian Cyr. In the past week, five people were hit by cars on the UMass campus.

Last Tuesday, two union workers were hit by different cars while protesting outside the construction site of the new North Residential Area, near the Sylvan Residential Area. The victims were identified as Stephen Keane and Daniel Redmond of Holyoke. They were treated and released at Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton for their injuries.

Guest speaker to discuss spread of AIDS virus

By Megan Daley
Collegian Staff

AIDS is now the leading cause of death among African-American women, ages 25-35, according to the Center for Disease Control.

In response to this fact, the Everywoman's Center hopes to spread awareness and information by hosting speaker Vanessa Johnson, JD, the deputy Director of the Capital District African-American Coalition on AIDS (CDAACA).

Johnson will speak in room 917 at the Campus Center on Thursday, Feb. 23 at 4 p.m.

The event is open to the public, who, after the speech, will be invited to join in a discussion on the materials presented.

According to a recent press release, Johnson has been working in AIDS/HIV research for nearly 10 years.

She began her volunteer work in the field in 1995, five years after she was diagnosed with HIV.

As a member of CDAACA, Johnson has worked on grant writing for research development, as well as the implementation and evaluation of the results of that research.

She has also formed and participated in several coalitions to combat HIV/AIDS, such as the Capital Region Take the Test Coalition, which encouraged those at risk for the diseases to be tested.

However, Johnson's work is not limited to an academic field. She also works directly with others afflicted with HIV or AIDS.

Many of these people have become peer leaders for CDAACA and worked with Johnson on outreach and disease prevention presentations.

In addition to her work at the CDAACA, she is also the Chair for the Board of Directors for the National Association of People with AIDS (NAPWA).

According to the press release, NAPWA "advocates on behalf of all people living with HIV and AIDS in order to end the pandemic and the human suffering caused by HIV/AIDS."

The speech is being co-sponsored by the Graduate Women's Network, Women's Health Project/UHS and the Women of Color Leadership Network.

Carroll's parents make plea for safe release

BOSTON—The family of American journalist Jill Carroll issued another public appeal for her release Tuesday, a week before a deadline set by her Iraqi kidnappers for their demands to be met or they will kill her.

"She and thousands of other journalists try to bring truth to the world every day, and it is especially important in Iraq right now," Carroll's father, Jim, said in a one-minute audio message released by the media group Reporters Without Borders.

The message, accompanied by an appeal from Jill Carroll's sister, Katie, also asks for the release of two Iraqi journalists who were abducted earlier this month.

Jill Carroll was reporting from Iraq for the Christian Science Monitor when she was kidnapped Jan. 7. A group calling itself the Revenge Brigades has demanded the release of all Iraqi women held in U.S. military and Iraqi jails.

The appeals are the latest asking for Carroll's release. Last week, Iraq's state television started broadcasting ads including footage of her mother and a major Sunni Arab politician describing the 28-year-old freelancer as a friend of Iraq. Reporters Without Borders is also planning a weeklong campaign for the release of Carroll and Rim Zeid and Marwan Khazaal, who work for the Iraqi TV station Al-Sumariya.

Carroll's kidnappers set the Feb. 26 deadline earlier this month, according to the owner of a Kuwaiti TV station that aired the latest videotape of her on Feb. 10. In that tape, she appealed for her supporters to do whatever it takes to win her release "as quickly as possible."

Two previous tapes showing Carroll were aired by Al-Jazeera TV on Jan. 17 and 30. The first included a threat to kill Carroll within 72 hours unless all Iraqi women were released from custody.

Carroll grew up in Michigan and worked as a reporting assistant for The Wall Street Journal before moving to Jordan and launching her freelance career in 2002, learning Arabic along the way.

"I'm proud of her and I hope that young journalists around the world are inspired by her passion," Carroll's sister said in her audio message.

Thirty-seven journalists and media assistants have been kidnapped in Iraq since fighting began there in March 2003, according to Reporters Without Borders.

Holyoke resident involved in head-on car accident

New information has been released regarding a serious car accident that occurred early Monday morning on Route 9 in Hadley.

Police said Nicole C. Clement, 23 of Holyoke was traveling east on Route 9 in front of the Hadley Garden Center when she drove into oncoming traffic, striking head-on with a car being driven west on Route 9 by Phillip Prouty, 20 of Agawam, at 6:20 a.m.

Prouty is a former University of Massachusetts student.

Both Prouty and Clement were trapped in their cars before being rescued by Hadley and Amherst firefighters using hydraulic tools.

Clement was airlifted by helicopter to Baystate Medical Center in Springfield with serious injuries. Police said she suffered from a broken jaw, arm and leg, missing teeth and a ruptured eardrum.

Police said Prouty had ankle injuries and was also taken to Baystate Medical.

None of the injuries appeared to be life-threatening, police said. Yesterday afternoon, Clement was listed in fair condition and Prouty was treated and released.

Police believe Prouty was wearing a seatbelt. However, it was unclear if Clement was wearing one.

The state police accident reconstruction team was used and the accident is still under investigation. No criminal charges have been filed at this time.

Route 9 was closed for over two hours after the accident. However, traffic backups were minimal due to the Presidents Day holiday.

Hadley police said there was another two-car accident on the same stretch of road at 1:25 p.m. Sunday, but no further details were provided.

Summers stepping down as Harvard President in June

By Andrew Ryan
Associated Press

CAMBRIDGE—Lawrence H. Summers, the polarizing Harvard University president, said Tuesday that he is resigning at the end of the academic year, brought down by clashes with faculty and missteps including his comments that innate ability may partly explain why few women reach top science posts.

"I have reluctantly concluded that the rifts between me and segments of the Arts and Sciences faculty make it infeasible for me to advance the agenda of renewal that I see as crucial to Harvard's future," Summers wrote in a letter posted on Harvard's Web site.

"I believe, therefore, that it is best for the University to have new leadership."

Summers' resignation, effective June 30, ends the briefest tenure of any Harvard president since 1862, when Cornelius Felton died after two years in office. Summers was appointed in to the post in 2001.

He became embroiled in several controversies early in his tenure, among them the departure of several prominent black studies professors including Cornel West — who left after a falling out with the university president.

Last year's comments on women and science grew into a broader discussion of Summers' management style, which some considered brusque and even bullying. They also prompted a 218-185 no confidence vote from Harvard's Faculty of Arts and Sciences last March. Faculty votes are symbolic because the seven-member Harvard Corporation has sole authority to fire the university's president.

Another no confidence vote was scheduled for next Tuesday. It was called following the resignation of Faculty of Arts and Sciences Dean William Kirby. Some faculty believe he was pushed out by Summers, though Kirby has said the decision was mutual.

Derek Bok, Harvard's president from 1971 to 1991, will serve as interim president of the University from July 1 until the conclusion of the search for a new president.

Board members said in a letter posted online that the past year has been difficult and "sometimes wrenching," but they look back on Summers' tenure with appreciation.

"Larry Summers has served Harvard with extraordinary vision and vitality," the members said.

Harvard University president, Lawrence H. Summers announced that he would resign at the end of this year.

Summers, a former U.S. Treasury secretary in the Clinton Administration, was a prominent economist when he became Harvard's 27th president after Neil L. Rudenstine announced in May 2001 his resignation after nearly a decade.

The New Haven, Conn., native received his undergraduate degree from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology in 1975 and a Ph.D. from Harvard in 1982.

He taught at MIT from 1979 to 1982 and then served as domestic policy economist on President Reagan's Council of Economic Advisers until 1983.

After leaving Washington, he became a professor of economics at Harvard. He was the World Bank's chief economist from 1991 to 1993.

"These last years have not been without their strains and moments of rancor," the 51-year-old Summers acknowledged in his letter Tuesday.

Supreme Court sets up fall showdown on abortion

By Gina Holland
Associated Press

WASHINGTON—The Supreme Court said Tuesday it would consider reinstating a federal ban on what opponents call partial-birth abortion, pulling the contentious issue back to the high court on conservative Justice Samuel Alito's first day.

Alito could well be the tie-breaking vote when the court decides if doctors can be barred from performing the abortion procedure.

It is the first time the court has considered a federal restriction on abortion, and conservatives said they expect the membership change to affect the outcome.

"This is the frontline abortion case in the country," said Jay Sekulow, chief counsel for the conservative American Center for Law and Justice, who represents members of Congress in the case.

Justices split 5-4 in 2000 in striking down a state law barring the same procedure because it lacked an exception to protect the health of the mother. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who was the tie-breaking vote, retired late last month and was replaced by Alito.

Abortion was a major focus in the fight over Alito's nomination, and that of new Chief Justice John Roberts. Neither divulged how he would vote.

Even with O'Connor's retirement, there are five votes to uphold Roe v. Wade, the 1973 landmark ruling that established a woman's right to an abortion.

Abortion rights groups were worried, however, that the new court could make it easier for legislators to limit women's access to abortions.

"Today's action means the core principle of protecting women's health as guaranteed by Roe v. Wade is in clear and present danger," said Nancy Keenan, president of NARAL Pro-Choice America.

Justices will hear arguments this fall, as voters are preparing for midterm elections, with a ruling likely next year as presidential campaigns are gearing up.

Congress had voted in 2003 to prohibit the type of abortion, generally carried out in the second or third trimester, in which a fetus is partially removed from the womb and its skull punctured or crushed.

Justices were told that 31 states also barred so-called "partial-birth" abortions over the past eight years.

Associate Justice Samuel Alito walks with his wife Martha following his investiture by the front steps of the Supreme Court in Washington D.C. The Supreme court stated it would reconsider a ban on partial-birth abortion

Doctors who perform the procedure contend that it is the safest method of abortion when the mother's health is threatened by heart disease, high blood pressure or cancer.

The 2003 passage followed nearly a decade of attempts by Republican leaders and two vetoes by former President Clinton.

The law was never put in effect. It was struck down by judges in California, Nebraska and New York because it had no exception to protect the women's health. Those three decisions were upheld by appeals courts.

Defenders of the law maintain that the procedure is never medically necessary to protect a woman's health.

The Supreme Court recently dealt with an abortion case from New Hampshire. Justices on a 9-0 vote reaffirmed in January that states can require parental involvement in abortion decisions and that state restrictions must have an exception to protect the mother's health.

The case that will be heard this fall comes to the Supreme Court from Nebraska, where the federal law was challenged on behalf of doctors.

A judge in Lincoln, Neb., ruled that the law was unconstitutional and the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in St. Louis agreed last summer, prompting the Supreme Court appeal. Federal judges in New York and Nevada have also declared the law unconstitutional and appeals courts agreed.

Fifteen states urged justices to review the case: Alabama, Arkansas, Colorado, Florida, Idaho, Kansas, Michigan, Missouri, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, South Dakota, Texas, Utah and Virginia.

The case was one of four that justices agreed to hear on Tuesday. Alito's first day on the bench. The others involve more routine issues: juvenile prison sentences and lawsuits over pay phone charges.

Vermont man suffers concussion while flying kite

Wednesday February 15

2:51 p.m.
Matthew S. Alemany, 18, of 34 Wildwood Court in Saunderstown, R.I., and Michael Paul Discullo, 18, of 10 Parkman Street in Natick, were arrested at 1:16 p.m. and 2:51 p.m., on arson charges stemming from an incident on Feb. 12 that led to an arrest warrant for the two individuals. The Amherst Fire Department had responded to an alarm at 2:30 a.m. in Coolidge dorm after two students reported that a bulletin board had been set on fire. Police completed an investigation, and following judicial hearings at Whitmore, Alemany and Discullo were placed under arrest. Alemany is charged with burning personal property and destruction of property over $250.

Thursday February 16

10:53 a.m.
Gary J. Webster, 23, of 66 Codman Hill Ave. in Dorchester, was arrested for possession of a Class D drug with intent to distribute. A uniformed officer, detective and K-9 unit entered Webster's room in Coolidge dorm via search warrant and discovered various items and drug paraphernalia in addition to marijuana. Items and paraphernalia included an electronic scale, Ziploc bags, a smoking pipe and a wad of 100 dollar bills wrapped in an elastic band.

2:07 a.m.
Wanderly Fonseca, 21, of 210 Mendall Road in Acushnet, was arrested for operating a motor vehicle under the influence of liquor following a traffic stop on Kennedy Road. Fonseca was spotted driving his car on a sidewalk, which drew the attention of an officer. Police identified Fonseca and gave him a field sobriety test, which he failed, and was subsequently placed under arrest. Fonseca consented to submitting to a breathalyzer test back at the station, where he blew a blood-alcohol content level of 0.15.

3:32 p.m.
Sesugh Nomshan, 22, of 65 Alder Drive in Leominster, was arrested for possession of a Class D drug with intent to distribute. A search warrant for narcotics was carried out on his room in Coolidge dorm, in which a uniformed officer, detective and K-9 unit assisted. Upon investigation, police found an electronic scale, Ziploc bag, a mail ledger, cigar boxes and more than $1000.

4:07 a.m.
Erin Parent, 21, of 249 Lake Road in Van Buren, Maine, was arrested for operating a motor vehicle under the influence of liquor during a traffic stop on Massachusetts Ave. The officers' attention was first brought to the car by an equipment violation on Parent's vehicle; specifically, the headlights were off. Officers stopped the car and detected the odor of an alcoholic beverage emanating from the driver. Parent was subsequently given a field sobriety test, which she failed, and a portable breath test (PBT). The test was brought back to the station, where her blood-alcohol content level read a 0.18. Parent's car was towed from the scene.

A Vermont man was given treatment at Cooley Dickinson Hospital, in Northampton, after suffering a concussion while flying a kite on the practice fields next to the Mullins Center. The man was reportedly wearing a helmet while flying the large kite, which had two wires, when the wind began to carry the kite and drag the man. The man's helmet broke at this time. Initial reports indicated there was no need for medical attention, but it was later found that the man did lose consciousness for a brief moment and was unsteady on his feet. Medics evaluated that he needed treatment, and the man was transported in an ambulance to Cooley Dickinson.

Daniel J. Roche, 19, of 225 Miller Ave. in Portsmouth, N.H., was charged with possession of a Class D drug with intent to distribute, carrying a dangerous weapon on school grounds, unlawful possession of fireworks and disabling a fire alarm. Search warrant was carried out on Roche's room in Van Meter dorm, where police found fireworks, a machete, a scale, pipes and plastic bags.

Men's club hockey team advances to nationals

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's club hockey team won a pair of games in the ACHA Regional Tournament this past weekend, and will advance to the Division II National Tournament on March 8-11 in Rochester, N.Y.

UMass defeated Holy Cross by a score of 5-2 on Friday night in the first round of the Regionals held in Clifton Park, N.Y. The Minutemen carried the momentum into their game against NYU the very next night, defeating them 5-4, and advancing to the Nationals.

The road to a National Championship has been no walk in the park for the UMass club hockey team. That is for sure.

It is only the second year of the program, and technically, it is not even recognized by the school as a club sport. A program must run for more than two years for it to officially become a "club sport." That means that the school does not give any money to the UMass club hockey team, not yet at least.

The players have paid for their own ice time and road trips all season long, and have still managed to be one of the 16 teams left in the nation, all vying for a National Championship.

UMass's season got off to a rocky 1-6-1 start, and things seemed to have been going downhill quickly. That forced junior Ryan Donahue to call a "players-only" meeting.

"Something had to be done," Donahue said. "We were playing hard. We just weren't getting the results. For some reason, something wasn't clicking with the team. We knew we had a lot of talent, we just had to put it all together."

That meeting certainly worked out for the best. Since the November gathering in the locker room at the Mullins Center practice facility, UMass has not lost a game, and is now only a few wins away from the most coveted prize in club sports: a National Title.

UMass has been one of the most impressive club teams in the country, as it went into the Regionals as the lowest seed and knocked off the top two teams in the tournament.

One of the main reasons that the Minutemen are still alive is because of some hot goaltending from sophomore Tyler Hawley. One year after winning an intramural championship in ice hockey, Hawley finds himself leading the club team to a National Championship.

While UMass coach Matthew Johnson knows that he puts a highly dedicated and talented team on the ice every weekend, it is the man making the saves that has been the difference-maker.

"Tyler has been our savior," Johnson said. "I don't know where we would be without him."

Many of Hawley's teammates were also quick to compliment the man between the pipes.

"He's been unbelievable," junior Mike Christopher said. "There's so much parity amongst all of the teams, that you need that one thing that separates you. And having a good goalie is huge."

"Tyler has played every game and has been at every practice all season long," junior Steve McDevitt said. "He's our saving grace."

UMass is also led by its tri-captains: Donahue, junior Matt Kneeland and junior Steve Johnson. Johnson has been the catalyst of the offense this season, as he leads the team in goals scored. While there are no personal statisticians for the team, everyone agrees that Johnson has been the biggest offensive threat.

The National tournament will consist of 16 teams from across the country, and will involve four divisions of "pool play." Each team will be guaranteed three games, and the team with the best record in each division will advance to the ACHA's version of the Frozen Four.

UMass's schedule will be tough right from the get-go. It will open up the tournament with a game against Davenport University, which is the No. 1 team in the country. It will then face-off against Indiana University at Pennsylvania, and will finish off pool play with a battle against Denver University.

Many critics may blow off club sports in colleges and universities, and for that reason, this group of competitors have something to prove.

"We were getting our skates sharpened a few weeks ago, and someone came up to us and saw our club hockey sweatshirts on," Hawley said. "He started asking us about it, and then said, 'So it is basically competitive stick time.' And that just pissed all of us off. People think it's just going out there and skating around, and having a good time, but it's actually very serious."

While the UMass club hockey team is very competitive when it laces up the skates, the players don't want to take anything away from those who skate under UMass hockey coach Don Cahoon.

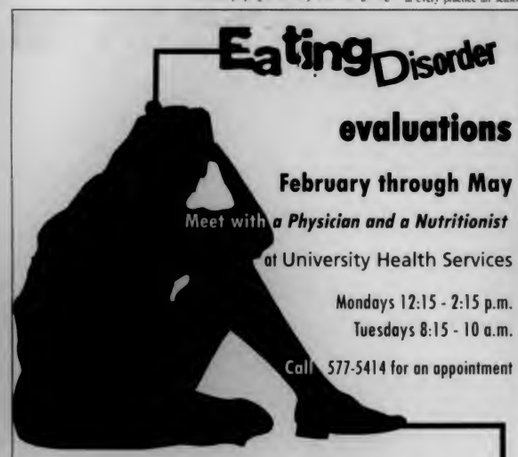
"We might not be Division I hockey players, but we are still hockey players," Christopher said. "Most of us are from Massachusetts, which is good hockey. We all played in good high schools, and we are all serious about the game."

The talent level is much higher than one would expect in the ACHA, and for most of the teams in the Nationals, it is their respective university's only collegiate hockey team.

"If you come and watch one of the games, you can see the talent," McDevitt said. "It's intense, and everything is legit. If you look at scores around the country, there are teams that have beaten Division I NCAA teams."

The team is getting ready to head off to New York in a few weeks, and many of the players are hoping that their academics will be in good standing. As of right now, it is not guaranteed that their professors will make their absences excused, but the players and coaches remain hopeful that the school will start to take UMass club hockey seriously.

As for its chances of coming back to Amherst with the National Championship, UMass will not settle for anything less.



"I think we're going to surprise people," McDevitt said.

"We're just going to play hard and see what happens," Christopher said. "We're going to have fun with it."

The Massachusetts men's club hockey team, after winning a pair of games in the ACHA Regional Tournament this past weekend, will advance to the Division II National Tournament on March 8-11 in Rochester, N.Y.

Bush to advance ports deal, despite complaints

By Ben Feller
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Bush said Tuesday that a deal allowing an Arab company to take over six major U.S. seaports should go forward and that he would veto any congressional effort to stop it.

The Senate's Republican leader had promised just such an effort a few hours earlier.

"After careful review by our government, I believe the transaction ought to go forward," Bush told reporters who had traveled with him on Air Force One to Washington. "I want those who are questioning it to step up and explain why all of a sudden a Middle Eastern company is held to a different standard than a Great British company. I am trying to conduct foreign policy now by saying to the people of the world, 'We'll treat you fairly.'"

Bush took the rare step of calling reporters to his conference room on the plane after returning from a speech in Colorado, addressing a controversy that is becoming a major headache for the White House. He said the seaports arrangement had been extensively examined by the administration and was "a legitimate deal that will not jeopardize the security of the country."

Earlier, Senate Republican Leader Bill Frist urged the administration to reconsider its decision to allow the transaction, under which a British company that has been running six U.S. ports would be acquired by Dubai Ports World, a state-owned business in the United Arab Emirates. Frist said he'd introduce a bill to delay the deal if the administration doesn't do so on its own.

The British company, Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co., runs major commercial operations at ports in Baltimore, Miami, New Jersey, New Orleans, New York and Philadelphia.

"The decision to finalize this deal should be put on hold until the administration conducts a more extensive review of this matter," said Frist. "If the administration cannot delay this process, I plan on introducing legislation to ensure that the deal is placed on hold until this decision gets a more thorough review."

First, who spoke to reporters in Long Beach, Calif., where he was on a fact-finding tour on port security and immigration issues, said he doesn't oppose foreign ownership, "but my main concern is national security."

Two Republican governors, New York's George Pataki and Maryland's Robert Ehrlich, voiced their own doubts a day earlier, as have other members of Congress.

But Bush, who has yet to issue a bill in more than five years in office, said sternly he would not back down.

"They ought to listen to what I have to say about this. They'll look at the facts and understand the consequences of what they're going to do," he said. "But if they pass a law, I'll deal with it with a veto."

In a sign of how volatile the issue has become in the uneasy climate after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, Bush pressed the topic yet again immediately upon his return to the White House, to make sure his position would be on camera as well. "This is a company that has played by the rules, has been cooperative with the United States, from a country that's an ally on the war on terror, and it would send a terrible signal to friends and allies not to let this transaction go through," the president said after emerging from his helicopter on the South Lawn.

At the Pentagon, the UAE was praised as an important strategic military partner by both Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Rumsfeld said a process was in place and "the process worked."

"Nothing changes with respect to security under the contract. The Coast Guard is in charge of security, not the corporation," Rumsfeld said.

The administration insisted that national security issues had received a full airing before the interagency panel that reviews such transactions gave the go-ahead.

In Los Angeles, Sen. Susan Collins, who heads the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, said she and Sen. Joseph Lieberman, D-Conn., sent a letter to Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff asking that the committee be fully briefed on the ports deal.

Collins, R-Maine, and Rep. Jane Harman, D-Calif., a ranking member on the House Intelligence Committee, said they are going to introduce a "joint resolution of disapproval" when they return to Washington next week.

Other lawmakers, including Rep. Peter King, R-N.Y., and Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said they would offer emergency legislation next week to block the deal ahead of a planned March 2 takeover.

Both governors indicated they may try to cancel lease arrangements at ports in their states because of the DP World takeover.

"Ensuring the security of New York's port operations is paramount and I am very concerned with the purchase of Peninsular & Oriental Steam by Dubai Ports World," Pataki said. "I have directed the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey to explore all legal options that may be available to them."

The arrangement brought protests from both political parties in Congress and a lawsuit in Florida from a company affected by the takeover.

Critics have noted that some of the 9/11 hijackers used the UAE as an operational and financial base. In addition, they contend the UAE was an important transfer point for shipments of smuggled nuclear components sent to Iran, North Korea and Libya by a Pakistani scientist.

Doctors puzzled by rise in use of C-sections

By Steve LeBlanc
Associated Press

BOSTON — Public health officials are puzzling over a medical mystery — why thousands of young, healthy women facing low risk births are opting instead to deliver by Caesarean section.

In 2004, nearly 13 percent of all C-sections in Massachusetts were performed on women under the age of 30 giving birth to their first child — considered the lowest risk birth group.

Health officials say they can't fully explain why, but suggest a range of possible explanations, from last minute medical complications to worries about malpractice and fears of a ruptured uterus to women asking for the surgery for their own reasons.

"There are a substantial number of women with no discernible risk having C-sections," said Bruce Cohen, director of research and epidemiology for the Department of Public Health.

The rise in C-sections among young, healthy women mirror an overall rise in the procedure in Massachusetts, which hit an all-time high in 2004, the most recent year for which statistics are available.

In the past seven years the rate of C-sections has climbed from 21 percent of births in Massachusetts to 31 percent — 7 percent higher than the national average. Of 22,892 C-sections in Massachusetts in 2004, 2,948 involved lowest risk pregnancies.

One reason for the rise in C-sections is malpractice insurance, according to Ronald Burkman, chairman of the department of obstetrics and gyneco logy at Baystate Medical Center in Springfield. A single claim can result in a $30,000-a-year hike in insurance rates, he said.

Another factor is the growing acceptance that C-sections are nearly as safe as vaginal births, he said.

Twenty years ago, a woman asking for a C-section without a pressing medical reason would likely be talked out of it by her doctor, Burkman said. Today, doctors are more willing to agree.

"Differences in risks between C-sections and vaginal births are not huge for the first (birth) so it has become more acceptable," he said.

For some working women, the chance to schedule a delivery rather than waiting to go into labor can be reason enough for opting for a C-section, he said. There are also solid medical reasons for C-sections, including the age of the mother, size of the baby and if it is a multiple birth.

Mary Barger, director of the midwifery education program at the Boston University School of Public Health, credits the rise of C-sections on what she calls a "cultural shift." As C-sections became safer, they also became a kind of routine default option, she said.

Even so, she said, the vast number of C-sections have some medical explanation.

"I think women coming in and requesting a C-section early in pregnancy even when they are healthy are still quite rare in Massachusetts," she said.

Even though C-sections are relatively safe, there are reasons to encourage women to deliver vaginally, she said. Hospitals with midwife programs tend to have lower numbers of C-sections.

Romney: DiMasi tax proposals stalling health care talks

By Glen Johnson
Associated Press

BOSTON — Gov. Mitt Romney said Tuesday negotiations toward a universal health care program for Massachusetts have stalled over House Speaker Salvatore DiMasi's insistence on imposing a tax on businesses failing to provide coverage for their employees.

"In my view, the only significant gap between the House and the Senate is a tax on business," the Republican chief executive told reporters after a speech at the Federal Reserve Bank. "And the House is insistent on taxing businesses and the Senate says 'No' and I, of course, have made it clear that I would veto a bill that puts a tax on businesses. Adding taxes to businesses in Massachusetts right now would kill more jobs. It's not a good idea."

For weeks Romney has gently tried to coax House and Senate conferees — as well as their leaders — toward a compromise, but in his comments following a speech that DiMasi attended, he made clear his growing impatience.

"I submitted my bill almost a year ago. I was told by leadership — in a very public way — that they would have the bill on my desk by Nov. 15. Then they said 'by the end of the year.' Then 'by Jan. 15.' Now we're Feb. 21 and I still don't have a bill," Romney said.

DiMasi was not immediately available for comment, but an aide said he had previously requested a health care summit with Romney and Travaglini. The session was set for midday Tuesday.

Under the speaker's proposal, Massachusetts companies employing more than 10 people would face a new payroll tax that they could avoid only by providing health insurance.

The measure, which aims to cover 95 percent of the state's roughly 500,000 uninsured residents within three years, would tax companies with fewer than 100 employees at 5 percent of their payroll. Those with more than 100 or more workers would be taxed at 7 percent.

The tax would be reduced or nullified if the companies provided a health care plan. Rep. Patricia Walrath, co-chairman of a legislative committee that discussed the proposal, said previously.

Employees, meanwhile, would be required to take advantage of the company health care plan, under a measure similar to the state law requiring drivers to get auto insurance before registering their automobile.

Romney has proposed reallocating the state's indigent care funding to provide employees and companies with incentives and subsidies for getting private health insurance coverage. The Senate, meanwhile, requires larger employers that don't offer insurance to reimburse the state if their workers use the state's "free care pool" for the uninsured.

While the House and Senate differ over the number of people to insure, the governor said, "I think that the major sticking point between the House and the Senate is over taxation, and that other measures ultimately will be able to be resolved."

Romney also repeated his previous warning that the delay put the state at risk for losing $385 million in federal assistance for indigent care that is predicated on Massachusetts implementing a plan for reducing the number of uninsured residents.

"That money is at risk, and of course our ability to support our hospitals in their critical safety net responsibility is therefore in jeopardy as we await the resolution of this item," he said.

Bush's healthcare plan not adequate

John Gruenenfelder

Medical coverage in our country has reached a crisis. Almost as disturbing as that is the fact that many people seem to not care about it. Oh, they'll complain in a poll or maybe write a letter to the newspaper, but is anything done? Politicians debate it back and forth while making remarkably little progress. The truth is that without a clear message from the people, the government is unlikely to take action soon.

Yet action must come, and soon, too. We have all probably heard the statistics about the millions of uninsured people in our country. For a country as wealthy and powerful as ours, that is a terrible number. Examples of how to correct this problem are all around. Americans, unfortunately, all too often ignore what other countries do as if the other way is automatically not as good because, if it was, we'd already be doing it. Sometimes, though, other countries can get it right and we can learn by example.

The answer, of course, is single payer insurance. That is, government provided healthcare coverage for all citizens. I am always amazed at how vociferous opponents to this idea can be. Some feel that it can't be made to work and some are beholden to large private insurance companies. Others like to equate social welfare programs with the ideals of communism. The best argument against single payer is cost. People fear that taxes will increase under such a system, and they're right. Taxes will go up, but there are two sides to the cost argument. At the same time taxes increase, the amount people currently pay for insurance in other forms, such as a payroll deduction, will decrease.

Proper healthcare coverage, in an age such as ours where it can actually be provided to all, should be seen as a societal obligation. This is not some sneaky communist program, nor a loft Utopian ideal. It's part of living together in a cohesive society.

Proper healthcare coverage, in an age such as ours where it can actually be provided to all, should be seen as a societal obligation. This is not some sneaky communist program, nor a lofty Utopian ideal. It's part of living together in a cohesive society. We all share the burden, more or less equally, for the betterment of all citizens. It's part of being a single nation and it's why we pay taxes.

Examine the other ways in which we collectively distribute cost. We have transportation, police and safety, clean water, defense, education and many others. Some come with a small additional cost, while others are entirely tax based. How is it unreasonable to fit healthcare into that list? It really shouldn't be.

Unlike many other services, which have a more or less constant cost associated with them, healthcare needs often come in spurts or sometimes not at all. It is entirely possible for a healthy person to go through life without ever needing any serious healthcare, or a person may become ill and require a substantial amount of money. By pooling our resources, the cost to provide healthcare for those who need it is distributed amongst everybody, and the individual cost decreases. The more people who are involved, the lower the cost.

President Bush's personal healthcare savings accounts are not the answer, and they may indeed do more harm than good. The majority of people who can afford to establish such an account are already relatively healthy with fairly low healthcare costs, but if they begin to leave other insurers in large enough numbers, then most of the people who remain will be those who pose the largest drain on the system. Without a large group of both healthy and unhealthy people supporting the system, then premiums will rise for those left behind.

Though I'd rather it not be the case, I have vested interest in seeing the system changed. Since I started college, I have very likely used more medical care than most of you will for the rest of your lives. My saving grace was decent healthcare coverage, at first provided by my father's employer and then by the University, but for me, the fact remains that I can never take a job anywhere that does not provide adequate healthcare coverage. To do so would be inviting instant bankruptcy. To make matters worse, if my coverage ever lapses for too long, a new insurer may not cover an existing condition. There are others like me, though not all are fortunate enough to have existing coverage.

Single payer insurance would solve many of our country's problems. Already, many companies are suffering under the extreme burden of massive healthcare costs. This is not their problem alone. It is our problem – all of us. We have to realize that the best way to support our society and our country is to share this burden. Just as we all pay for the education of children, whether we have children or not, so must we all pay for the healthcare of every citizen, healthy or not. It's one of the responsibilities of living together in a functioning society.

Equality for greeting cards

Paige Cram

Last week I had an epiphany...while standing in aisle 13 of the drug store. In most cases, you don't go to a place like CVS for an intellectual awakening; you go to run a few quick errands and move on with your life. But on that particular day, I was unusually aware of my surroundings.

First, I noticed that although it was only two days after Valentine's Day, the Easter displays were already up. As much as I love Peeps, I was horrified to see them two months early, but that's a topic for another column altogether.

The next thing I noticed was that all of the envelopes were missing from an entire section of cards. I'm not sure if there was an envelope shortage or if it was just someone's idea of a practical joke, but either way, I found it less than humorous since my sole purpose for this specific trip was to pick out a card for my friend's birthday.

And that's when it happened.

I was attempting to navigate my way through the rows and rows of cards marked "birthday" and decided to narrow my search by looking under "for woman." To my surprise, every single card was a joke about graying hair, sagging breasts and cake going straight to your thighs. "That's weird," I thought. They should've labeled this section "over the hill" or "getting older."

Just before moving on, my acute senses kicked in again as I noticed the adjacent section marked "for man." It was similar: filled with jokes about control of the remote, turning gray and playing golf, but directly below that was another section: "for gay." This was much more appropriate college-age humor, mostly clever one-liners about sex and drinking. Too bad my friend wasn't a "gay." I thought, if they have these cards for guys, they must have them for us, too.

Try as I might, I found no such thing, and that's when I realized: we don't even have a word that's the equivalent, let alone our own section in the card aisle. For the male sex, there are pretty clear distinctions: boys are children, guys are young adults or anyone my own age, and men are people like my father and grandfather – fully grown, financially stable and way too old for me. But for females, what is that middle category?

I've asked a few of my friends what they thought and words like "chick" and "lady" got tossed around, but the former is hardly flattering and the latter is rarely ever used. So what exactly are those of us between the ages of 18, when we're legally adults, and 40, when the card companies finally consider us women?

"Today's Man" sells designer suits and sweaters for all shapes and sizes, while stores with "woman" in the title are either maternity or plus size stores. So those of us who aren't old, fat or pregnant are lumped into the same category as 8-year-olds.

The answer is we're still girls. College girls, hot girls, girls gone wild. Working girls, office girls, girlfriends, and who would complain? If the definition of a woman is someone who use body weight, hair color and sex life are all going downhill, I sure wouldn't.

But when did the word "woman" start to have such a negative connotation? Another good example is clothing stores. "Today's Man" sells designer suits and sweaters for all shapes and sizes, while stores with "woman" in the title are either maternity or plus size stores. So those of us who aren't old, fat or pregnant are lumped into the same category as 8-year-olds.

In that case, it's no wonder there aren't any clever one-liners for female "twenty-somethings." Can you imagine looking under "for girls" to pick out a card for your young niece and grabbing something like "For your birthday, we wanted to get you a stripper..." I know I'd be both horrified and confused.

So it there's such a difference in the kinds of jokes that are appropriate for each generation, why isn't that difference reflected in the language? Maybe because the card company, and society in general, doesn't want to think of its daughters doing things like drinking or having sex, but if "guys" are doing it, what makes them think we're not?

Gwen Stefani sang about this attitude over 10 years ago on No Doubt's "Tragic Kingdom" album. "I'm just a girl in the world. That's all that you'll let me be." The song became extremely popular, fueled by the passion of Gwen's voice and the truth of the lyrics, but unfortunately not much has changed since then. As for me, I settled on a blank card for my friend. That way I can make up my own one-liner. But I am considering writing to Hallmark and telling them "I've had it up to here."

No need for guns whatsoever

Andrew Freeman

By now most of us have heard of Vice President Cheney's shooting incident. On Feb. 11, Cheney hit fellow hunter Harry Whittington with a shotgun blast while hunting quail; Whittington was injured in the head, neck and chest. This incident has been reported as an accident, which it is not.

Cheney's shotgun did exactly what it was supposed to do, which is to maim and injure, and potentially kill. That its blast hit a person, rather than a quail, does not make the outcome more accidental. The only purpose for a gun is to kill, and to do so easily. It has no inherent defensive value, like a shield or bulletproof vest does, and the only "protection" it offers is to kill before you are harmed.

These ideas may not sound radical, but they are. We are told that guns are cool, that guns are manly and that guns are fun. Men and boys, in particular, are taught by the media that having a gun is positive, that it will impart respect. Our cultural icons include the gun-slinging cowboy and the musket-packing frontiersman. These notions are so entrenched in our society that we ascribe noble and reverential qualities to firearms. We rarely, if ever, question the necessity of guns.

I believe that guns are necessary, but only for a very limited purpose –the protection of the citizenry and the state. An army is necessary to protect against invasion or attack; a police force is essential to safeguard against criminals. Individual citizens do not need guns, and the possession of them can lead to danger.

Take recreational hunting. In 1998, the latest year I could find data, there were 974 recorded hunting accidents in the United States, according to California's Department of Fish and Game. Of those 974, 668 incidents occurred in which one hunter shot another, and in 483 instances the shooter's weapon was a shotgun. In such shootings 65 people died, and another 28 died from self-inflicted accidents.

Every year people die unnecessarily while hunting. States have tried to cut down on the number of deaths by requiring hunters to wear bright "blaze orange" clothing to distinguish them from the brush. Nevertheless, hunting accidents occur: in the 1998 statistics, 22 people died and 229 were injured despite wearing the blaze orange.

A better way to reduce hunting casualties would be to ban shotguns, which were used in over 70 percent of two-party shootings. Shotguns disperse their pellets in large bursts, making it much easier to accidentally hit someone than with a single bullet. Another solution would be to limit the use of guns in general, as bows and crossbows accounted for only three injuries in 1998, none of them fatal.

Cheney's shotgun did exactly what it was supposed to do, which is to maim and injure, and potentially to kill. That its blast hit a person, rather than a quail, does not mark the outcome more accidental.

Guns also play a major role in suicide. According to the Centers for Disease Control, 55 percent of suicides in 2001 were carried out with a gun. Women admit to attempting suicide around three times more than men, but men are four times more likely to die from their attempts.

This discrepancy is in part attributable to the fact that men are more likely to use guns – 60 percent of successful suicides by men in 2001 were accomplished with guns, according to the CDC. In 2003, 17,108 people killed themselves with firearms, making suicide a greater cause of death than homicide with guns – which claimed 11,920.

The chief argument in favor of gun possession is constitutional. The Second Amendment of the Constitution reads: "A well-regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free state, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be abridged." In that period, there was no standing army, and the defense of states and the nation itself rested on ordinary citizens.

Today we have a professional Army, which is armed by our tax dollars – mobilizing the citizens of today would probably be viewed as a violation of their rights. Our current system adequately provides for the national defense, so some gun proponents argue that gun-wielding citizens are necessary to prevent government tyranny. This argument is laughable, because a tyranny armed with tanks and jets would slaughter such insurgents. The best safeguard against tyranny is activism, to prevent the decay of democracy, and civil disobedience, to undermine the regime's credibility.

There are many ways to reduce the harmful effects of guns on our society, in the short term. These include regulating sales of firearms at gun shows, requiring background checks for all purchases and banning the deadliest weapons. However, as long as we embrace guns as cool, macho and necessary, they will continue to exact a dreadful toll on our society.

One day, I hope, we will realize that guns are not necessary for individuals, and the costs of widespread gun ownership from accidents, suicides and homicides are too high.

Why waste yourself on alcohol?

Michael Toomey

I don't think anyone — students, faculty, administrators — could deny that this school has a reputation. Of course each part of the involved stratosphere would have a different take on its credibility, but a reasonable person will admit that the alcohol abuse at UMass has achieved an almost inconceivable notoriety.

Back home in Cambridge, more than a few members of the peanut gallery took it upon themselves to remind me that in January, I was going to a "party" school. So consistent was this description that I envisioned a mass-melee of liquor-fueled debauchery and asked, "What am I getting myself into?" I choose to spend my leisure time clear-headed and upright, which made my decision to attend this University a little nebulous.

As we fast forward past my first week of attendance and my consequent exploration of what goes on in this distinctly "wild" place, I noticed little difference between here and the campuses surrounding my hometown. In fact, I've seen a good bit more public drunkenness in the prestigious Harvard Square than late night around Southwest.

I believe the fact that we have a large student body existing in a relatively remote location isolates us into being an easily observable specimen of college lifestyle. It's somewhat common knowledge that social drinking is a defining characteristic of the typical college experience. This is actually an irresponsible view to take, because excessive drinking is not a college problem; we forget that most college drinkers have started using alcohol before high school, and that most will continue to drink socially later in their lives. Alcohol abuse is not a college issue, but one engrained in the American condition, if not indeed the human condition.

... We forgot that most college drinkers have started using alcohol before high school, and that most will continue to drink socially later in their lives. Alcohol abuse is not a college issue, but one engrained in the American condition, if not indeed the human condition.

To gain an understanding of this cross-cultural phenomenon, we need to look at why as people we feel the need for an experience that can be described as being "wasted," "plowed," "tanked," "trashed" or "messed-up." It's well documented that alcohol dulls your faculties, physically and mentally, to the point where it's easy to lose yourself until you wake up the next day often with more to regret than the excruciating headache. Why then do an estimated 50.3 percent of Americans (according to the findings of the 2004 National Survey on Drug Use and Health) feel a regular need to "waste" themselves?

It's probably safe to assume that most of us here at UMass, and most certainly at my old stomping grounds around Harvard, have comparatively high living standards. So it's clear that drinking habits can be dismissed as solely escapist mechanisms of the poor and socially deprived.

Actually, alcohol is so culturally engrained in our society that it manages to slip under the stigmas heaped on "drugs." Indeed, while the user of other drugs maintains the public image of a tattered soul withering away on a street corner, the user of alcohol is aggrandized in warped ads where he enjoys the company of several buxom women on a mountaintop. However, this image is a lie. Boozing has a woeful foundation of the scathing insecurity and unending anxiety that characterizes modern American life.

There is a distinct uneasiness in the way we live. We are told countless times daily that every facet of being human can and should be improved. The commercial nature of society has convinced a majority of us that everything can be sold or prescribed to make things better. You can't go to the bathroom? Get laxatives. You can't sleep? Try Ambien. You can't find yourself in the company of bikini-clad beauties? Buy our magazine.

After subconsciously ingesting so many of these suggestions, we begin to believe that our own experience of life is inadequate, and that things "would be better if only ..." There is tremendous pressure to get somewhere, in your job, in your spirituality, with your hair, with your smell, even.

Drinking dulls our perception of these pressures and essentially eliminates our facility to be concerned with anything but the distorted present. We've become so familiar, so accepting of a process that in its essence inhibits the mind, body and spirit, that it just seems very natural to being human.

Given the acute anxiety we are inundated by, there's no blaming the majority of us for trying to escape by doing something that seems to work. But the question we need to ask is a big one, to more deeply understand our struggles and how they're connected to what we've been taught to value; "Why are we going anywhere when we can't be here now?"

U.N. denies war on terror exists

World Perspectives

Ben Duffy

You might not know it, with the 24-hour coverage of the Cheney hunting accident, but there are other things going on in the world. Last week, the U.N. Commission on Human Rights (UNCHR) issued a report on the Guantanamo Bay detention facility, where the United States is currently holding approximately 520 prisoners captured on the battlefields of Afghanistan during the 2001 war.

As you might expect, the UNCHR criticizes Guantanamo Bay and calls for its closure. Sec. of Defense Donald Rumsfeld has told reporters that the facility will not be shut down, and commented that Annan is "just flat wrong." Guantanamo is not going anywhere. Well, the report dragged on for 54 pages, but I slugged painfully through most of it. It was about as much fun as reading 54 pages of Molly Ivins columns.

Here's an interesting tidbit on page 12, "The fundamental proposition of the United States government with regard to ... Guantanamo Bay is '[t]hat the law of war allows the United States ... to hold enemy combatants without charges or access to counsel for the duration of hostilities. Detention is not an act of punishment but of security and military necessity. It serves the purpose of preventing combatants from continuing to take up arms against the United States.' ... [We] share the understanding that any person having committed a belligerent act in the context of an international armed conflict and having fallen into the hands of one of the parties of the conflict (In this case, the United States) can be held for the duration of hostilities, as long as the detention serves the purpose of preventing the enemy from continuing to take up arms against the United States."

The fundamental proposition of the United States Government with regard to the deprivation of liberty of persons held at Guantánamo Bay is that "[t]he law of war allows the United States – and any other country engaged in combat – to hold enemy combatants without charges or access to counsel for the duration of hostilities. Detention is not an act of punishment but of security and military necessity. It serves the purpose of preventing combatants from continuing to take up arms against the United States." 19 While the Chairperson of the Working Group and the Special Rapporteur would not use the term "enemy combatant," they share the understanding that any person having committed a belligerent act in the context of an international armed conflict and having fallen into the hands of one of the parties to the conflict (in this case, the United States) can be held for the duration of hostilities, as long as the detention serves the purpose of preventing combatants from continuing to take up arms against the United States. Indeed, this principle encapsulates a fundamental difference between the laws of war and human rights law with regard to deprivation of liberty. In the context of armed conflicts covered by international humanitarian law, this rule constitutes the lex specialis justifying deprivation of liberty which would otherwise, under human rights law as enshrined by article 9 of ICCPR, constitute a violation of the right to personal liberty. In this section, the U.N. finally admits the obvious – that prisoners of war are not entitled to trials like common criminals. This was uncontroversial for the whole of human history, but some people seem to have become confused on this point since 9/11.

But don't get your hopes up. The U.N.'s moment of common sense was fleeting. The report continues, "Because detention "without charges or access to counsel for the duration of hostilities' amounts to a radical departure from established principles of human rights law, it is particularly important between the detainees captured by the United States in the course of an armed conflict and those captured under circumstances that did not involve an armed conflict. In this context, it is to be noted that the global struggle against international terrorism does not, as such, constitute an armed conflict for the purposes of ... international humanitarian law."

When taken together, the official position of the U.N. is that detaining terrorists at Guantanamo would be authorized if the war on terror was an actual war, but it is in fact not a war. I sharply disagree with the U.N. on this point, but it really illustrates an important one. Despite the howling of liberals about the important role of the exalted United Nations, the U.N. is not the right vehicle for the prosecution of this war. Besides being a bloated, corrupt, lazy institution, they don't really believe that we're at war. For those liberals who believe that the U.N. has all the solutions to the war on terror, I have one question. How can they win the war, when they deny that one even exists?

The U.N. has proved itself to be just about useless since the attacks of 9/11. Their first reaction was to issue U.N. Resolution 1373, which amounted to saying "terrorism is bad, and member states should not cooperate with terrorist organizations." Short of passing a resolution (which is about all the U.N. is good at), and "allowing" the U.S. to invade Afghanistan, the U.N. has done close to nothing to combat terrorism.

Despite the howling of liberals about the important role of the exalted United Nations, the U.N. is not the right vehicle for the prosecution of this war. Besides being a bloated, corrupt, lazy institution, they don't really believe that we're at war.

In fact, they have failed to even come up with a definition for the word "terrorism." The U.N.'s Website offers a waffling statement about its failure to define the word "terrorism."

"The lack of agreement on a definition of terrorism has been a major obstacle to meaningful international countermeasures. Cynics have often commented that one state's 'terrorist' is another state's 'freedom fighter.'" To say that the lack of a definition for the word "terrorism" has been "a major obstacle" to combating it is an understatement. It makes the U.N. almost entirely impotent in this aspect.

This should not come as a surprise. The U.N. is a reflection of its member states, and many of them are quite simply not concerned with eradicating terrorism. This was the problem that the U.N. faced when trying to define terrorism – each proposed definition was shot down by Middle Eastern nations who didn't want their favorite Palestinian "freedom fighters" to fall under the U.N.'s definition of terrorism. Consequently, no definition has been reached.

To hear the liberals tell it, the United States has acted totally irrationally since the attacks of Sep. 11th, and it would only make sense to use the full power of the U.N. to combat terrorism. The Bush administration, in its arrogance, has chosen not to.

I'm sure President Bush would love some help from the U.N. in winning the war on terror, but as it stands now, the U.N. does not believe that such a thing exists. No, the path to defeating these lunatics in headscarves does not lead through the United Nations. Their solution to every problem to pass a meaningless resolution – just won't cut it when it comes to destroying terrorism. Thank you, United Nations, for abandoning your host country in its hour of need.

Tabloids outweigh newspapers

Rebecca Paskievich

I know the name of Jessica Simpson's dog but can't explain why our country is at war. I can sink the last cup in Beirut but am stumped with certain state capitals. I am disgusted to admit this and saddened to know that, although these statements are true, I am much more knowledgeable than many of my peers about issues outside of celebrity life, like iPods, video games, MTV and partying.

The minds of America's youth today are bombarded with a myriad of thoughts, most of which involve "me." Teens and 20-year-olds are conscious of how others judge them and are starving for a role model to demonstrate what's cool. We party instead of watching the nightly news. We read trashy tabloids as opposed to the newspaper. If, by chance, we do glance through the Sunday paper, we'll fiddle through until we find the inevitable pop culture article, study the photo and skim over the text.

I recognize the ignorance we, the youth of America, have towards important issues. Everyday interactions and conversations pertain to petty issues. We struggle through insignificant drama with our friends when we have no idea what it means to truly endure hardship. Young people were concerned and sympathetic when the tragedy in New Orleans occurred, but most likely bought the newest Madden video game instead of donating to the relief effort. Although we want our troops to come home soon and the problems overseas to disappear, we will flip to the Patriots game after five seconds of media coverage on the war in Iraq.

Instead of being rebels by protesting a political action, we get our noses pierced or dish out $300 for a pair of sunglasses. The goal is no longer to show maturity through active citizenship, but to promote a sense of self through material belongings.

We struggle through insignificant drama with our friends when we have no idea what it means to truly endure hardship. Young people were concerned and sympathetic when the tragedy in New Orleans occurred, but most likely brought the newest Madden video game instead of donating to the relief effort.

Why the change? It's not a case where overnight, anyone under the age of 30 decided to turn their heads from global issues to the local liquor store and the E! channel; society has transformed the way youths think, act and respond to issues around us.

When the media focuses on glamour, celebrity, money, sex and drinking, young people soak it up as a critical part of life. Shows like VH1's "The Fabulous Life Of," which displays the outrageous spending of different A-listers, and MTV's "Sweet Sixteen" series, which features spoiled teens and the process of throwing extravagant 16th birthday parties (swearing at parents and making mean comments about those not invited included) contribute to glorified profligate living. Our fascination with the rich and the famous shrouds critical issues we should be concerned with.

Because we aren't directly affected by the issues around the world, it seems unnecessary to start worrying or even caring about them. It will not be until we have the potential for being harmed, or immediately affected by a particular event or political standpoint, when we will make a judgment. And even then, our "opinion" will most likely be the regurgitated thoughts of another.

We can get away with not knowing significant issues of our time, and therefore decide not to bother to get informed. Although there do exist young people who are politically and socially aware, the majority, myself included, remain in the dark, sucked into the obsessive craze of pop culture and issues directly concerning ourselves. I aim to become more aware of subjects besides Brad and Angelina; I strongly advise all of you to do the same.

BRANDT'S GUN SHOW AND MEN'S CREW TEAM COLLIDE

The other day my roommate posted an away message, "When they discover the center of the universe, some people will be disappointed to find out they aren't it." Each day, every one of us crosses paths with an individual who clearly suffers from the belief that he is the greatest thing since sliced bread, and on last Wednesday mine was Jon Brandt.

Every student at this University is swamped each semester with new fees, but has no idea of where this money goes. A very small portion of this is directed at intramural and recreational activities on campus for all students and staff to use. And guess what, that includes members of the UMass Men's Crew Team. Yes, it is true, atop the basement gym of Boyden sits the Varsity-Athlete only gym; good thing the Men's Crew team is a club, participant, fee-based activity.

As an RSO, the team relies heavily on University funding that wouldn't suffice the cost of six-and-under T-Bell through Amherst Parks and Recreation. The 40 plus members of this highly competitive and nationally ranked squad pay upwards of $2000 to the University, race entry fees, coaches' salaries and equipment needs (the average heavyweight 8+ rivals a nicely equipped E-Class Mercedes-Benz in price).

While I can sympathize with the plight of all those who witness the daily "gun shows," stuffy air, bad lighting and windowless basement of Boyden, I bet any member of the men's crew team would love to provide a tour of their former home in Totman to all those curious, especially Mr. Brandt (assuming there is a maintenance guy willing to unlock the deadbolt).

A room with no circulation, asbestos-like air quality and a few meager free weights so generously provided by the University, some official (had you done your homework, you'd know it's not the Athletic Director) decided this room would be better used as an elevator equipment/maintenance room. Oh, Chancellor Lombardi, you're too kind. Given a week's notice to get out or see their equipment in a dumpster, the team was forced to relocate. While the fate of their room hangs in limbo, the team continues to practice.

Here is where Jon Brandt's gun show and the men's crew team collide. As students of this University, the crew team has just as much right to bench, squat, elliptical or flex their muscles in front of the mirror as Mr. Brandt does. If the audacity of other students invading his personal exercise bubble is too overwhelming, perhaps he ought to invest in one of the Wellness Centers, the private gyms located in dorms across campus for a measly $100 a semester. Staffed by people who can tell you the difference between a dumbbell bench press and a dumbbell press up, it even comes with windows, towels, fresh air and plenty of weights and machines. It just might be the best $100 you've ever spent.

I'll be expecting my ticket in the mail to Mr. Brandt's gun show. Tragically, so long as other equally paying students invade his personal exercise space, my ticket will have to wait.

UMASS STUDENTS COMPLAIN BUT DON'T CLEAN

I read in The Collegian that the students are crying bloody murder over tuition and fee hikes. I would have more sympathy for them if I didn't see them abuse the wonderful resource that the University is the way they do.

I am a maintainer and I spend an hour every night picking up the bottles, cans, food wrappers and even remains of meals students leave behind in the classrooms and auditoriums, and mopping up the beverages students kick over in the auditoriums, beverages which run from the top all the way down to the bottom of the auditoriums, forcing us maintainers to walk in between every row, scrubbing at the spills that dry and chemically bond to the floor over the course of the day.

All this extra person-power has to be purchased by the University. What a waste of the University's budget. I don't mind cleaning up messes that are the unavoidable product of living, such as dirty toilets, but removing bowls of cereal swirling in milk from the auditoriums and chasing off ant farms that are organizing around crushed Pop Tarts should be unnecessary.

The school could save money on electricity if students would turn out the lights when they leave classrooms and labs. Likewise, it could save money on trash disposal fees if people would put recyclables in the appropriate containers instead of in the trash, and could even make some more money selling some of the recyclable materials.

But can students find their way to these recycling containers, even when they are mere inches away from the trash containers? No. In the trash it goes – if we're lucky – or otherwise on the floor, as previously noted. I don't know what students are going to do with their college degrees when they don't even know what to do with simple terms such as "Bottles & Cans" and "Mixed Paper."

Before I worked in academic buildings I worked in the dorms. The messes students make there are so explosively gross I can only put it down to some incomprehensible pathology. I wish I could give you some examples, but I'm sure editorial etiquette would dictate they cannot be printed here. But you know – you've lived there and seen them. I can say that breaking lounge tables in half, leaving sinks running until they flood the whole floor and breaking bathroom mirrors so everyone can cut themselves on the shards will not achieve the goal of keeping fees down.

But hey, they're providing jobs for me and dozens of my coworkers, so let 'em live on in their piggish ways. They're only hurting themselves, but I can't recognize their basis for complaining about school costs going up until they've cleaned their side of the street, i.e., quit imposing unnecessary costs on the school – and on all Massachusetts taxpayers – which, if they work, they are one of, so they're hurting themselves doubly.

Yup, the five percent the state takes and which everybody complains about is going, in part, to clean up their messes. My mother stopped cleaning up my messes once I got into kindergarten. By then it was understood that I could recognize and take responsibility for my own actions. Perhaps the people who trash the University are developmentally delayed, and we have to cover up the fact by cleaning up after them so visiting parents won't be horrified by seeing the truth. Nevertheless, they're adding to the costs for everyone.

ELDERS REDUCE FREEDOMS THEY WERE AFFORDED

As a student of the University of Massachusetts, I can't help but be appalled by the new alcohol policy enacted for the spring 2006 semester. While at their core, the changes may not be individually extreme, the ideology behind these changes is absurd, crazed and scary at best. While reducing the amount of alcohol students over the age of 21 are allowed to keep seems logical and perhaps acceptable, changes in policy that target our culture are discriminating and an embarrassment to our institution.

Massachusetts is a state known for liberal, progressive views, as are our college campuses. The fact that any university in Massachusetts would attempt to systematically reduce and quell the culture and lifestyle of its students seems so inane it is hard to fathom it occurring anywhere outside Bob Jones University, never mind UMass.

Beer pong, Kings and drinking in general help define our age group and society. While underage drinking may be an issue at times, reducing our liberties and rights (i.e. to decorate our living spaces) is not an acceptable course of action. As students, how we choose to live our lives defines not only our education, but our experiences and our future.

Consuming alcohol may play a role in this at a person's discretion, but the concept that our administration seeks to reduce our choices and put down our culture is unacceptable. American society has had a long standing allusion between college and drinking (see "Animal House"), probably because it is during the college years that we have the opportunity to socialize so often and easily.

Why our elders in the administration seek to reduce our ability to live with the freedoms they were afforded is beyond normal comprehension. We are simply a product of their society, and are perfectly capable of making choices to suit ourselves.

Reducing underage or irresponsible drinking is an admirable goal – if it is approached appropriately. The neo-conservative, pseudo-Nazi ideology that results in outlawing funnels, and more importantly, prohibiting a section of our culture and lifestyle, is preposterous and is a shameful scar to place on academia as a whole.

HOMETOWN DEFENSE OF FRAMINGHAM

A few weeks back, The Collegian published an editorial by Dan O'Brien regarding the town of Hadley, and how it's currently becoming another shopping Mecca that the state doesn't need. That's not my quarrel with him. No, it has more to do with the town you compared Hadley's possible future self to: the hometown of many fine students at this college and me, Framingham.

Framingham is neither the Sodom nor the Gomorra of shopping that you painted it out to be. Far from that in fact, as it is a wonderfully diverse town, which is also one of the world's largest, with far more to offer the public than just its shopping. While Route 9 does happen to pass through the town, it's only a sliver of the overall layout, and I'm not claiming Framingham to be a paradise, but it was certainly given an unfair picture by his article.

Yes, we have a Wal-Mart and yes, we are right next to the Natick Mall, but that's only the section on Route 9. You are sadly mistaken if you think the entire town of Framingham has been "taken over" by shopping centers. Keep in mind, when driving through Framingham on a Saturday afternoon right after Christmas you are bound to hit a ton of traffic, which does not constitute the town becoming a hell-hole of congestion.

In honesty, one would be hard pressed to find another township with as much going for it as Framingham: it has history, entertainment, an excellent high school and a variety of different cultures residing within its borders. While Framingham does undoubtedly have a massive Brazilian population, I can assure you as someone who has lived and worked aside Brazilians for 20 years that they are far from HIV-infected, Wal-Mart shopping, serial rapists like Evandro Doirado, whom you mentioned in your article.

Framingham has always attracted a strange breed of folks, regardless of race or creed, and no matter how many shopping malls we have, it won't stop that rare form of lunacy that the town houses. I'd blame Wal-Mart for this incident before I blame the town; they already have a bad reputation to start with.

Hadley would be lucky to have half as many advantages as a town like Framingham does, but I'll stop myself there. My aim is to not take an insult to my hometown lying down, and clarify to those who haven't been there and who read The Collegian that Framingham isn't just a slice of western capitalist filth and a virtual purgatory of traffic jams. Perhaps, sir, one day you'll discover this on your own time.

'All the President's Men,' Put Back To[illegible] Again

'All the President's Men'
Directed by Alan J Pakula
Starring Dustin Hoffman
Warner Home Video
Rated R
138 mins.
Grade B+

By Terry Lawson
Daily Hampshire Gazette

Any excuse would be acceptable to justify a DVD upgrade of Alan J. Pakula's "All the President's Men" (4 stars, Warner, $26.98), but the two-disc special edition was most likely pushed forward to reflect the self-outing (or family-outing) last year of Mark Felt, the high-ranking FBI official who had been one of various White House insiders suspected of being the clandestine source Deep Throat. Though Bob Woodward and Carl Bernstein's dogged, shoe-leather reporting for the Washington Post might have resulted in unraveling the Watergate cover-up without Felt's "follow the money" nods in the right direction, he still can be credited for his role in changing history.

The film version of Woodward and Bernstein's real-life detective story was released in 1976, a scant two years after President Richard Nixon was forced to resign in the face of impeachment. In that era of pre-instant everything, Pakula maintained a sense of urgency and suspense, no small feat because everyone who saw it knew how it would end. Casting Robert Redford and Dustin Hoffman, two of the biggest movie stars of the era, was also a risk. Could they be believable as previously unheralded beat reporters?

Not only did the actors pull it off, their very different working styles helped them in recreating a similar relationship between button-down Bob and long-haired (for a newsroom, anyway) Carl. The film was impeccably cast, with Jason Robards as Post editor Ben Bradlee, whose job and reputation was on the line as the paper came under attack from the White House. Hal Holbrook was the mysterious Mr. Throat, whose portrayal of someone he couldn't know is now revealed to be pretty accurate.

The film's dissection of investigative reporting sent more than a few impressed students into journalism school and the newspaper business. Many of them may spend at least part of their time revisiting the film muttering about the good old days.

Visually, the beautifully shot (by Gordon Willis), film-noir-styled "All the President's Men" is much improved upon from its original release in 1997; it's considerably crisper, and Willis' love for dark composition is far-better served. The mono soundtrack has also been remixed to advantage, but the real draw will be the extras, especially the scene-specific commentary by Redford, who answers just about every question one might have about the film's production. Nevertheless, extras include an interesting, if, at 30 minutes, too-brief making-of documentary, "Telling the Truth About Lies." The 18-minute piece looks at the impact "Woodstein" and the story had on journalism, and the raison d'etre, "Out of the Shadows: The Man Who Was Deep Throat," addresses Felt's motivations and how his identity was protected by the reporters and Bradlee for more than 30 years.

Another film used to make the case that the 1970s was the last great decade of filmmaking (even though it was released in the summer of 1969), "Midnight Cowboy" has also been released as a two-disc "Special Edition" (4 stars, MGM), just in time to remind us that this year's best picture front-runner "Brokeback Mountain" is not the first film about "alternative lifestyles" to capture the Academy members' imaginations.

The drama stars a young Jon Voight as Joe Buck, a Texas dishwasher who goes to Manhattan, having heard that rich ladies will pay a lot of money to be serviced by a stud like him. He winds up selling his product in men's washrooms and bunking with low-life motor-mouth Ratso Rizzo (Dustin Hoffman), who became one of the most indelible characters in movie history. If Ratso were alive today, he would undoubtedly be a regular guest on Howard Stern's show.

Though "Midnight Cowboy" failed to make it explicit, perhaps because director John Schlesinger figured it was unnecessary, the relationship between Joe and Ratso was clearly homoerotic; it's one of the reasons it was originally given an X-rating. (It was re-rated R when it was re-released two years later.)

The controversy surrounding an X-rated candidate for best picture is addressed in a featurette called "Controversy and Acclaim," but the best of the newly added material is "After Midnight," a 30-minute look back at the making of the movie and its impact. This, I am told, is newly produced and not just a retitled "Midnight Cowboy Revisited," which accompanied the film when it was shown unedited on cable's Turner Classic Movies. There is also a brief tribute to Schlesinger, who died in 2003. Again, a remastering has improved the visual quality, most notably in the black-and-white flashbacks, and the original mono soundtrack (which has been included) has been deftly remixed into Dolby Digital 5.1 surround.

When "Midnight Cowboy" was released, homosexuality was still being referred to as "kinky." The word can still, however, be used in reference to the 1960s British spy satire "The Avengers." It starred Patrick Macnee as bowler-hatted secret agent John Steed, and beginning in 1965, when the series was first shown in the United States, Diana Rigg as his partner Emma Peel, whose sartorial preference was form-fitting black leather. (Steed's original partner, played by Honor Blackman, had gone off to play Pussy Galore in the James Bond movie "Goldfinger.")

It is fair to say that much of the series' appeal was found in the thoroughly liberated-in-every-way Peel, something now acknowledged in "The Avengers: The Complete Emma Peel Megaset Collection" (3 stars, A&E, $199.95), which contains every episode of the show in which Peel faced the state's enemies with her wits, weapons and sexual innuendo. The 16 discs collect the 51 (now remastered) episodes from the two seasons in which Peel costarred (the first was in black and white, the second was in color) along with a chapter of the 1977 revival "The New Avengers" in which Rigg had a cameo. Also included are the three pre-Peel so-called "lost episodes" that were not included on previous collections of the series, broadcast in Britain in 1961-62.

All fans will have their favorite Peel moments and outfits, but special attention should be paid to the memorable "Touch of Brimstone" episode, which is the source of all those fetish photos of Peel in a spiked dog collar that, more than a decade later, became a staple of English punk couture.

Comedy duo set to spark up The Calvin with improv act

By Alex Butler
Collegian Staff

Okay, so here's the deal. These two guys claim to be great at it, but when it comes to describing what it is they actually do, they stumble around and things get difficult. It's not because these men are incompetent when it comes to words (though, who really knows for sure?). The point is they make comedy using a different act every time. And they do it really well. Good enough for primetime television. They are Brad Sherwood and Colin Mochrie, and they stem from Drew Carrey's "Whose Line Is It Anyway?" And they are coming to Northampton on Thursday to present their two-man show, "An Evening With Colin Mochrie and Brad Sherwood."

Improv comedy is really hard, just ask anyone who has tried it at the UMass Improv team and has fallen right on their faces. It is not an easy game to play when everything that is in front of you is new, different and completely unexpected. And the traveling duo likes to seep themselves in it. They are experts, some might say. But in the world of making comedy where anything can happen next, it takes a much sharper wit to get by.

It's a shame that the other actors from the show can't make it to little old Northampton on Feb. 23, but we can certainly make do with what is coming. With the musical sharpness of Brad Sherwood and the sheer quickness of Colin Mochrie, there is little chance that the audience will be let down. It would be pretty lame to be disappointed if some television show you loved for years just packed up their stuff and made it into a road show. It would be too much, like going back in time to see Laurel and Hardy perform. Even further than that, it could be compared to the Dark Ages, right when Kings and Queens were being entertained with jesters from across the land. And who wants that? All those colors and silly hats? Slavery? Come on. Let's evolve a bit and go to a theatre. Forget those jester bells for a bit. We're getting way ahead of ourselves.

But if, somehow, you aren't familiar with either of these guys, you have most likely still seen them around. It seems Colin Mochrie is taking time out of his busy schedule of having a confusing last name and being the Snack Fairy for Nabisco Cookies (he's the one reminding all of us to be sensible snackers). And Brad Sherwood, well, Brad is used to jumping around from television show to television show, playing a random character here or there. But these two are dedicated members of their craft. I'm talking about love, here.

It is a relatively new fascination with improv comedy, but something that TV audiences have come to grips with. People love watching something that is completely and utterly out of their grasp. Watching the joke switch from one aspect to another is something we can appreciate. No one can do this quite like these guys. They're killers on the road.

The comedy duo is going to be shining at the Calvin Theatre Thursday, Feb 23 at 8 p.m. Tickets are a hefty load, but completely worth it to see two veterans of the improvational war. The show will surely amaze, and spare no one from laughs. Run to the Calvin if you can. Run for your life.

Drew Carrey's improvisational comedy show, 'Whose Line Is It Anyway?' stars Brad Sherwood and Colin Mochrie. The pair will be performing at The Calvin Theater tomorrow night.

Cracker should 'Get on With it'

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

Cracker
'Get On With It: The Best Of'
VCT

In their storied, lengthy career, Cracker has always been the alt-country band with real rock 'n' roll attitude. Breaking through in 1993 with the massive hit single "Low," Cracker combined various elements of rock, country, folk, blues and alternative rock to make a sound that was unique, memorable and intelligently fun. While the band never again saw the success that "Low" and its accompanying album "Kerosene Hat" had, they have stuck it out in the meantime, releasing a handful of albums that vary in quality but are always interesting.

Even though Cracker is still around today, the band's old record label, Virgin Records, has decided it is time to cash in with a greatest hits album. "Get On With It: The Best Of" starts off on the right foot with Cracker's first single, and one of their best, 1992's "Teen Angst (What The World Needs Now)," a witty, biting song with the chorus, "What the world needs now are some true words of wisdom like 'la la la la la' / 'Cause what the world needs now is another folk singer like I need a hole in my head." "Get On With It" forsakes most of the rest of the band's self-titled debut, unfortunately neglecting the simple but excellent "Happy Birthday To Me." "Get On With It" fares better with "Kerosene Hat," arguably Cracker's finest moment and certainly their most popular. The collection features the aforementioned "Low," "Get Off This" (which features the line that this collection takes its name from), "Lonesome Johnny Blues" and the epic folk-quiet/rock 'n' roll-loud travelogue "Euro-Trash Girl" (sadly shaved of a few minutes here).

As the collection progresses, so does Cracker's love for more roots-based music. While the grunge-batting screamer "I Hate My Generation" makes a welcome appearance, it sits next to the country-fried ballad "Big Dipper" — both from 1996's "The Golden Age." While all greatest hits collections are sure to neglect a few songs, and perhaps include some questionable ones, "Get On With It" does Cracker the great favor of at least attempting to show the diversity of their catalogue. However, the collection does not go out of its way to include all of the band's less commercially successful highlights. 2002's outstanding "Forever" is woefully underrepresented, though "Guarded By Monkeys," one of the highlights of the album and one of Cracker's very best tunes, is included.

"Get On With It" is not Cracker's stab at putting together the greatest hits, it is their ex-record label's, which does not make for an unbiased, completely air-tight collection. And Cracker, for all their smarts and attitude, are aware of this. The band has assembled their own collection; "Greatest Hits: Redux" which features a similar tracklist with one catch; all the songs have been newly re-recorded by the band and are said to sound more like the expanded live versions than simple retreads of old songs. The most noticeable difference in Cracker's version, their crude, beer-stained, country-hillbilly kiss-off to Virgin Records titled, "It Ain't Gonna Suck Itself." Not the band's most subtle moment but yet another part of the grand picture that is Cracker.

While die-hard fans will probably seek out "Greatest Hits: Redux," "Get On With It" serves as a solid introduction to Cracker for new fans or curious parties, and it is hard to complain about an album that is stacked wall-to-wall with great songs. However, like almost any greatest hits collection, it simply is no substitute for the band's real body of work.

The country-folk stylings of Cracker has contributed to the band's lengthy career and rock 'n' roll fan base following that still survives today.

Joy Zipper whips up psychedelic flair and unique harmonies

Whether they're eating Italian food or pitching perfect harmonies on their new album 'American Whip,' the musical duo Joy Zipper are sure to charm their fans.

Joy Zipper could easily fall under the heading of one of the darkest sunshine pop bands or one of the brightest, lightest shoegaze acts in the genre's history. On "American Whip," the duo that is Joy Zipper, Vincent Cafiso and Tabitha Tindale, combine dense, occasionally ominous sounds with lilting, pitch-perfect harmonies. My Bloody Valentine mastermind and shoegaze hero Kevin Shields had a hand in the mixing of the album and it shows in the subtle, psychedelic flairs that are weaved into the songs, but the much more prominent influences are the Beach Boys harmonies that Cafiso and Tindale float out into the air.

Often Joy Zipper seems most designed to capture the mood of the sun disappearing on a warm summer night. In fact, Joy Zipper is well aware of the bizarre universe that their songs have created. The strongest track on the album, "Out Of The Sun," builds into a chorus where Tindale, who often recalls Kim Deal at her best, channels the Breeders, talk-singing while Cafiso chants "I love the sun" on both sides of her vocals. "Out Of the Sun" is one of those songs that is immediately appealing and, after multiple listens, still incredibly rewarding. It's a track that has the feel of one of those rare hit singles, it's catchy, smart and would sound great blasting out of car windows at every turn. Joy Zipper's strengths are almost immediately apparent and the band wastes no time in jumping into their trademark sound, instantly offering what they clearly know is a charming sound.

However, the band's weaknesses are presented just as forwardly. Cafiso is very much hit-and-miss with his lyrics, which very often cross the line into ridiculous and juvenile. "Alzheimers" opens with the verse, "Why do I keep forgetting my name / Maybe it's something I ate / What is this terrible thing coming over me?" The chorus answers him with the titular disease. "Ron" features the lines, "Ron, when we were young / I told you not to cry / Now we're growing old and you're a jerk." There is the short interlude "Drugs," which just has Cafiso singing, "Getting me into drugs, turning me onto drugs" with Tindale providing backing vocals for emphasis on the word "drugs." It reaches for aimless hipster "cool" and is all the less appealing for it. However, it is followed by "Dosed and Became Invisible" with the chorus, "Psilocybin everyday / Blew my mind in every way / The answer crawled into my brain / Psilocybin everyday." "Dosed" is one of the strongest, most effective and most interesting tracks on "American Whip," and this juxtaposition is symbolic of Joy Zipper's unevenness; a lazy, mindlessly blunt ode to drugs next to an emotional, clever and cool track about the same subject.

"American Whip" is, all in all, a very strong album. It can feel long at times and the songs rely more on the vocal harmonies than on the music, which makes a lot of songs blur together. It is this on-and-off dynamic that can make listening to such a promising band frustrating. But the unevenness perfectly symbolizes the strange mood that Joy Zipper accomplishes, a meshing of all that is bright and happy in the world and all that is dark and murky. On the final track, "Valley Stream," Cafiso and Tindale summarize the band best when they sing together "You're the moon and I'm the sun."

Scientists creating energy with new album 'Love and Squalor'

The band We Are Scientists are part of the latest alternative rock scene hitting New York and England, and they are anything but typical.

By Tim McCall
Collegian Staff

In the past couple of years New York and England have been the breeding ground of the latest alternative rock bands that go on to break into the mainstream. We Are Scientists are lucky to fit into both categories. "How," you ask? Well, they are from New York, but they released their album this past fall to test the airwaves and they became an instant hit.

Now with their album "With Love and Squalor" recently released in America, the band poses to attack America and win over everyone they come across with their music.

"With Love and Squalor" is the perfect surprise for today's mainstream music world. Right when you expect the music industry to jam more Nickelback down your throat, they send you We Are Scientists, a good move for a dying industry.

We Are Scientists — 'With Love and Squalor' — Virgin Records — 7.7/10

Luckily, We Are Scientists aren't a typical radio band, their music sounds sometimes similar to the first Strokes album and at times they also sound like Bloc Party. But when it counts, they have their own sound packed with energetic fast rhythms and slightly witty lyrics.

One of the best aspects of this album is the speed changes of each song. Sometimes a band performs the same style of fast rock throughout an album and that gets downright boring, but We Are Scientists mixes it up well, starting the album fast and mixing it up every song thereafter like every band should do.

What the band does lack in energy and wit they can make it up for in appearance. The three guys in We Are Scientists look like the perfect band to take home to meet your parents. They all dress quite well. Bassist Chris Cain looks as if he is one of those longtime doctors you see in your local hospital, with Napoleon Dynamite glasses and Screech-like hair. Drummer Michael Tapper looks tamer than most drummers, but don't let that let you think he can't rock. Then there's Keith Murray, lead vocalist and guitarist. Murray would make even your mother swoon with his looks.

It may take a couple singles and more radio airplay, but We Are Scientists definitely are a band to watch out for in 2006.

The trio is breaking into the mainstream with their energetic rhythms and witty lyrics.

U-God's 'Mr. Xcitement' flavorless and dull

Wu-Tang Clan's underrated rapper U-God has released his newest album, 'Mr. Xcitement' without very much publicity.

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

U-God has long been one of the Wu-Tang Clan's most underrated rappers. Standing to next to the talents of GZA and Ghostface, or the charisma of Method Man and ODB, can make most people miss out on some of the less commanding members of the Clan. And while U-God is not nearly the household name that many of his compatriots have become, he has been known to steal more than a song or two away from some pretty formidable competitors. In 1999, U-God became the eighth Wu member to release a solo album and, much like his work within the group, "Golden Arms Redemption" was received warmly but quietly.

Now, many years later, U-God has finally issued a follow-up in "Mr. Xcitement" and, like many recent Wu-Tang solo albums, it is a release that came without very much publicity and not a lot of hype. "Mr. Xcitement" finds U-God taking a decidedly more gangsta approach than the traditional Wu-Tang style. While U-God has always leaned a bit more towards the gritty gangsta-rap side, "Mr. Xcitement" feels a lot darker in a much less satisfying way than "Golden Arms Redemption" or U-God's verses on Wu songs.

U-God — 'Mr. Xcitement' — Free Agency Media — 3/10

With easy, often boring and sing-songy choruses and a host of C-list guest spots, "Mr. Xcitement" is overloaded with mediocrity, though it does have a few stand-out moments from the man in the spotlight. U-God recently rejoined Wu-Tang after a brief estrangement as a result of conflicts U-God was having with RZA, the Clan's mastermind. However, it seems apparent that "Mr. Xcitement" was created during the split. No other Wu members are featured on the album, and the beats, while occasionally good, don't have the same feel, let alone the creativity, that has made the Wu-Tang empire so massive.

U-God comes out strong with "It's A Wrap" with a trademark verse, aggressive, clever and griping. However, most of "Mr. Xcitement" feels lazy and U-God as a whole seems uninspired. His foray into gangsta rap includes a lot of generic, if serviceable, beats, simple lyrics that are often in no way compelling and even the occasional gun shot incorporated into the track. The album isn't all bad, though, it is just disappointing. Rather than explore a different subgenre or incorporate his unique abilities into foreign territory, it seems like U-God was simply willing to adapt to his new surroundings.

U-God goes into "Mr. Xcitement" as an esteemed, if overlooked, member of a modern rap dynasty, but he wanders through it like an inexperienced, unprofessional and unspectacular rapper-of-the-moment. He wades through songs like "Go Get Pretty Like Me" and "Get Down" that are just as vapid as the titles indicate and often sounds convinced with the songs, a surprise since most of the aspects of the album seem uninspired and rushed, but very rarely appears to be as involved as he is in better material. It seems that U-God knows this isn't ace material, but he might not be aware of exactly how disappointing it is. Now that U-God has rejoined Wu-Tang there's always hope that his next solo album will be a return to form — and that it won't take another 6 years to get there.

Minutemen return home to take on A-10 opponent Charlotte

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

After 10 days, two tough losses, a win to snap a three-game losing streak and endless hours of traveling, the Mullins Center was a welcomed sight for the Massachusetts men's basketball team. UMass (11-12, 6-6 Atlantic 10) will play its first home game since Feb. 8 tonight at 7 p.m., and it is against a team that is 9-3 in the A-10 and has the leading rebounder in the conference: the Charlotte 49ers.

In its first year removed from Conference USA, the 49ers (16-9, 9-3 A-10) meet the Minutemen for the first time ever in conference play. Charlotte's Curtis Withers leads the A-10 in rebounding with 11.3 per game and has 14 double-doubles on the season, ahead of UMass junior captain Rashaun Freeman who has 10.

Freeman dominated St. Bonaventure on Sunday with 25 points and 19 rebounds. This monster performance came on the heels of the worst three-game stretch of his UMass career when his total output against La Salle, Florida State and George Washington was 11 points.

So what was the difference?

"Being aggressive and not worry about anything," Freeman said. "I think I got over the hump but I'm not taking anybody lightly, and I have to go into the game with complete focus like I did [against St. Bonaventure]. I need to put all of the stress aside and go out and play my game."

For coaches and players, Sunday's performance marked the return of Freeman, the one they know they could count on for a big game when it mattered. For junior Stephane Lasme, Freeman's offensive struggles were never a concern.

"I didn't really think about Ray on that little period where he was struggling," Lasme said. "I know him and I know that he can come up with a big game at any time. I know he can score so I'm just trying to make it easier for him, to get him the ball when he's in a good position. He plays better when he gets a lot of rebounds. I'm just trying to get him going."

Lasme demonstrated how he can spark Freeman's game on Sunday, when he went for 11 points and 15 rebounds, opening up things for the UMass center on both ends of the floor.

"I'll take that again," UMass coach Travis Ford said, referring to Sunday's performance from his big men. "[Freeman and Lasme are] capable of doing it but have they done that on a consistent basis? No, they have not. Do we need that? There's no question.

"We played a great game against St. Bonaventure but when you get performances like that out of those two guys you are going to win some ballgames," Ford added. "This year, Rashaun and Stephane have had their moments, but I don't know if we've had them both go out and dominate a game. That's the first time they've done that."

Now, playing against his counterpart – a physical rebounder who can dominate games with his strength – Freeman knows he will need one of his best games to contain Withers while continuing to look for his offense.

"You want to concentrate on [Withers] and keep a body on him but you have to focus on your game as well," Freeman said. "You can't put all of your focus on just him.

"That's what I did against [Boston College forward] Craig Smith and I had a difficult offensive game because my goal was just to stop him. That got me off track scoring-wise. I think you just have to keep him in your mind and worry about your game and be aggressive."

"[Withers is] kind of like Charles Oakley and an Anthony Mason-type guy," Ford said. "He can step out and shoot the three, and he wants to shoot the three. Withers' game is about overpowering you.

"He's gone from being the second or third option offensively to the first or second option. He's the type of player that can dominate a game. Anytime you go out and have 23 [points] and 21 [rebounds] in a game that's very impressive.

"There's no question that if Ray wants to be considered to be one of the better rebounders in the [A-10] then he has to look at Withers to begin with. [Withers is] one of the best rebounders in the country, much less in the Atlantic 10."

While Freeman doesn't have Withers' outside touch, the junior captain can bang with the best, and with his fellow captain Lasme, the UMass version of the twin towers looks to clean up on the boards tonight.

"If Ray and I have a good game then we have a better chance of victory," Lasme said. "I think [Charlotte is] a very strong team. We just need to be the first to strike."

Charlotte made the NCAA tournament in seven out of the last nine years, a feat that is the envy of many programs, including UMass. The 49ers are athletic and strong ("It looks like they are in the weight room every day," Ford said) and push the pace of the game. For the Minutemen that could be trouble, considering that they are lacking depth and freshman Chris Lowe is playing over 35 minutes a game over the last five contests.

Canniff had the same genuine attitude that fellow UMass coaches Richard Garber and Jack Leaman had – not just towards athletes – but to people in general.

"He actually liked his players," says Keenan, who played at UMass from 1970-73. "I never saw evidence that he considered players as assets and liabilities even when things got tough. He had a real sportsmanlike view towards the game, our opposition and his players. There was never any criticism when you made mistakes.

"He treated us all pretty much the same even though there were guys he coached in high school or ones who naturally fit his personality better than others. He let you find your own motivation and as a result, the team feeling was authentic. It wasn't perfect, but it was real and successful."

"I had the privilege of being the captain in both my junior and senior years so I spent a lot of time with Coach Canniff," says Mike Merchant, who played for Canniff from 1973-77. "I enjoyed playing for him. He was a really student of the game and even is today in his 70s. He just has a great hockey mind, and I just enjoyed the way we played hockey and the way he coached it."

After it was announced that hockey coach Joe Mullen's contract would not be renewed following the 1999-2000 season, UMass athletic director Bob Marcum had a huge vacancy to fill. Former UMass basketball coach Jack Leaman, who was still heavily involved in the athletic department, was looking to Canniff for some advice.

"When they were looking for a coach, Jack asked me who I had in mind, and I told him that Don Cahoon would be a good one to bring in," Canniff says.

To this day, Cahoon had no idea that someone he respected so heavily, even as a stick boy in Swampscott, had vouched for his candidacy for the new opening in Amherst.

"Oh, wow. That's a bit surprising," he says, sounding a bit taken aback by the news.

"He's a great guy, and I'm sure he would pan in all the people he knew so that was really great. I'm sure I feel confident that he would have more good things than bad things to say about me," Cahoon says with a laugh.

The two share a fond friendship with each other, and with the exception of the last couple months, they typically meet up for lunch every other week or so. Until Leaman passed away two years ago, the three of them routinely sat down for lunch together.

"I really got to know him well by going out to lunch with him," Cahoon says. "He couldn't wait to tell me what he thought of my team and my system, and that was always fun. I would always kid with him and say, 'Oh, well the game has passed you by.' He didn't like hearing that, but it obviously wasn't true."

In each other's company, they would discuss hockey, joke around with each other and share stories about common friends. But when Cahoon is doing his own thing on the ice or in the office, he tries to implement certain tendencies of Canniff's clubs.

"There are a lot of ways I try to emulate him because I want my team to play hard every night out," Cahoon says. "No team in school boy hockey – and I'm sure that was also the case here [at UMass] – would pressure harder than his teams. I just remember them being very aggressive and very tenacious."

Conversely, Canniff – who still attends every game – seems to be perfectly content with his seat high above the ice at the Mullins Center as opposed to Cahoon's on the bench.

"It's great for my nerves," he says. "I can just sit up there and really relax. When a situation comes up during the game, I'm so glad I'm not on the bench."

They come from two different eras, but over the years, Don Cahoon and Jack Canniff have lived very similar lives, crossing ways in Massachusetts hockey rinks every so often.

But now they play for the same team. It's no longer the local rivalry of Marblehead against Gloucester, rather it's an effort by Cahoon to elevate the program to a national level the way Canniff once did a little more than 30 years ago.

Judging by what Canniff told Jack Leaman six years ago, the pioneer of UMass hockey has found the precise colleague – and someone who is now a good friend – as the right man for the job.

said in an interview with Bob Behler for the Travis Ford radio show last month. "Not many people enjoyed playing for him [because] it was so tough. But when it was all over, you learned so many lessons of life that we all look back on it and getting through tough times and becoming a disciplined human being, we learned about the important things of life. We all came out much better people because of him."

Saturday's ceremony is the culmination of a process that has been in the works for some time. The dedication was announced during the Dec. 12 game between UMass and Boston University, where Leaman played from 1956-59 and was elected to the school's Athletic Hall of Fame in 1977.

Saturday's dedication will take place on the court during an extended halftime ceremony according to UMass associate athletic director for advancement Tim Kenney, who spearheaded the dedication process. The ceremony will feature UMass chancellor John Lombardi, athletic director John McCutcheon, Leaman's wife Rita and Leaman's daughter Laurie, as well as a collection of 38 former players.

A celebration of Leaman's life and a history of his coaching days will be shown on the new video boards at the Mullins Center during the ceremony, and Erving, Skinner, Pitino and former UMass coaches John Calipari and Bruiser Flint will appear in the video.

Following the video presentation, Lombardi will officially dedicate the court, and the logo (which will be a sticker temporarily) will be unveiled.

Rita and Laurie Leaman were instrumental in the court dedicating process, and Ford feels that Saturday will be a great experience for the family.

"I know his family is going to appreciate it and it's going to be a very special moment," Ford said. "It was important to me once I found about [Leaman] that I wanted to get to know Rita and Laurie. I wanted them to like me a lot and respect me because trying to follow in somebody's footsteps like that, it was very important that they were comfortable with me. I wanted to learn as much about Jack as I could through them."

Kenney, who says that Leaman showed him the ropes at UMass when he arrived in January of 2004, knows that Leaman never wanted his name on the Mullins Center hardwood, but he feels it is a fitting way to honor the legend.

"He was never comfortable with his name on the floor, because that's the type of guy he was," Kenney said. "He didn't feel he needed to be honored, but everyone around the program and in the community really feels strongly about having him honored this way."

"It's just very deserving and something that needed to be done," Ford added. "I think it's going to touch a lot of people, and I expect to have a really big crowd here for this. It's not everyday that someone gets a court named after them – that's not something that is easily earned."

Old coach deserves his respect

The first time I ever asked him for his general thoughts on a matter, he looked at me, told me to shut off my tape recorder, smiled and said:

"You're going to have to ask me a more specific question than that, son. I've got a lot of thoughts and a lot of time, and it's your job to avoid having to sit here with me all night, because I don't mind."

In a nutshell, that was Jack Leaman. He accomplished enough in his 71 years on this earth to earn legend's status, and if he chose to he could have easily gotten away with being arrogant and distant. Instead, he was gracious, forthcoming and personable – always willing to go the extra minute or the extra mile to make sure whatever you came to do that involved him was done right and done well.

Coach Leaman will never truly be recognized for all that he brought to UMass athletics, because it is immeasurable. A father and grandfather figure to so many men and women over the years, his absence will sting painfully for those, including myself, who were so used to seeing him arrive at Mullins or McGuirk or the Cage with his usual stroll and overflowing brown briefcase.

So as UMass Nation mourns its patriarch, it is time to honor Jack Leaman in a way that would have made him smile from ear-to-ear, and burst from his sweater vest with pride. It is time to make ol' coach's name ring true for generations of UMass fans that will never be able to truly appreciate how influential he truly was to a program he dedicated a lifetime's worth of hard work.

Looking back at a great man

more of you than you think. From the folks that listened to him coach and analyze on the radio, to those who were around when he was officially the Minutemen's coach, to the 4,630 who got to see Jack help raise Al Skinner's No. 30 to the South Wall a few weeks ago, if you were a UMass student, supporter or faculty member with any interest in sports, you knew Jack.

Jack Leaman is one of those people who define this university. In a time when athletics is struggling to maintain, when budget woes and campus division makes UMass less than the bright, shining institution we'd all like it to be, Jack has always been a source of inspiration.

Jack was the biggest presence in UMass sports, whether you knew it or not. If you didn't recognize the face in the picture today, then you didn't follow the Maroon and White. Yes, Jack coached Dr. J, Skinner, Pitino and many other greats. Yes, he is UMass basketball's all-time winningest coach. But that's not why Jack is so important. Jack Leaman was one of the best and loudest voices for this university. He made sure to uphold the traditions and pride of UMass in everything he did. He made everyone who entered this school feel welcome.

He was UMass' greatest ambassador, its biggest fan and its most visible icon. He will be missed by more people than can be counted, from all over the globe. Jack Leaman was UMass, and it is the hope of this writer that this school will always remain a source of pride. That is Leaman's legacy, and I know that he will always look down on this tiny little corner of the world with that big grin, the one that never left his face, the one that made coming to games at the Mullins Center, or any other athletic event, absolutely worth it. We're all blessed to be touched by Jack, and I, for one, am eternally grateful that I could call him friend. I hope you are too.

Two paths to the top of UMass hockey

By Jon Howe
Collegian Staff

(Eds. Note: This is the final part of a two-part series dealing with the history of UMass hockey. Friday's issue discussed the old-time rivalry between UMass and Vermont and can be seen on the Collegian's website, www.DailyCollegian.com.)

Jack Canniff has always been a well-known and much-respected commodity. From his high school playing days at Arlington Catholic to his college career at Boston College to his days on the bench at Gloucester High and the University of Massachusetts, Canniff has surrounded himself with success.

He is a hockey hero on countless levels. His Eagles won the second Beanpot in the tournament's history, he led UMass to the 1972 ECAC Division II Championship and while serving as the coach at Gloucester, he helped mentor his greatest star player, Ben Smith, who is now enjoying tremendous international accomplishment since leading the USA women's hockey team to a bronze medal at the Turin Olympics on Monday.

So it's no wonder that Canniff could walk into a hockey rink – any hockey rink – and catch the eye of every soul in attendance, even a fifth-grade stick boy for the Swampscott High School team.

Don Cahoon, the current coach of the Minutemen, was the neighbor of the Swampscott hockey coach and spent his afternoons skating with the team. He absorbed the area's hockey scene and took particular notice of Canniff's team in Gloucester.

"I used to watch him and started getting to know a little bit about him when I was in the fifth grade," Cahoon says. "I was very engrossed with high school hockey all around the area. Gloucester had a very good team and so did Swampscott, where I grew up, so I knew Coach Canniff very well just through watching him at that point."

Now, Cahoon knows Canniff to a much more in-depth degree. Their relationship has grown exponentially since the young fifth-grader was just another one of the many who marveled at the way the growing Massachusetts hockey legend went about his business.

Twenty-one years after UMass had folded its hockey program, leaving Canniff without a job, Cahoon had taken over. Each had a similar agenda with mountainous obstacles to break through.

UMass coach Don Cahoon has won 79 games since taking the post in 2000. He is the second all-time winningest coach in UM history, behind Jack Canniff's 120 triumphs.

Canniff took the reigns of a program that in 1967 was reeling from six straight losing seasons under Steve Kosakowski, and there had only been two teams with winning records since 1933. He was forced to recruit against perennial ECAC powers such as Vermont, Bowdoin, Colby and Merrimack, and he had to open up the doors at Amherst College's Orr Rink to show his kids their new hockey home during their ensuing UMass careers.

Under the mercy of a state budget that had more important issues to worry about such as the civil rights movement and the situation in Vietnam, the last thing on anyone's mind was placing aside enough money to institute the process of building a new rink for the UMass hockey team. So Canniff went about his business, landed some important pieces like the program's all-time scoring leader in Pat Keenan plus P.J. Flaherty, who backstopped the Redmen during their 1972 title run.

Cahoon also took over a floundering program in 2000, seven years after its rebirth following a 14-year period of nonexistence. After just four years on the job, he took the Minutemen to the Hockey East championship game, where they fell in triple-overtime to Maine.

But while the two followed career paths that paralleled each other – albeit years apart – they often met up at a few intersections along the way.

Cahoon eventually left his post as the Swampscott stick boy and made his way onto the roster at Marblehead High School, a North Shore power that was one of Gloucester's most intense rivals, meaning he would have to see Canniff in a different athletic light.

"They were one of our greatest competitors," Cahoon recalls, "Gloucester and Marblehead used to go tooth and nail. They were two fishing communities along the water so there was a real natural rivalry that really ensued. Some of our toughest games were against Jack Canniff's teams.

"My senior year, we only had a tie against our record, and we didn't lose until the state semifinals. Of course, the only tie was against Gloucester, and Jack likes to tease me saying, 'We could bottle you up, Cahoon. You only went one way.'"

"I knew Cahoon when he was in high school," Canniff says. "I coached in the same high school league. He could skate. He got to see the goal a whole lot because he could skate."

Jack Canniff coached the UMass hockey team from 1967-79, and brought the 1972 squad to the Division II ECAC Championship, the program's only championship to this day.

Canniff's name often came up in the Cahoon household. They were neighbors of Bobby Rubine, Canniff's best friend and teammate at Boston College in the early 1950s. Cahoon also played on a hockey team and was friends with Ben Smith, among a few of the old coach's other players, so he was involved in a couple of Canniff's closest circles.

"I got to know those guys very well," Cahoon says. "Conversations would come up, and Jack Canniff knew that I knew those guys well and played with them. I talked to him and always said hi, but I didn't really get to know Jack all that well until I started working here six years ago."

The two left the high school ranks for greener pastures at the college level at roughly the same time. Canniff took the head coaching position at UMass while Cahoon embarked on a stellar career at Boston University, the archrival of Canniff's alma mater.

The two crossed paths yet again – on Jan. 19, 1972 at Walter Brown Arena – just a few months before each of their respective clubs went on to win their collegiate championships.

And though BU was a Division I national power while UMass played on a Division II stage, Canniff's team never lost its grit – a trademark that all of his clubs possessed – and the Terriers only managed to escape with a 6-4 win in their home barn.

"We played UMass when we were the defending national champions, and UMass was about to win the ECAC championship in 1972," Cahoon says. "We only beat them by a couple goals. It was a very good game, a very competitive game. If you look in the record books, we used to beat teams by 10 or 12 goals, but when UMass came in, Jack had his kids ready."

His kids played hard for him because they respected his approach and attitude towards them.

Court dedication on Saturday

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

When Travis Ford took over as coach of the Massachusetts men's basketball team last March, he spoke often about upholding the tradition of UMass basketball. Clearly Ford came to Amherst with some knowledge about the program's history, but he didn't know a lot about Jack Leaman, a man whose legend is renowned around these parts but isn't as well-known by outsiders.

Despite his initial lack of knowledge on Leaman, it didn't take Ford long to learn about the man who became synonymous with UMass basketball during his 40-year tenure at the school.

"I didn't know a ton about him, but that's probably the first thing I learned when I got here," Ford said. "I couldn't help but see how much people loved and adored him."

Leaman's legacy will be cemented at UMass when the Mullins Center court will be dedicated to the coaching legend at halftime of Saturday's game against Dayton which tips-off at noon.

Leaman, who passed away at the age of 71 in March 2004, began his career at UMass in 1961 as an assistant coach for the men's basketball team and then took over the head coaching job in 1966.

In 13 seasons as the head coach, Leaman compiled a 217-126 record, while coaching players such as former NBA star Julius Erving, Boston College coach Al Skinner and Louisville coach Rick Pitino. The winningest coach in school history, Leaman moved on to coach numerous other teams at the school, including the women's basketball team and the Stockbridge School of Agriculture's men's basketball and golf teams.

In 1994, Leaman became the color commentator on radio broadcasts of UMass men's basketball games and held the position until his death. Leaman was inducted to the UMass Athletic Hall of Fame in 1998 and the New England Basketball Hall of Fame in 2003.

While Leaman's accomplishments on the sidelines earned him many accolades, it was his personality and character that made him such an enduring figure at UMass.

"Once I got here the first thing I realized is that it's not about his coaching. It's about how people loved him as a person and what he meant to people around here," Ford said. "I think any coach would like to be remembered that way. I haven't been many places where I've seen somebody loved and adored as much as Jack Leaman is here."

Ford actually had his first exposure to Leaman while playing for Pitino at Kentucky during the early 1990s.

"I learned a lot about him from Coach Pitino," Ford said. "[Pitino] used to talk all the time about how much he learned from him and how much he shaped his career."

"You have to have great respect for [Leaman]," Pitino

(Eds. Note: This column by Mike Marzelli originally ran in the Collegian sports section on March 8, 2004.)

Returning from New Hampshire with friends on Saturday evening, I listened to Jack Leaman call his final game.

Speaking in his trademark gravely voice with that seasoned tone that always made you think he had marbles in his mouth, the ol' coach was in his element in the hours prior to his passing.

Leaman was cursing Richmond star Mike Skrocki's shooting ability, praising UMass coach Steve Lappas for protecting young Rashaun Freeman from picking up his fifth foul and lighthearted commenting on how the Minutemen were lucky to have Spider guard Reggie Brown leave the game with an injury after playing well all afternoon. He maintained the on-air combination that has allowed him to become a top-notch color analyst in his 10-plus years on the job: that of unparalleled basketball insight and a burning love for everything UMass.

The Minutemen eventually tell to the Spiders 69-65, to conclude what has been an extremely disappointing season. Nonetheless, Leaman, always the optimist when it came to his beloved Minutemen, preached about what a great time he had watching this young team grow during the season and, that while fans were calling for Lappas' head, he wouldn't be surprised if it snuck up on the rest of the Atlantic 10 in the post-season tournament and won a few games.

It was, without a doubt, classic Leaman.

In 40-plus years of involvement with the University of Massachusetts, there has never been an individual more dedicated and passionate about the school's athletic department than Jack Leaman. The university's all-time winningest basketball coach, Leaman's devotion to UMass extends well past his days behind the bench and well into what he called his "retirement."

UMass athletics exists as it does today because of Jack Leaman. He lifted the men's basketball program from the doldrums of ineptitude to eight Yankee Conference titles in nine years while making Julius Erving "Dr. J" and helping both Al Skinner and Rick Pitino become award-winning players, and then coaches.

Since then, his rock-solid support of Minuteman athletics as a whole never waned. When he wasn't broadcasting games or on the road, you could almost always find Leaman at the Mullins Center, perched behind the south goal watching over the Mass Attack or on press row examining the Minutewomen, or spending his Saturday afternoons in the McGuirk Alumni Stadium press box watching the gridiron intently while soaking up the atmosphere he loved.

Even for those outside the UMass athletic family, Leaman's refreshing personable nature engulfed him. A commanding figure with a reverberating smile, those who made a point to say "Hi coach" when he passed were guaranteed a "hello" and a pat on the back if he was in a hurry.

Whether he recognized your face or not – and a fully-engrossed conversation about anything from hoops to your academic workload if he wasn't.

As an aspiring journalist, I loved talking to Coach Leaman because he always viewed me as a legitimate writer, yet recognized that I was still just learning.

See MARZELLI on page 10

Leaman was an easy man to like

(Eds. Note: This column by Andrew Merritt originally ran in the Collegian sports section on March 10, 2004.)

It was incredibly easy to like Jack Leaman.

He was everywhere: men's basketball, women's basketball, hockey, anywhere a UMass athlete was competing. If the Mullins Center was rocking, and men's hoop wasn't somewhere on the road, Jack was there, with a smile, a conversation and his warm presence.

Everyone knew Jack. And in his own way, he knew everybody. Jack probably never knew my name. And that doesn't matter, because every time I came up to him, he put his two big hands around mine, in that huge, enveloping handshake of his. He'd pat you on the shoulder, ask you how you were doing and then launch into a conversation about UMass sports. And, for practical reasons, you didn't even have to be there. Jack could carry on a conversation all by himself. But you wanted to be there, and he wanted you to be there, and you knew it every second.

Jack loved people. He loved talking to people, he loved being around people, he loved making people feel good. He was the loudest voice in the Mullins Center's green room, where the media on a conversation all by himself. But you wanted to be there, and he wanted you to be there, and you knew it every second.

Jack loved people. He loved talking to people, he loved being around people, he loved making people feel good. He was the loudest voice in the Mullins Center's green room, where the media congregated to eat before games, but it wasn't because he was brash. It was because he held court. He moved around like a politician, talking to everyone and anyone. He paced the floors at women's basketball games, stopping to say hi to all the people he knew. For some, that would only take a few minutes. For Jack, well, it's amazing he saw the game at all.

The first time you met Jack, he seemed like one of those gentle giant types, the kind that really don't understand what's going on, but keep a smile on anyway. But that wasn't Jack. He had that big grin because he enjoyed every minute of life. He drank life up, in ways we all wish we could. Meanwhile, he was as sharp as a tack. Quick-witted, always good for a joke and able to really understand what was going on no matter what the sport was. Jack might have seemed simple, but there was plenty going on up there.

My first experience with Jack Leaman was hearing him on the radio. And my first thought, I'm embarrassed to admit, was "wow, this guy's such a homer, why can't he just analyze the game?" And then I realized, thanks to more time and experience here, that Jack spoke on the radio like the Minutemen's coach, because in many ways, he still was. He still helped out the team, he still offered advice, and it wasn't limited to the men, either.

Jack was Marnie Dacko's right-hand man through thick and thin, and as one of the reporters assigned to cover the Minutewomen last year, it was easy to see how much he meant to Marnie and her team. And with no disrespect intended to Jack's daughter, Laura, the relationship that Jack had with Marnie certainly showed shades of a proud father watching his daughter at work.

While Jack would never have been mistaken for a hockey guy, he was still at every game that didn't conflict with men's hoops, sharing a few laughs, watching the game from his seat in Section N, right on the aisle. Even though the conversation usually turned to basketball, Jack was a presence before hockey games. From the lowliest beat writer, to the highest-ranking officials, Jack treated everyone with the same great respect.

Everyone who was able to experience even a moment with Jack has been blessed. And there are

Nuclear power plant causes controversy

By Megan Daley
Collegian Staff

A proposed up-rate of the Vermont Yankee Nuclear Power Plant, located within a 25 mile radius of Amherst, has caused controversy among community members.

Entergy, the company that runs Vermont Yankee has proposed an up-rate in the amount of power they produce. Overall, the company hopes to increase power by 20 percent, though they would increase the power in 5 percent increments over 90 days.

Some area residents believe that such an up-rate is a bad idea for the oldest power plant in New England. Sunny Miller, the Executive Director of the Traprock Peace Center, has said that "a nuclear reactor is like a bomb, burning slowly. And we only hope we can control it."

The Nuclear Regulatory Commission (NRC) has not yet made a final decision on whether or not to allow the up-rate. Miller and other concerned citizens have called for an Independent Safety Assessment to be made before the final decision. So far, the NRC has ordered the inspection of a one percent sample of the reactor, which turned up eight safety-related defects.

Raymond Shadis, the technical advisor to the New England Coalition, a group that has been protesting the power plant's up-rate, claims that the Vermont Yankee reactor was "designed for a limited number of thermal cycles," and says that a 20 percent up-rate might force the reactor past its capacity.

However, Professor Emeritus Gerry Peterson, of the University Physics department has said that concerns of pushing the reactor past its capacity may be unfounded.

Peterson used the example of two similar reactors in Finland, both of which have undergone 26 percent power up-rates, to illustrate the fact that it is possible for nuclear reactors to endure such up-rates.

Another concern that Amherst resident Joanne Lind says she would like to see further addressed in regards to the Vermont Yankee reactor is the storage of used fuel rods from the reactor. Entergy has proposed storing the rods in above ground casks. Lind says she fears these casks could become a terrorist target.

In fact, according to a report done by, CNN, at one time, Security

Professor nominated as director within Justice Department

By Jodi Feldcod
Collegian Staff

A University of Massachusetts associate professor has been nominated by President George W. Bush '68 become a director within the Justice Department.

Jeffrey J. Sedgwick, an associate professor of political science, was selected to become the director of the Bureau of Justice Statistics in the U.S. Department of Justice.

"I'm delighted by the opportunity to come back to the agency," Sedgwick said.

The nomination isn't a complete surprise for Sedgwick since he has particular experience in this area. In 1984, Sedgwick served as deputy director for data analysis within the Bureau.

According to Sedgwick, the Bureau encompasses information on practically every aspect of the criminal justice system, including statistics on victims and crimes, offenders, law enforcement, prosecutions, courts and sentencing, and corrections. Sedgwick believes this information is an important asset to researchers and policymakers.

The White House approached Sedgwick about the position in July, but due to his teaching commitments in the fall, he chose to postpone his move until January.

Sedgwick is currently on a year-long leave of absence from his faculty post with the University and is presently awaiting approval of his nomination by the U.S. Senate's Judiciary Committee. Should the panel endorse Sedgwick's nomination, he would then need confirmation from the Senate.

With Sedgwick's interest and background in public policy, he believes this position will give him intriguing insight.

"You really get an unparalleled vantage point. You get to see the intersection of policymaking and policy implementation. It's a fascinating interaction."

Of the nine largest statistical agencies within the federal government, the Bureau of Justice Statistics has one of the biggest budgets with an allotment of nearly $46 million and 52 staff members employed.

Sedgwick called the branch, "the largest repository of criminal justice data in the U.S."

The FBI spent four months conducting a background check of Sedgwick for security clearance. The check also delved for any possible conflicts of interest with

UMass president honors two anti-apartheid leaders

CAPE TOWN, South Africa — A South African anti-apartheid leader recently received the University of Massachusetts's highest honor, the President's Medal.

UMass President Jack Wilson presented Ahmed Kathrada with the medal during a ceremony at the Nelson Mandela Robben Island Gateway in South Africa. Kathrada is a veteran of the South Africa liberation struggles and one of the famous Rivonia Trialists. At these trials, Kathrada was sentenced alongside Nelson Mandela to life imprisonment for his part in the anti-apartheid movement. After serving 26 years of that sentence, Kathrada was released and elected to Parliament. He also served as an advisor to President Mandela.

Additionally, Wilson awarded Nelson Mandela and his wife, Graca an honorary doctorate degree of humane letters from the University. Wilson told the Associated Press, "Nelson Mandela is a hero to all people who value freedom and dignity and justice," Wilson said. "President Mandela's principled opposition to tyranny and injustice inspires us today and will inspire our sons and daughters for generations to come."

In 2000, Kathrada was awarded an honorary doctorate degree from UMass. Since then, he has received three other honorary degrees from American schools. In 2005, Kathrada returned to the University campus to give speeches and book signings for students.

Wilson and several of his colleagues are visiting several universities in South Africa including the University of Cape Town and the University of Kwa/ulaNatal. Wilson plans to sign research agreements with these universities.

SGA selects new chancellor of elections

By Matt Bellveau
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association Senate of the University of Massachusetts, in preparation of its next round of elections, elected the new chancellor of elections, last night.

Priyanka Pant, former SGA senator and UMass junior, was elected to replace the former chancellor, Ambreen Rafiq, who Pant says will advise her in running the March elections.

Pant will oversee a committee consisting of 15-20 Election Commissioners that will run and organize the SGA elections.

With her election, Pant announced the opening of campaigning and nomination for the open seats in the SGA Senate that consists of area governors, student trustee and the presidency.

When asked if he would be running for reelection in March, SGA President Pavel Payano said, "I don't know."

SGA Speaker Sean Bliss expressed his utmost confidence that Pant would succeed in running successful elections.

"She's been a senator for awhile so she's seen elections before and knows how they run, she's familiar with our by-laws and she'll be working with the former chancellor," said SGA Speaker Sean Bliss.

When jokingly asked if she was "corrupt" by a senator Pant answered, "I can honestly say I am not."

"It is my intent to have the smoothest possible elections this year. Working together with Student Legal Services, President Payano and Sean Bliss, I am confident we will have success.," said Pant, "I've already scheduled appointments with the Center for Student Development Financial manager Allen Brainerd and plan to speak with Attorney Charles Diman within the next few weeks."

Pant said she was cognizant of the difficulties in the past of running a "clean" election but plans to work with her committee to cure all of the previous problems.

"I want the elections to be as open as possible," said Pant. "Clearly I'm aware of the history of SGA elections, especially recently. I know they have been problematic in the past; the issues of maintaining staff at all voting stations, the issue of clarifying voting instructions, the issue of formal announcements on campus and the appropriate immediate issues of a violation in campaigning procedure. I know of these issues, I hope that we can learn form our mistakes. I hope I have your support."

According to Bliss, the voting booths that were approved by SGA in December of 2005 haven't been purchased yet and probably won't be ready until the fall elections.

Nominations open today at 9a.m. and close 14 days later on Wednesday, March 8th. The period of campaigning will run for five days from March 9th to March 13th and the elections will be held over the course of two days March 14th to the 15th.

Bliss also announced that he has continued work

Food scientist receives grant to study obesity

By Cameron Methner
Collegian Staff

The American Heart Association has given a University of Massachusetts food scientist $260,000 to research a compound that could possibly help to prevent or treat obesity and obesity-related health conditions.

Yeonhwa Park, the grant's recipient, along with her colleague Deborah Good, will be studying the effect of conjugated nonadecadienoic acid (CNA) on the ability of fat to be used by muscle as opposed to being absorbed or deposited.

"The project has two goals: to find a dose low enough of CNA to apply to humans and to look at the possible side effects for CNA especially focusing on if there is insulin resistance created which could hinder diabetes insulin from being absorbed," said Park.

The grant, which is a one time amount of $260,000 will last for four years and will require Park to give a yearly progress report. The money will be mainly used to fund the project, buy supplies, purchase equipment and help with the upkeep of the animals used for the testing.

Park will be using regular mice to study their reactions to CAN and to see if the compound can help to prevent obesity or any of the illnesses associated with obesity, such as heart disease or type-two diabetes.

Park's associate Deborah Good will be supplying a different set of mice, which have developed inactivity-induced obesity. This means that the older they get,

Advocate for equality in education gives speech

By Catherine Scott
Collegian Staff

Educational advocate and former teacher, Jonathan Kozol spoke Monday evening to a chapel full of students and community members, promoting his new book and advocating an equal education for all students.

Kozol came to Amherst to promote his latest book, "Shame of the Nation: The Restoration of Apartheid Schooling in America," which discusses "re-segregation" of public schools and the difficulties facing schools with a high minority population.

Kozol asked his audience to imagine being five years old and being denied naptime or recess and instead having to represent your elementary school's performance based on how you do on a standardized exam. Or imagine having the earliest lunch slot at 9:20 in the morning in the school's grungy and smelly basement, or being in a segregated class of forty students. Such, said Kozol, are the conditions that thousands of children in the United States do not have to imagine because it is reality each day they go to school.

In his hour-long speech Kozol highlighted the prevalence of segregation in many low-income, often inner-city, schools.

"You want statistics?" Kozol challenged. "Out of 11,000 elementary and middle school-aged children in the South Bronx, 22 students were white. I'm not too good at math, but that comes out to be 99.8% minority students."

These schools represent the least funded schools with, no surprise, the highest dropout rate and are what Kozol calls a "sociologically, and economically enforced apartheid."

Kozol, who was once fired for teaching a Langston Hughes poem, reminded his audience of the value of education, and told them that it is being denied to so many in this land of "equal opportunity." Kozol gave voice, through innocent, childlike intonation, to the many children whom Congress and politicians don't hear when they make decisions that cut schools funding. Many of these schools, said Kozol, are economically and racially segregated, and impose strict curricula that box out any opportunity for kids and teachers to express creativity and satisfy wonder. Education in these places becomes a political hunt to meet government standards, forcing our most innocent and curious minds to be its prey, according to Kozol.

"We all know what the NCLB is: No Child Left Untested," Kozol said.

He stated that the Act didn't call Behind Act isn't really about holding the government accountable for equal education for all children, but rather imposing high anxiety upon the schools themselves to succeed on standardized tests so that their school can continue to receive adequate funding, which it often is not.

Kozol explained the failing of such testing, saying, "You don't fatten your lambs by weighing them. Our lambs are getting thinner yet we're weighing them more often."

Kozol also stated that testing doesn't foster a child's growth, but may imbue him with terror early on, and it doesn't put more teachers in a child's overcrowded classroom, but it may cause her teacher more anxiety and more pressure to abandon creative teaching methods and instead "teach to the test."

Jonathan Kozol gives a speech promoting his new book and advocating for equality in the United States educational system.

his finances. Upon the completion of the FBI's background check, his nomination was formally submitted to the Senate where the Judiciary Committee launched its own extensive background check, including a 14-page questionnaire.

Despite the extensive process he was put through, Sedgwick was undaunted. As a political scientist, he says he has an appreciation for the timely nomination process. Sedgwick is also appreciative for the chance to serve in the government.

"The Bureau of Statistics and Labor is one he's amply qualified to do and it calls for academic expertise" the Political Science department Chair George Sulzner said, "He's looking forward to this position of responsibility and he will be missed."

Sedgwick has kept in touch with some contacts from his prior work at the Bureau and is both curious and excited to see how the Bureau has evolved over the past 22 years. "There are still some staff there from '84. I had a good relationship with the career staff, and I'm looking forward to getting back to that."

"I've really been pushing Allen Brainerd on this and it looks like everyone's on board," said Bliss. "Within the next few weeks students should again have access to free, legal music downloading."

The SGA is also planning for a promotional concert for the release of Ruckus sometime in March.

Citizens concerned about nuclear power was "so lax at Vermont Yankee that in August 2001, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission staged a drill in which three mock terrorists gained access to the plant. The agency gave Vermont Yankee the worst security rating among the nation's 103 reactors."

Some of those protesting the uprate of Vermont Yankee, have gone so far as to say that nuclear power should be abolished all together.

"Promotion of nuclear energy is the official policy of the United States…but the abolishment of nuclear energy should be the official policy," said Shadis.

However, Peterson has said that he feels abolishment of nuclear power is too strong a recommendation. He believes the plant will take its safety precautions seriously and will monitor the incremental up-rate increases carefully.

Peterson also said that the "redundant" safety systems of the plant should keep the probability for an accident at a minimum.

Although Miller has brought up worries that an accident at the Vermont Yankee plant might cause situations similar to the disasters at Chernobyl and Three Mile Island, Peterson feels that some of these worries may be exaggerated.

According to Peterson, the Vermont Yankee plant uses a boiling water reactor (BWR.) "A BWR, in contrast to a Pressurized Water Reactor (PWR) uses the steam generated in the reactor pressure vessel itself to power the electrical generator. The water that makes the steam comes directly in contact with the fuel rods that contain the uranium and the radioactive wastes. There are in-depth redundant safety systems that can react quickly in case of an emergency.

"Considering the two major reactor accidents, the Three Mile Island accident took place in a PWR, not a BWR, and the Chernobyl accident involved an entirely different class of reactor. It is wrong to extrapolate from those accidents to a potential accident with a BWR."

Still, says Miller, she would like to at least see an evacuation plan put in place for residents of Pioneer Valley. As of now, no such plan exists since the Valley is outside of a ten mile radius to the power plant. However, as Valley residents live downwind of the plant, Miller has called for radiation monitors to be placed in schools and public places.

UMass scientist studies solutions to obesity

the less they move around, causing them not to lose weight at a normal level. This second set of obesity-induced mice will also be given CNA to see if the compound can treat obesity.

The previous compound used to research anti-obesity was conjugated linoleic acid (CLA.)

"CLA, which has been successful with preventing obesity in mice at a daily dose of 56 grams (one pill equals one gram,) has not been so consistent in humans due to the low dosage of 3 to 6 grams a day. But 56 grams is not realistic for humans," said Park about the previous studies on anti-obesity research.

CLA has been found to be a naturally occurring fatty acid originally found in dairy and meat. It has also been found to help prevent cancer, to help reduce body fat, and to help reduce athero sclerosis (blood-clotting.) In mice it has been able to block cells from absorbing fat and given the mice more energy. Some concerns which came up with CLA have been the amount or dosage pertaining to humans. The side effects were also an issue, some of the mice had no reaction at all; there is an inconsistency with the reactions.

"We wanted to test CNA on both sets of mice to see if it is able to treat or prevent obesity. CNA could be more effective than CLA with mice and maybe with humans as well with a safe dosage of course," said Park.

CNA is a compound that does not occur naturally and has to be manufactured. Since the drug is unlike CLA in that regard, it will have to go through a great deal of testing before CNA can be tested on humans. Since it has to be manufactured, CNA also cannot be used as a dietary supplement.

The FDA will eventually have to approve the drug, but only after a great deal of testing.

"There is no magic pill to make you thin, we are only trying to help fight obesity and the illnesses that come with it," said Park.

Yeonhwa Park received her bachelors and masters degrees in pharmacology at Seoul University in South Korea. She earned her PhD in food science at the University of Wisconsin in Madison. She lives in Amherst with her husband Heewon Yang and their two children Jeremy, seven, and Annette, five.

Boston archbishop promoted to cardinal

By Jay Lindsay
Associated Press

BOSTON — Boston Archbishop Sean O'Malley's ascension to cardinal Wednesday was no surprise, considering that every Boston archbishop since 1911 has been named cardinal.

But a recent history of scandal and upheaval cast O'Malley's appointment in a different light. His elevation Wednesday was seen as a Vatican validation of Boston's continued importance, as well as of O'Malley's handling of the sex abuse crisis and the church's financial problems.

That work has been so painful to O'Malley that he's acknowledged asking God to "call me home and let someone else finish this job."

"He's been the most beleaguered of any archbishop in the United States," said Stephen Pope, a theology professor at Boston College. "It's like a battlefield promotion."

"It's a vote of confidence in O'Malley, and the archdiocese itself," said Joseph Kelley, a theology professor at Merrimack College.

O'Malley was among 15 new cardinals named Wednesday by Pope Benedict XVI, and one of two Americans. The other was Benedict's successor at the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, Archbishop William Levada.

The men will be elevated during a ceremony at the Vatican on March 24.

On Wednesday, O'Malley said he was "deeply humbled and honored" to be named a cardinal, and said it was a sign of the Boston church's importance to the pope and worldwide church.

"The reaction that I've seen from our people and our priests is one of enthusiasm and joy," O'Malley said. "I think it has been good news for the archdiocese and that's one of the reasons that gave me enough courage to accept this challenge."

As a cardinal, O'Malley's most important task is electing a new pope. Cardinals are also the pope's closest advisers, with a cardinal technically a "member of the papal household," Stephen Pope said.

The increased influence comes with the potential for increased worldwide demands on his time and expertise. O'Malley, for instance, speaks fluent Spanish and Portuguese and is considered an authority on the Latin American church, Kelley said.

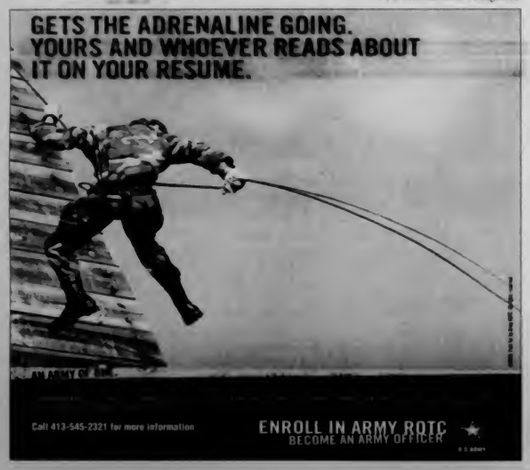
On Wednesday, O'Malley said his new duties won't interfere with his work in Boston, which includes the final stages of the financial reorganization that called for unpopular church closings, and negotiations with a new group of about 200 alleged sex abuse victims.

In July 2003, O'Malley took over the 2.1 million-member Boston archdiocese, the nation's fourth-largest. Within two months, he negotiated an $85 million settlement with 554 people who had been molested by priests and was praised for his compassion.

Archbishop Sean O'Malley, a controversial figure due to his handling of the sex abuse scandal, was recently promoted to a cardinal.

The reaction was different in May 2003 when he began the reorganization of the archdiocese that included closing more than 80 churches. He said the changes were needed because of long-term declines in Mass attendance, a shortage of priests and deteriorating church buildings that would cost millions to repair. Angry parishioners complained healthy churches were being shuttered and some organized around-the-clock sit-ins, which continue at six churches.

O'Malley said he was so pained by closing churches that he acknowledged in a November 2004 letter to protesters, "At times I ask God to call me home and let someone else finish this job, but I keep waking up in the morning to face another day of reconfiguration."



O'Malley has been criticized for failure to fully explain to parishioners why their churches had to shut down. More recently, his reassignment of a few popular priests created problems with parishioners. And as he faces a new round of clergy abuse lawsuits, Mitchell Garabedian, an attorney for the new group of victims, said O'Malley hasn't acted with sufficient urgency to settle their claims.

"Many victims consider it a slap in the face that Archbishop O'Malley has been rewarded for a job not very well done," Garabedian said.

But parishioner Jim Marotta, 52, of Melrose, said O'Malley's ascension reflects the good work he's done during difficult times.

"This city was hurting really bad, Catholic-wise," said Marotta, a data processing manager. "I think a lot of us were having some problems, and then the closing of the churches didn't help at all, and yet the man has still kept it all together."

O'Malley, 61, succeeded Cardinal Bernard F. Law, whose resigned after his failure to remove abusive priests from ministry.

Computer scientists get robot grants

By Diana Lulek
Collegian Correspondent

Two computer scientists at UMass Amherst were honored with National Science Foundation CAREER program grants for robot navigation and smart-sensor data retrieval.

The recipients, Oliver Brock and Deepak Ganesan, will each be awarded with a grant amounting to $480,000 over a five year period. CAREER awardees were selected based on "creative, integrative, and effective research and education career development plans that build a firm foundation for a lifetime of integrated contributions to research and education", according to the NSF website. By being among those selected by the foundation for this prestigious award, they are recognized as new faculty members who have high potential for becoming the academic leaders of the 21st century.

Oliver Brock, assistant professor and co-director of both the Laboratory for Perceptual Robotics and the Bioinformatics Research Laboratory, won his CAREER award for his proposal, "Motion Capabilities for Autonomous Mobile Manipulation".

Brock's project focuses on the challenges involved in making robots independently mobile in various environments.

"Efforts in both industry and academia have led to highly advanced humanoid robots and mobile manipulators," says Brock, "but there are still many factors that constrain these mechanics from fully operating in the everyday world."

He will investigate generating robotic motion under various constraints and will develop sensing techniques that provide feedback to robots about their surroundings, inherent to their autonomous mobility. This research will result in the ability for robots to safely and reliably perform human level tasks independently and in unstructured environments.

Assistant professor Deepak Ganesan joined the UMass Computer Science department in 2004 and presently leads the Sensor Networks Research Group. His CAREER winning proposal, "Addressing Data and Energy Management Challenges in Hierarchical Sensor Networks" explores prediction techniques and storage systems for smart sensors.

"In earthquake prone areas, sensors embedded in buildings to monitor vibration levels could predict if the building was becoming unsafe and inform people inside, but only if that information is stored properly, modeled accurately, and easily accessible," says Ganesan.

These sensory devices, which include camera and weather sensors that report on every aspect of an environment from humidity to human activity, also need to be very small, possess large storage capabilities, and be relatively long lasting. Ganesan's research will focus on the design, prototyping, and evaluation of such storage systems.

Insurgents destroy dome of sacred Shiite mosque

By Ziad Khalaf
Associated Press

SAMARRA, Iraq — Insurgents posing as police destroyed the golden dome of one of Iraq's holiest Shiite shrines Wednesday, setting off an unprecedented spasm of sectarian violence. Angry crowds thronged the streets, militiamen attacked Sunni mosques, and at least 19 people were killed.

With the gleaming dome of the 1,200-year-old Askariya shrine reduced to rubble, some Shiites lashed out at the United States as partly to blame.

The violence — many of the 90 attacks on Sunni mosques were carried out by Shiite militias — seemed to push Iraq closer to all-out civil war than at any point in the three years since the U.S.-led overthrow of Saddam Hussein.

Many leaders called for calm. "We are facing a major conspiracy that is targeting Iraq's unity," said President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd. "We should all stand hand in hand to prevent the danger of a civil war."

President Bush pledged American help to restore the mosque after the bombing north of Baghdad, which dealt a severe blow to U.S. efforts to keep Iraq from falling deeper into sectarian violence.

"The terrorists in Iraq have again proven that they are enemies of all faiths and of all humanity," Bush said. "The world must stand united against them, and steadfast behind the people of Iraq."

British Prime Minister Tony Blair also condemned the bombing and pledged funds toward the shrine's reconstruction.

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and the top American commander in Iraq, Gen. George Casey, called the attack a deliberate attempt to foment sectarian strife and warned it was a "critical moment for Iraq."

No one was reported injured in the bombing of the shrine in Samarra.

But at least 19 people, including three Sunni clerics, were killed in the reprisal attacks that followed, mainly in Baghdad and predominantly Shiite provinces to the south, according to the Iraqi Islamic Party, the country's largest Sunni political group.

Many of the attacks appeared to have been carried out by Shiite militias that the United States wants to see disbanded.

In predominantly Shiite Basra, police said militiamen broke into a prison, hauled out 12 inmates, including two Egyptians, two Tunisians, a Libyan, a Saudi and a Turk, and shot them dead in reprisal for the shrine attack.

Major Sunni groups joined in condemning the attack, and a leading Sunni politician, Tariq al-Hashimi, urged clerics and politicians to calm the situation "before it spins out of control."

The country's top Shiite cleric, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, sent instructions to his followers forbidding attacks on Sunni mosques, and called for seven days of mourning.

But he hinted, as did Vice President Adil Abdul-Mahdi, that religious militias could be given a bigger security role if the government cannot protect holy shrines — an ominous sign of the Shiite reaction ahead.

Both Sunnis and the United States fear the rise of such militias, which the disaffected minority views as little more than death squads. American commanders believe they undercut efforts to create a professional Iraqi army and police force — a key step toward the eventual drawdown of U.S. forces.

Some Shiite political leaders were already angry with the United States because it has urged them to form a government in which nonsectarian figures control the army and police. Khalilzad warned this week — in a statement clearly aimed at Shiite hard-liners — that America would not continue to support institutions run by sectarian groups with links to armed militias.

One top Shiite political leader accused Khalilzad of sharing blame for the attack on the shrine in Samarra.

"These statements ... gave green lights to terrorist groups. And, therefore, he shares in part of the responsibility," said Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, head of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq and the former commander of its militia.

The interior minister, who controls the security forces that Sunnis accuse of widespread abuses, is a member of al-Hakim's party.

The new tensions came as Iraq's various factions have been struggling to assemble a government after the Dec. 15 parliamentary elections.

The Shiite fury sparked by Wednesday's bombings — the third major attack against Shiite targets in as many days — raised the likelihood that Shiite religious parties will reject U.S. demands to curb militias.

The Askariya shrine, also known as the Golden Mosque, contains the tombs of two revered Shiite imams, who are considered by Shiites to be among the successors of the Prophet Muhammad.

No group claimed responsibility for the 6:55 a.m. assault on the shrine in Samarra, a mostly Sunni Arab city 60 miles north of Baghdad, carried out by four insurgents disguised as police. But suspicion fell on Sunni extremist groups.

The top of the dome, which was completed in 1905, collapsed into a crumbly mess, leaving just traces of gold showing through the rubble. Part of the shrine's tiled northern wall was damaged as well.

Thousands of demonstrators crowded near the wrecked shrine, and Iraqis picked through the debris, pulling out artifacts and copies of the Muslim holy book, the Quran, which they waved, along with Iraqi flags.

"This criminal act aims at igniting civil strife," said Mahmoud al-Samarie, a 28-year-old builder. "We demand an investigation so that the criminals who did this be punished. If the government fails to do so, then we will take up arms and chase the people behind this attack."

U.S. and Iraqi forces surrounded the Samarra shrine and searched nearby houses. About 500 soldiers were sent to Sunni neighborhoods in Baghdad to prevent clashes.

On Al-Jazeera television, Sunni politician Adnan al-Dulaimi pledged that the violence would not discourage Sunnis from working to form a new government and claimed the Samarra attack was not planned by Sunni insurgents but "by foreign hand aiming to create differences among Iraqis."

National Security Adviser Mowaffak al-Rubaie said 10 people were detained for questioning about the bombing. The Interior Ministry put the number at nine and said they included five guards.

In the hours after the attack, more than 90 Sunni mosques were attacked with automatic rifles and rocket-propelled grenades, burned or taken over by Shiites, the Iraqi Islamic Party said.

Large protests erupted in Shiite parts of Baghdad and in cities throughout the Shiite heartland to the south. In Basra, Shiite militants traded rifle and rocket-propelled grenade fire with guards at the office of the Iraqi Islamic Party. Smoke billowed from the building.

Shiite protesters later set fire to a Sunni shrine containing the seventh century tomb of Talha bin Obeid-Allah, a companion of Muhammad, on the outskirts of Basra.

Protesters in Najaf, Kut and Baghdad's Shiite slum of Sadr City also marched through the streets by the thousands, many shouting anti-American and anti-Israeli slogans and burning those nations' flags.

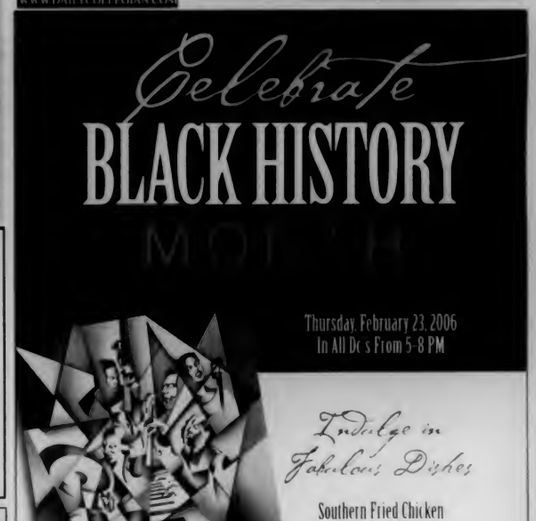
The golden dome of the Askariya mosque, one of the holiest Shiite shrines, was destroyed by Sunni insurgents.

State development secretary resigns

BOSTON (AP) — Douglas Foy, the conservationist turned development secretary in the Romney administration, announced Tuesday he was resigning next month.

Foy, a former Olympic rower, spent 25 years heading the Conservation Law Foundation before becoming secretary of the Office of Commonwealth Development in January 2003.

In that post, he spearheaded several key administration initiatives, including Gov. Mitt Romney's so-called "smart growth" initiative, a plan to concentrate housing and other development near commuter hubs and the development of a 20-year transportation strategy that includes a "fix-it first" strategy to repair roads and bridges before building new ones.



"I think we leave after the first three years with a certain change in the DNA of development here in the commonwealth," said Foy, the first to serve as secretary of the new office merging development, transportation and environmental functions.

"I'd like to think that we're helping people think differently, think far carefully, in a more reasoned way in how we grow, where we grow, where we invest our state resources," he added.

UMass needs a curling team

Gilad Skolnick

Sit down. "Why?" You may ask in a state of befuddlement. Well, because UMass Amherst still does not have a curling team.

It's one of the most beautiful sports to have ever been invented, and UMass, which sports two well–equipped ice skating rinks, does not participate in it. Perhaps you are thinking that we just don't have a women's or a men's curling team, but shockingly we have neither.

This paucity would not be such a big cause for concern if it wasn't for the sorry state that America's curling team is in. Curling, the heart and pride of the Olympic Games, usually the main event, is a sore subject for the USA. The women's team didn't even get a medal this winter in Turino, and the men's team as of now has a slim chance at winning a medal. How can one have pride in the athletes of this country when its curling team can't even beat the weakly Swedish team or nervous Norwegians? I am afraid to say it, but if our Army was like our curling team, we probably would not have won the Spanish American war.

> Many notable figures have said ill words about the sport, such as the American basketball player Charles Barkley, who is quoted to have said "Curling is not a sport. I called my grandmother and told her she could win a gold medal because they have dusting in the Olympics now."

For those of you whose specialty lies more with the Summer Olympics, or are simply uncultured, curling originated in Scotland hundreds upon hundreds of years ago. It's been played in the USA since the early 1800s, and has been an official Olympic sport for years, going as far back as 1998. Not only has UMass not embraced the sport, it has ignored it, simply pretending curling never existed. We even have a rugby team – a sport invented in England, the same England that violently burned down our capital in the war of 1812, but curling we ignore? Where is the logic?

To play the game one has to push a granite stone on ice while others must sweep the ice in front of the stone with brooms for some reason, with a goal that it stops over the intended target. No one really knows exactly how to play the game, from what I gather, but people usually experiment and come up with something good. Those of us that excel at cleaning will find a natural talent in such a sport, where expert use of the broom is required. As far as I can tell, a vacuum cleaner is not allowed, although I think it would make a valuable addition.

I understand why some don't have a curling team, such as the Kingdom of Swaziland, whose King Mswati III has enough to deal with, with his 200+ siblings and his 13 wives (each with their private palace) spending a fourth of his nation's annual budget on a private jet, according to BBC.com. I understand why Chile doesn't have a curling team either, recovering from Pinochet's rule and recently electing Bachelet, South America's first democratically elected female leader. Here and there, there are places with no curling teams, and such places obviously don't have the time to invest in curling, but UMass has no excuse.

Alas, the last time the U.S. won a world men's curling championship goes as far back as 1978. If we don't invest here, at this juncture, at this point, with our nation's youth, in college curling, then I fear a dim future for American curling teams.

To make matters worse, competitive curling has an undeserved, bad reputation in the USA. Many notable figures have said ill words about the sport, such as the American basketball player Charles Barkley, who is quoted to have said "Curling is not a sport. I called my grandmother and told her she could win a gold medal because they have dusting in the Olympics now."

Moreover, many people when talking about watching curling, start off by saying that they "have a confession," that they "watched Olympic curling." Such language just goes to illustrate the appalling view that people have of such a beautiful thing, but I promise you that just one game of curling will be enough to hook you for life, no one can deny that it isn't entertaining.

Famous all across the world, curling has even made it to theaters, being the main subject of the 2002 Canadian hit comedy, "Men with Brooms," it fights gender stereotypes that men can't do such activities as cleaning, and it is very good for your fitness.

Hopefully, in the future, UMass will produce talented curlers such as Ana Arce of Andorra, and when we hear on the radio the name of Mr. Uusipaavalniemi of Finland, we will know instantly that they are talking about one of the best curlers in all of Scandinavia.

There are few things as beautiful in this world as curling, and thus I urge you all, that in the very least, in the next winter Olympics in 2010, that you remember to tune in and watch some curling. That is, if by then UMass doesn't have a curling game at the same time.

Between free man and free press

Wesley Miller

My favorite time to celebrate my freedom is on the weekdays, early in the morning. I find the quietest, most secluded corner of the earth, before the collective voices take hold, and I sit with a cup of coffee and a piece of the American free press. There's nothing more liberating than a free man reading the free press. To live in a country where I can exercise this quiet freedom is a privilege. I try to take advantage of as often as possible.

There's no better piece of free press to be found than "The New York Times". When interviewed, Chomsky once said that if he could read only one publication for the rest of his life, it would be "The New York Times". And who could disagree? The typeset, the layout, it's almost too perfect to spoil. The headline yesterday read: "Bush, resetting agenda, says U.S. must cut reliance on oil." Most ordinary papers wouldn't try to work a parenthetic citation into a headline, but this is no ordinary paper.

"The New York Times" keeps me laughing the whole way through. Every day, I read about the apocalypse, the political factions eating away at the fabric of society and the various crises that define my generation. I used to read "The New York Times" and tremble at the coming of the end, but I always woke the next day, alive and capable of reading the next edition. Was I being lied to?

The relationship between the free man and the free press has always been somewhat precarious. This is why I've chosen to ease the tension somewhat by ritualizing my consumption of the newspaper. For this, "The New York Times" supports my purposes particularly well, because in all my years of readership, I've never actually been able to finish it. I am fairly certain that as long as I am unable to finish it, I will never actually understand the idea behind it.

> They try to tell me that America hasn't had a bowel movement in 37 years. What they fail to realize is that my America can't be exposed, accused or critiqued.

Now, instead of trying to fully comprehend my relationship with the free press, I sit and have coffee with it like we're old friends meeting for lunch. I just think to myself, "As long as I buy a cup of coffee and a copy of "The New York Times", I'll always have the time to sit and enjoy them." So I sit and I enjoy my freedom. The act makes me feel somewhat immortal, like each page is an indulgence printed by Guttenberg himself on a parchment of medieval vellum.

I no longer feel threatened by prophecies of doom. The more I read "The New York Times", the more I believe in eternal glory and salvation. Every time a young Marxist tries to place my generation in the scope of history, I stop and look forward to my future. What need have I of death? Free men can't be self–defeating pessimists. How can we be free men if we spend all our time thinking about death and calamity? I'm sorry Mr. Ginsberg; I refuse to look at myself through the grave.

Sometimes, the free press forgets that America is an idea. Not a personification, but a pure idea. America is not the murderous, domineering entrepreneur of death that a paper like "The New York Times" would like me to believe. Every day, journalists try to remind me of that year America spent in Paris or the DUI America got after the frat party at UPenn. They try to tell me that America hasn't had a bowel movement in 37 years. What they fail to realize is that my America can't be exposed, accused or critiqued.

In 10 years, nobody will remember the headlines of today's issue of "The New York Times". History will be rewritten every year for those 10 years. Poverty and race will be abolished, and one mighty class of freedom loving Americans will be left.

Despite what's written in the newspapers, they will be the greatest in American history. They'll have their own free press and their own version of "The New York Times" and Chomsky will read it and sing its accolades. For now I can just sit here with a coffee and the paper and enjoy my time, because this is the nature of freedom.

Reaction pushed beyond lunacy

Zach Oelschlegel

Jesus is constantly trivialized. You see it everywhere, ranging from Gary Larson cartoons, to those "Jesus is my homeboy" t–shirts you can find at any clothing print shop, or the excited "Buddy Christ" action figure giving you the thumbs up. He is characterized, more often than not, as a joke, reminiscent of Monty Python's crucifixion scene in "Life of Brian." Being a Christian, I am consistently insulted by columnists I read, be it in The Times, somewhere online or even in this publication, who just can't help themselves from inserting a snide remark about Christianity in their columns.

But then again, I'm used to it. It's not a taboo to make fun of Christian "taboos", and things which would be downright offensive to millions here in the States still go unchecked. It is deemed OK in our society to make fun and sometimes even lambaste "religious" people.

Where most fear to tread, is Islam. There's a certain double standard applied to this case, one pointed out especially by these Danish cartoons which appeared in the "Jyllands–Posten", the same cartoons you may have been reading about for the last month. The paper printed, back in September, twelve caricatures of Mohammad, which is not permissible according to Muslim law. The French "Soir" nailed home an excellent point with a front page cartoon picturing deities of multiple religions sitting upon a cloud, with Jesus saying, "don't complain, Mohammad, we've all been caricatured here."

When defending why he would allow these cartoons to be published in his column for the "Washington Post', "Jyllands–Posten" editor Flemming Rose pointed to examples in Danish society, where a comedian said he would have no problem urinating on a Bible, on live TV no less, but would never think of doing the same with the Koran.

He cited how the same cartoonist who drew Mohammad with a bomb inside his turban also drew Jesus on the cross with dollar bills on his eyes, and another cartoon with the Star of David attached to the fuse of a bomb. Yet, despite being incredibly offensive to Christians, Jews and Muslims alike, why is there only attention for the latter?

> Jyllands-Posten editor Flemming Rose pointed to examples in Danish society, where a comedian said he would have no problem urinating on a Bible, on live TV no less, but would never think of doing the same with the Koran.

One wouldn't have to look far into pop culture to see more of this double standard. For example, in "The Simpsons," Hinduism is made fun of in the character of Apu, Reverend Lovejoy and Flanders are complete Christian nut job stereotypes and Lisa's newfound belief in Buddhism pokes fun at many Eastern religions, not to mention the show's only Jew is a clown.

Still, "The Simpsons," which aims to lampoon all aspects of society, be it religious, social or political, lacks a major Muslim character to poke fun at. The biggest reason there has been such an outcry over these cartoons is because it's rare that Islam is satirized so publicly. These cartoons are simply breaking the norm.

The reaction over this has pushed beyond lunacy. The fact that some countries have gone as far as recalling their ambassadors from Denmark, which, as a government, had absolutely nothing to do with the printing of these cartoons, is ridiculous. However, the people who have been hurt the most by this haven't been the ones protesting in the Middle East, but the more moderate Muslims that make up the majority of the Muslim community in the United States and Europe.

Every time pictures are aired on TV showing more protests, more Molotov cocktails being thrown at embassies, more stories of gunshots and violence, people believe less and less in the saying that Islam is a religion of peace. The image of Muslims around the world, which is already tarnished, loses more points. Especially when the protest is over what 12 men drew on a piece of paper, and more so when it's directed towards a country as harmless as Denmark. There have been instances of moderate Muslims calling out their extremist counterparts, but there is still a ways to go in that area.

To say that "Jyllands–Posten" should not have printed those cartoons simply because it would have offended so many people is dangerous ground to walk on. If we are to go on calling it hate speech, then truly anything that ridicules or offends or goes against someone else's religious beliefs must also fit under that category. Rose said it best when he wrote, "If a believer demands that I, as a nonbeliever, observe his taboos in the public domain, he is not asking for my respect, but for my submission. And that is incompatible with a secular democracy."

In most circumstances, the press has not shied away from printing something because it offends someone. It is not prudent for the press to print whatever they want in the context of free speech, even though they absolutely should have the right to, which is something that "Jyllands–Posten" is learning the hard way. However, when editors make their decisions to cut or pull something, they should do so because the material adds nothing to good discourse or discussion, not out of a fear of backlash or hurt feelings.

DENMARK NEEDS OUR SUPPORT

By now, many people have heard about the 12 cartoons in "Jyllands-Posten" in Denmark. The paper put out a call for cartoons depicting the prophet Mohammad after one author had noted how difficult it was to find illustrations for a book he was writing on Mohammad. Now, don't get me wrong, most of those cartoons were in poor taste; but the resultant outcry in the Muslim world stretched beyond belief. Men carried signs saying, "Behead those who insult Islam," while terrorist groups issued death threats against the artists, who now move with bodyguards, and several of whom have gone into hiding. We must stand with Denmark.

Now, as I said, I will give you that several of the cartoons were in poor taste and "not a very nice thing to say" or draw. I, myself, am a Christian. "Rolling Stone" portrays a rapper as my God on the front of their magazine. Comedy shows mock my religion on a regular basis. The very Daily Collegian published an editorial last year on how to disrupt a viewing of "The Passion".

It is hard to argue in the United States today that no one would dare insult Christianity; it happens all the time. Some of it is even in very, very poor taste, but I will never threaten or attack someone because they insulted my religion, because stating your opinion is your right, regardless of everything else.

Far worse has been done to Christian symbols than these cartoons. (Does anyone remember Piss Christ? The image of a crucifix suspended in a bowl of urine, put on display and hailed as "art"?), but that does not give me the right to be violent, ever. The shattered honor of Islam is no excuse, and no defense, for the hate that has poured out at Denmark in these past few weeks.

We must stand with Denmark. This is an issue over freedom of speech and expression, for the right to satire whatever you want, and this is yet another facet of the "war on terror." The campaign against Denmark is being fueled by state approval from countries where freedom of religion and freedom of the press are nonexistent (The Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, most notably).

One thing often heard in American politics today is that people do oppose terror and do support their country and its freedoms, but simply disagree with the current administration's methods for solving the problem. Now is your golden, brilliant chance to prove it.

Here is a cause (freedom of expression) that everyone can get behind. It's something fundamental and essential to any free society. Everywhere on the same political spectrum, people support this basic right. So stand with Denmark because the freedom to say what you want is worth standing up for, and it doesn't require you to support any neo-cons, or even Bush. Just support Denmark.

"HALLMARKS OF A PUBLIC UNIVERSITY"

What makes UMass a "public" university? As trite as this question may seem, the skyrocketing cost of attendance and the regression of racial and socio-economic diversity at this institution complicate the boundaries of public and private realms in higher education.

For example, the fees for in-state students at the Amherst campus have almost doubled since the 2001-02 academic year and the average student receiving financial aid will graduate from UMass with a loan-debt of $30,842. Having attended a private liberal arts college as an undergraduate, I staggered out with a debt of a similar amount.

Another hallmark of a public university is its accessibility to students from a variety of backgrounds. UMass seems to be failing on this account as well. The Commission on Campus Diversity, a team appointed by Chancellor Lombardi last fall, noted this concern and recommended an "intensified effort" to recruit and retain students from under-represented communities.

Still, there is little administrative commitment to authorizing and mandating certain enrollment benchmarks, goals and expenditures for the realization of an accessible and diverse campus.

Our student Trustee, Valerie Louis, developed and submitted two motions to go to the Board of Trustees (the ultimate authority over UMass) to address these issues of affordability and accessibility. She will be presenting two proposals to the Board of Trustees over the next two weeks toward this end.

Her work is out out for her, but she could use our support to help strengthen and implement these proposals. Please join Valerie in her efforts to take back our community.

"Nine Inch Nails" TO HAMMER THE MULLINS CENTER

By Bill Donovan
Collegian Staff

On February 27, UMass will witness the resurrection of industrial-rock pioneer Trent Reznor and his band "Nine Inch Nails", 7:30 at the Mullins Center.

With the release of 2005's eagerly-anticipated "With Teeth," he returned to the music-scene after a six-year bout with alcohol and drug abuse. Tickets for this event are $35, with doors opening at 6:30. In an interview with the Daily Collegian, Jeordie White, bassist for "NIN" spoke about the past year of touring and his long-relationship with Reznor.

"He's a nice guy, I've known him for about eleven years now," explained White. "I'd come into the studio during recording (of "With Teeth") and watch him twiddle the knobs."

White has collaborated with many prominent-figures in modern rock. In the nineties, he performed as Twiggy Ramirez, the bassist of Marilyn Manson. He wrote much of the music for 1996's "Antichrist Superstar," playing rhythm and lead guitar as well. Produced by Reznor in New Orleans, it was a breakthrough album for the band, gaining much mainstream-attention.

White left the band in 2002 to work with Joshua Homme of "Queens of the Stone Age" and his "Desert Sessions" albums. He joined the progressive rock band "A Perfect Circle" after, which features "TOOL" frontman Maynard James Keenan as vocalist. With "NIN", White was requested by Reznor to perform live with him.

In 2005, "NIN" did their world tour and appeared in California's annual Coachella Rock Festival with "Coldplay", "Bauhaus", and "Weezer". But disaster hit close to home with the devastation of Hurricane Katrina in New Orleans. A charity concert event featured "NIN" sharing the stage with "Queens of the Stone Age", "Sevendust", and "The New York Dolls".

"New Orleans was destroyed," stated White. "It was horrible to see, but good that we did something about it."

A longtime resident of the city, Reznor spent time recuperating from his addictions while working on new-material. On the Voodoo Music Festival's website, Reznor stated "One of the reasons I felt it was important to attempt to have Voodoo in New Orleans was to keep the spotlight on the city. To let people on the outside know this tragedy involves far more than turning the power back on."

Reznor is currently developing songs for a new "NIN" album which may be out this year. According to White, a release date has not been worked out yet. Some of this material may appear at the Feb. 27th show. At White's official website, it states the set list for shows will vary and some new songs might be played.

White touched upon what is currently going on with "A Perfect Circle" as well. "We have what we call 'TOOL Time' happening right now," White added. Just recently, the bassist released an EP from a new band of his "Goon Moon". "I Got A Brand New Pair Layin' Machine" will follow later this year with a full-length record.

The last time "NIN" came around to wreak havoc was last November at the TD Banknorth Garden in Boston. It was a non-stop, adrenaline-fueled show filled with such "NIN" classics as "Hurt," "Head like a Hole," and others. Reznor showed off his talents on multiple-instruments, at points hurling guitars to the floor in fits of rage and then bouncing along with a keyboard. The band felt rejuvenated, with White and other band mates hammering out piece after piece with limitless-energy.

Hip-hop poet-film-maker Saul Williams will be opening for the band. Williams is the author of the book "The Dead Emcee Scrolls: The Lost Teachings of Hip Hop" and performed with "NIN" last year in Memphis and New Orleans. He also won the Sundance Grand Jury Prize in 1998 for his film "Slam."

Trent Reznor, the front man of the band Nine Inch Nails, is known for his adrenaline packed fits of rage during live shows.

Can 'Project Runway' winner McCarroll make it in the real world?

By Aaron Barnhart
Kansas City Newspapers

When Jay McCarroll, a slovenly, chain-smoking, 29-year-old fashion designer, won Bravo's reality series "Project Runway" last year, it was as stunning to him as it was unlikely to those watching.

For impressing a panel of judges that included designer Michael Kors and "Elle" fashion director Nina Garcia, McCarroll had his winning designs featured in Elle. Heidi Klum, "Project Runway's" abermodel host, ordered a dress from him. And he was able to summon the nerve to move to New York and start his own clothing line.

"Project Jay," an entertaining one-hour special airing at 10 p.m. EST Wednesday night on Bravo, documents these first few months after McCarroll's triumph on TV. It's part of an effort by Bravo to further extend the second season of "Project Runway," its hottest show. (A "reunion" special, which sounds like a clip show in disguise, precedes it at 9. The show returns next week for a two-part finale.)

"Project Jay" also marks an intriguing freeze frame in the life of a reality-show star undergoing what might be a painful transition to life away from the camera. Shortly after winning "Runway" last year, McCarroll, who's from rural Pennsylvania, told the Boston Herald, "I'm not taken seriously yet because people don't really know what I am, a fashion designer or a TV personality."

And they're not likely to have any better idea after this special, which proves once again that, whatever his design skills — McCarroll has a personality custom-tailored for TV.

Fussy, funny, and profane, he thrived during "Project Runway," his every snide comment and juicy putdown aired and re-aired as Bravo, at times, seemed to put the show in a continuous loop. (In perhaps my favorite commentary on a rival's clothing design, McCarroll simply let out a long, sustained belch.) He wore enormous, Harry Caray–sized sunglasses and a variety of colorful hats and bandannas, which often influenced the outfits his models sported on the runway. As McCarroll marched through the competition, "Runway" relegated "Queer Eye," Bravo's original "it" series, to the markdown shelf.

As a reward for being telegenic, Bravo sent a crew to follow McCarroll back to Pennsylvania for still more priceless moments. Sitting with his dad William, a retired septic-tank designer we met briefly last season, Jay points out that the old coot "still chews tobacco with dialysis." We also get some clues into Jay's freewheeling ways from the women in his life. His sister notes that he and her daughter "have a unique relationship; they're both 7-year-olds."

McCarroll fears moving to New York, but knows he must. Besides, it's the only place where he can enjoy the perks of being a Bravo star. He gets a cut from Jason Low, a high-priced hair stylist seen on "Blow Out," another Bravo reality hit. "Runway" fans stop and fawn over him. "What are you up to these days?" a tourist in Manhattan asks. "I'm trying to get down the street," he replies.

But most fashion designers work off-stage, away from the cameras, and "Project Jay" offers some evidence why. Under pressure from a real client, McCarroll's i.d. becomes even more out-of-control than it was on "Runway." After learning that he's been asked by Klum to design her dress to wear at the Emmy Awards, he responds poorly, appearing to balk at this no-brainer of an assignment. Later, he's agitated when he learns that Klum wants a fire-engine-red dress (he thinks it will clash with the carpet).

As with all reality shows, this drama may have been pulled out of thin air by a clever editor. But it's not going to help McCarroll scare up new clothing business. Too bad for him. The agenda of TV tends to become all-consuming, even to the point of suffocating the ambitions of the people it elevates to stardom. At some point, reality stars have to earn their bones the same way everybody else does.

That's the lesson Kelly Clarkson, who won "American Idol" in 2002, had to learn. After earlier recordings proved unsatisfying, she finally severed all ties with the program that made her famous and hired new producers and songwriters. That resulted in a critically-acclaimed CD that last month won a Grammy Award, which Clarkson accepted without once thanking "Idol."

Perhaps McCarroll is coming to realize this as well. He decided against showing his debut clothing line at New York's Fashion Week earlier this month, and will instead aim for a September release. He told the fashion writer Lisa Marsh that the line will be "more modern and clean, reflecting my current attitude. I got my hair cut. I quit smoking. I'm cleaning up my life." That sounds like a less interesting, but potentially more lucrative Jay McCarroll than the one on TV Wednesday night.

Apollo shines on Northampton's ears

By Alex Butler
Collegian Staff

"Apollo Sunshine". If you're keen to the music scene around Northampton or Boston at all, you've most likely heard of them — especially if you're a fan of beards and acoustic guitars.

Let's get some Greek history out of the way so this whole process is less painful. Then we'll get to the music.

Apollo is the Greek god of the sun, arts, and poetry, prophesy, and healing — and music. His father was Zeus, born on Mount Olympus, and born a brother to Aphrodite, a dame and a half. But Apollo's actions were not always the best; the bastard took down Achilles as well. Just for the fun of it. Just to show everyone he could. He supposedly gave the gift of prophecy to mortals whom he loved, such as the Trojan princess Cassandra, yada, yada, yada. Life evolves around Greece and we all thank the heavens that we get to read about it in the newspaper.

But of all the gifts Apollo had to give, to three young men from the Boston area, the music seemed the most fitting.

Jesse Gallagher, Jeremy Black and Sam Cohen were these gentlemen (and the half-naked souls seen when one stumbles upon their website, www.apollosunshine.com.) When they first collaborated at Berklee College of Music, the sun seemed to shine a tad brighter for music's future. But instead of the lyre, which Apollo was so very fond of, the trio found acoustic guitars and drums more to their liking. Well, originally it was. Then the trio expanded to a foursome, and found themselves amidst several keyboards, double necked guitars, a bass, a couple of cowboy hats, an ever-expanding drum set, and tons of facial hair.

What the band has to offer is simple — themselves. They recognized a true talent growing up, and decided once and for all to put things aside, and give Massachusetts a gift of their music. Sprouting from the Boston area, the kids had a firm hold on the homestead, but were eager to head out and see the world. Since their debut release of "Katonah", people everywhere have been itching to get a better look at this greatly awaited band.

After being recognized as one of the "New York Times" bands to watch in 2004 and the "Best New Band" by "Boston Phoenix" readers, the band had no trouble finding places to wow audiences. And once they were out, nothing could stop them. Teens were finding articles cropping up all over the place of this up and coming band.

Since their start, the band is being hailed as one of the most talked about musical performances. People hail the "Apollo Sunshine" performances as, "one of the best live shows you will ever see."

Publicity is a far too easy game for these fellows. It is even said that the band "transcends" normal rock shows around the area. And with at least 300 shows on their debut tour with album, "Katonah", it is no surprise that "Apollo Sunshine" has a comfortable hold on they way they perform. Their second release came only last year, a self-titled gem that has an even broader fan base.

But hey, if all else fails, it should be noted that earlier in the month, the band did a few shows alongside the "Wu Tang Clan". That's just pretty awesome. If you can't handle all that, then maybe you should recheck everything.

The acoustic rocking foursome Apollo's Sunshine originally hail from the Berklee College of Music, in Boston.

Valentines day a bust? Join the club

Hannah Drake

On Tuesday of last week, many of us attempted to exist in a state of blissful ignorance. It was Valentine's Day, but unless you have a valentine, it can quickly go from the most romantic day of the year to the loneliest. But guys and girls, it's all in how you look at it. In my experience, 85 percent of the time Valentine's Day did not coincide with what was actually going on in my love life, and I'd be willing to bet that this is true for a lot of people.

Last year, my valentine's day gift was finding out the guy I was trying to get back with decided that he didn't want to talk to me. And it wasn't, "Hannah, I don't think we should talk anymore." It was, "I'm not going to answer or return any of your phone calls, and I'm not going to respond to your instant messages, and to drive the point home, I'm going to change my away message several times while you're trying to talk to me so that you know I'm here and really don't want to talk to you." Feel better yet? Now add that to your roommate having just started dating what would become the love of her life. He comes over, all roses and chocolate, and they're all mushy on the couch. No? Okay, her new guy is a friend of the guy who's ignoring you. "No Hannah, I don't know why he's doing this."

The truth is, even if you're in a seemingly good relationship, Valentine's Day can still be a letdown. Here's another story: The year before that, I was in a solid relationship. He took me to Boston, to the north end, to this amazingly romantic Italian place called Assagio's. Sounds great, right? Well, I drove because he didn't have a car, he never gave me money for gas, and I paid for half of dinner. Fun, yes, but after that I couldn't ignore that he wasn't really what I wanted in a guy. My point is, Valentine's Day is Hallmark's bread and butter, so don't fall prey to the candy hearts and let the day get you down—really good, memorable Valentine's Days are few and far between. But that's what makes it exciting, right—the possibility that this is the year. Just keep it in perspective.

I'm-going-to-pretend-like-you-don't-exist guy had some growing up to do, and made-me-pay-for-my-dinner guy is gone, despite the good intentions and comaradarie we shared. I never stay in something that's falling too short of what I want—life's too short—and neither should you. I'm not extremely picky, nor do I have impossibly high standards for how I want to be treated, (although that's all relative,) but I do know what I'm looking for.

I recently ended a relationship right when it hit the three month mark because it would have been foolish to keep it going. We were fighting every day, about everything, neither of us was ever right and neither of us was wrong. I found out that he seriously resented all of the things he had done for me that made me fall for him to begin with. Beyond that, we weren't really a match made in heaven—his obsession is sports and my obsessions change on a monthly basis. I'm a pretty free-spirited person, and he's all about order. He's prime lawyer-to-be material and I'm a journalist-in-training. Which means I'm naturally curious about everything, talk to everyone and anyone, and will question everything I'm told unless it comes with a satisfactory explanation. He thought this was particularly annoying. Eventually it became glaringly obvious that we were not on the same page. We weren't even looking at the same book. I'm also somewhat of an artist, and he didn't understand that artists—writers, painters, musicians—always have unique ways of thinking about things and looking at the world, bordering on the profound. Needless to say, things ended badly because we never saw eye-to-eye on anything.

My point is, you've got to know when to hold onto 'em and when to fold 'em. And unless you're engaged or married, the person whose happiness you should be primarily focused on is your own. If you don't, it's easy to forget yourself. All of a sudden you're six months deep into a relationship you're not really happy with, but it's comfortable and it would be complicated to break up now, when you've been through so much. I've debated a lot over whether or not exes can be friends, and my conclusion as of now is that friendship is possible if it's mutual. It doesn't have to be mutual right away, but it has to come to the point of mutuality for friendship to exist—whenever there's feelings, good or bad, friendship is not possible.

So now the age-old question: how do you get over a failed relationship? There are many ways. For guys, what works better is getting on with life and becoming immersed in whatever's easiest because they're not all that used to talking about emotions. But girls need more, because we think and talk and think, and think some more and then talk even more, and then think of something new and have to talk that out, as well. It creates a never-ending circle of "what-ifs?" which actually gets us very far away from moving on.

So, first things first: if you catch yourself thinking about him or her, force yourself to think about something completely different. Whatever it is that you want, except it has to be the same every time. Eventually the feelings associated with the break-up will have subsided and you'll be able to think things over using the highest of your intellectual ability. When flooded with emotions, intellectual, rational thinking is very difficult, and for scientific reasons. Instead what you'll get is emotional thinking—which is never good thinking.

Next, start doing things that you did less and seeing people that you didn't see as much while with your now-ex. It's hard, and in most cases it's going to hurt bad before it gets better. There will be good days and bad days and then absolutely horrible days — nights are the hardest and love songs will be hard to listen to. That's another thing. It's really tempting to listen to sad, depressing music that echoes how you feel, but this is only going to make it worse. Stop yourself if that happens, listen to only favorite and uplifting songs. And above all, look your best. You never know who you're going to run in to, whether it's your next romantic adventure or your estranged ex.

'Ask the Attorney'

By Lisa Kent
SLSO Staff Attorney

"I'm getting ready to move off campus with a bunch of friends and rent an apartment for the first time. I've heard some real horror stories, though, about students and their landlords. Is there some place I can go to get help?"

If this is your question, then congratulations on your good judgment! With a little preparation and knowledge, you'll make your first rental experience a successful one.

That's the good news. The bad news: Those horror stories you've heard? They're all too common, and all too true.

With off-campus housing in relatively short supply in the Amherst area, landlords have their pick of tenants and may not always be as scrupulous as the law requires. But Massachusetts has strong laws favoring tenants' rights. If you know your rights, and follow some easy steps, you won't be easily fooled or get into a bad situation.

Know what you're getting into. Believe it or not, many students don't even know the length of their tenancy or the type of tenancy before they start renting. You have to know the type of tenancy (month-to-month, "at will," or sublet) before you know which rights you have.

Really, really read the lease. Yes, I know it's really long and uses lots of legal language. But the lease is the key rental agreement, a binding legal contract. Bring it to an attorney at the SLSO before you sign it, so you understand exactly what you're signing.

Choose your roommates carefully. In the dorm, it didn't matter if you had a troublemaker roommate. Now it certainly will. Virtually all leases make you liable for any wrongdoing by your roommate. Choose carefully.

Know what's included, what's not. Which areas are "common areas" — meaning you share them with other renters? Are pets allowed? What about parking? Ask questions to make sure you know exactly what's included.

Apart from rent, what do I have to pay for? The biggest slip-up for student renters is the high cost of heat. If heat isn't included, how does the lease make you pay for it? If you purchase oil, research ways of purchasing early for lower rates.

Who signs the lease? Generally, if you live in the apartment, you should sign the lease. If you don't sign, it may be easier for you "to get out of the lease," but you will have fewer rights. Many landlords require a co-signer, especially if you're a first -time renter, or live out of state.

Watch out for illegal lease language. Believe it or not, at the SLSO we still see illegal lease clauses. Examples include landlords exempting themselves from responsibility for safety measures or following court eviction proceedings. Get your lease checked with us.

Advance payments. Landlords can only charge you first month's rent, last month's rent, a security deposit (not to exceed one month's rent), and a key change charge — and nothing else. Beware of landlords charging "apartment prep" fees and the like.

If you give a security deposit, get a receipt and a "Statement of Conditions." The security deposit is your money, even though the landlord holds it for the lease term. Make sure you get a receipt for it. Additionally, Massachusetts law requires the landlord to give you a "statement of condition," a description of the apartment's condition. At the bottom of the statement, there's a space for you to disagree with or add to the description. Don't miss the opportunity to do so because it can save you a big headache if there's a later dispute.

Document apartment conditions before you move in and just before you move out. Many students complain about losing security deposits for damage they say they never caused. Be proactive and take photographs before you move in. Those pictures will come in handy if you ever have a dispute. Better yet, take photographs after you've swept up the apartment, to help prove you've been the model tenant.

Good luck and happy renting! Come to the SLSO at 922 Campus Center, or call us at 545-1995 for an appointment to go over your lease.

Thursday night, a big time battle between Network Stars

By Charlie McCollum
Knight Ridder Newspapers

Dick Ebersol, the czar of all things Olympic at NBC, has already declared Thursday a really big night for TV.

"This, without a doubt, is shaping up as the most competitive night in the history of American television," Ebersol told "The New York Times" last week.

That may be a bit of a stretch, but it is unprecedented for four franchise shows to go head-to-head on the same evening. The 8 p.m. clash for viewer eyeballs features the Olympics with its premier event, women's figure skating; "American Idol," which will eliminate its first two semifinalists; "Survivor," the venerable and still popular reality show; and "Dancing With the Stars," which will air its penultimate episode.

If there's a surprise entry in the field, it's "Dancing" (8 p.m., ABC). The first edition of the competition show matching D-list celebrities in the quick step, the waltz and the fox trot was an unexpected hit over the summer. Still, it was up against repeats and lame summer replacements on the other networks, so when ABC announced it would return in the fall, people in the business were skeptical it could hold its own against first-run programming.

But "Dancing" not only held its own, its viewership soared, giving ABC a hit on Thursdays (the competition show) and Fridays (the results show). It has beaten "Survivor" the past two Thursdays, the first show to do since "Friends" went off the air. It also won the ratings gold medal last Thursday and Friday against the Olympics.

Some of the success can be chalked up to clever scheduling and promotion on the part of ABC. But "Dancing" has an appeal that is undeniable. Many viewers empathize with celebrities trying to learn ballroom dances that flourished in World War II. (How many of us have suffered through trying to do a passable waltz for some special occasion?) That most of the D-listers actually threw themselves into training with their professional partners gives "Dancing" even more of a feel-good vibe.

And with all due respect to Kelly Monaco and John O'Hurley, the finalists in the summer, the show actually got some first-rate hoofers this time around.

Two of the three "stars" left standing are pop singer Drew Lachey (bro of Nick, formerly of Nick and Jessica) and Stacy Keibler, the ex-WWE poster babe. They have worked with pros Cheryl Burke and Tony Dovolani to become creditable pair dancers. And the third, ex-49er Jerry Rice, has come a long way quickly, working with San Jose dancer Anna Trebunskaya.

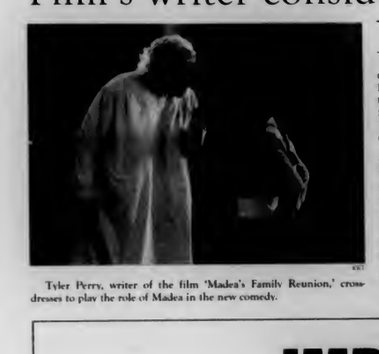
If I had to vote based on recent performances, I'd go with Keibler, but it would be close.

Thursday night, the three couples will dance for the gold, as it were, with the results (a combination of the judges' scores and viewer votes) to be announced Sunday at 8 p.m. Given how well "Dancing" has done so far, you can expect it to end with a ratings flourish.

The return of "The Sopranos" for its sixth season is now just two weeks away. (Has it really been almost two years since season five? (Seemed longer). But if you want to remind yourself just where the series left off, HBO is showing the finale of season five on Sunday at 9 p.m. The hour was loaded with twists and turns, and you may need to refresh your memory about what happened to Tony Blundetto and Johnny Sack.

If you're a fan of "Everwood" (9 p.m. Monday, WB, when it returns with new episodes on March 27), this is not good news. According to several sources, the strong family drama hasn't made any of the early schedules being tossed around for the new CW, the combination of the WB and UPN, which starts this fall. Interestingly, there are rumors that the CW is trying to work out a deal where another WB family show, "7th Heaven," would return for at least one more year. "Heaven" is now scheduled to end its run this May, after 10 seasons.

CBS will shuffle the sitcom deck in March. "Old Christine," a new comedy starring Julia Louis-Dreyfus, will get the cushy spot behind "Two and a Half Men" on Mondays, when it debuts March 13. "Courting Alex," which has been in that spot since last month, will move to Wednesdays at 8:30 p.m. March 22, where it will be matched up with "Out of Practice" (8 p.m.), returning from a lengthy hiatus. The shows currently occupying the hour, "Still Standing" and "Yes, Dear," will end their shortened seasons on March 15.



NBC has decided to stretch out the season for "The Office" (9:30 p.m. Thursday). It had been announced the series would have its season finale in late March so star Steve Carell could make a movie. But with one new episode and repeats, the show won't actually be ending its season until mid-May.

And speaking of laughs, or maybe not, NBC will finally bring back "Joey" but not on Thursdays. The "Friends" spin-off, one of the biggest busts in recent TV history, will air what will almost certainly be its final episodes on Tuesdays at 8 p.m., starting March 7.

'American Idol,' 'Dancing with the Stars,' and 'Survivor' are all competing shows with the 2006 Winter Olympics programming which struggles for television recognition.

Film's writer considers racial issues with 'Family Reunion'

Tyler Perry, writer of the film 'Madea's Family Reunion,' cross-dresses to play the role of Madea in the new comedy.

By Daniel Fienberg
Knight Ridder Newspapers

LOS ANGELES — When "Diary of a Mad Black Woman" opened last February, more articles were written about a Wes Craven werewolf flick and a supposed comedy pairing Tommy Lee Jones with cheerleaders.

After "Diary" scooped up nearly $22 million, Hollywood was stunned. The media was stunned. Film critics, who mostly panned the movie, were stunned. The film's writer, Tyler Perry? Not so stunned.

"I wasn't surprised, I was thankful," says Perry. "Again, being on tour all over the country, you see all of these people and they say, 'We're going, Tyler. We're going to support you. We're going to support you.' And then they go. So I was grateful. I knew they were there, but to have them go was a whole 'nother thing."

"Madea's Family Reunion," Perry's "Diary" follow-up, won't be sneaking up on anybody. The film, which features Perry as smack-talking, pistol-packing, audience-friendly Madea, has a slightly higher budget and a few familiar faces (including Blair Underwood, Lynn Whitfield, and Cicely Tyson), but the same difficult-to-describe style.

"It's schizophrenic — that's how I describe it," Perry explains with a laugh. "It's all over the place, man. It's joy, it's happy, it's sad, it's everything. It's just an emotional roller coaster, you know? Even the plays themselves, you come to see them and it's like a stand-up comedic routine. I'm breaking the wall. I'm talking to the audience. It's theater. It's some of everything. It's concert."

One thing Perry, who still tours the country playing Madea to sell-out crowds, doesn't expect is complete acceptance.

"I don't know if it's necessarily about critics or just people in general," he admits. "There's such a disconnect in this country. There's such a just, everybody has their own life and their own world and everybody's in their own compartment and nobody's crossing or peaking to see what's over on the other side or in the other areas. I think the main reason that people don't get it is because they don't understand what this character represents, this Madea character represents, what these movies or shows or plays of mine represent."

He adds, "I'm so used to the mediocre reviews or the terrible reviews, when I see a good one — which I don't read or pay attention to — when I hear about it. I'm really surprised, because I expect people not to get it. I really do."

Even if reviewers don't get him, Perry sees his message getting through post-"Diary."

"I'm seeing more non-black people represented in the audience," he says of his shows. "I can see it from the stage. It's really amazing, since the movie's been out I can look out in the audience and see 30 percent of people who are not black and that's pretty amazing, especially in certain Southern cities."

He notes, "I've always said, even from Day One, I said, 'This is universal. I envision that everyone can relate to love, hurt pain, learning how to forgive people, to get over, needing the power of God in their life.'"

"Madea's Family Reunion" is now wide on Friday.

UM looks to build on success

Aaron Paskalis, and four-year starting goalie Bill Schell – all of whom played prominent roles in last year's run to the tournament.

"Every year, you need everybody on your team to have their best year," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "When you're a senior, hopefully we have their best year all four years. You just hope that some guys can step up such as a guy like Clay Stabert, who is a senior, and can step up and score goals. You're not going to replace Jeff Zywicki. He was an outstanding player for us with the experience he had and the ability to score. He was unbelievable.

"You need guys to elevate their game to replace the losses (to graduation). You can't replace the experience of Chris Doyle, Ryan Connolly and Gene Tundo, but you can try with the people who have been in the program."

Here is how the rest of the 2006 Minutemen stack up:

Attack

Morris will obviously be the top scoring option yet again for the UMass offense, but he expects to see a lot more double-teams from opposing defenses now that Zywicki is scoring goals for the National Lacrosse League's San Jose Stealth, and not the Maroon and White.

Who plays on the top attack line with Morris still appears to be up in the air, although he meshed very well with Stabert, who will spend the majority of his time working the crease, and freshman Jim Connolly, who scored over 500 points during his high school career in North Andover, Mass.

"We worked well together," Morris said. "I thought Jimmy really stepped up and started to come into his own."

The rest of the attacknen don't appear to be as much of a lock to see a defined amount of playing time, but contributions are expected from junior Denis Whelan, freshman Tim Balise – who broke the Minnechaug High School scoring record – and senior Bret Caretsky, who is trying to work his way back in time for Hofstra from a knee injury he suffered last fall.

"Attack is wide open right now for the two other [starting] spots," Morris said. "Some young guys, Tim Balise and Jim Connolly, have been playing well. Bret Caretsky is back. Clay Stabert and Denis Whelan have been in the mix. We've all been playing well so far, but we'll find out come game time who steps up and who doesn't."

Midfield

Out of the gate, this looks like it will be the strongest overall area for the Minutemen. The top line consists of juniors Brett Garber (17-7—24), Pat Larmon (12-0—12) and Brian Jacovina (13-13—26), who all had solid statistical seasons in the last go-round, and they will be heavily looked upon to step up the offensive load more so in 2006.

"Pat Larmon is going to be very good for us this year," Morris said. "He has been a machine. He just doesn't stop working. He is going to be good."

Two other veterans, junior Andrew Recchione and senior Jamie Yaman, will see a lot of time on the second line along with sophomore Rory Pedrick and redshirt freshman Evan Blum, who the entire team looks upon very highly.

"Evan Blum has got a chance to step up and be a shooter in the midfield," Reid said. "He can be a real asset and a real weapon for us. He will give us some depth. He is a big kid and will be a real tough matchup."

"Evan Blum is a big kid," Morris said. "He is 6-foot-4 and really athletic. He looked great in the scrimmage this past week. With those guys, I think we have six or seven guys who can really go. I really like our midfield, and I like how they play together."

Defense

While Morris gets all of the attention for his highlight reel scoring ability, Reid's defensive prowess doesn't necessarily show up under his name on the scoring sheet, but it sure shows up under his opponents' names. Reid would go games at a time last season without allowing a player he has guarded to score a single goal, but with the loss of the other two starters – Paskalis and four-year starter Garcia – it will take a group effort for the defense to stay as sound in 2006.

"We've been playing together for a long time," Reid said of Garcia and Paskalis. "You lose a lot of experience when a four-year starter leaves. Paskalis just started last year, but he played a lot. You lose a lot of experience when older guys like that leave. I think our younger defensemen have a lot of athleticism, and that can be a strong point for us this year."

Sophomores David Von Voigt and Sean Krygier have earned the starting roles to compliment Reid heading into the opener.

Freshman Diogo Godoi, who comes from the same high school as Paskalis, is a massive presence at 6-foot-3 and 215 pounds and should have a solid future in the program.

"Sean and Von Voigt have great attitudes and great work ethics," Reid said. "They're athletes. They're ready to play, and they are chomping at the bit to get a chance to go out there and show the world what they're made of."

"David Von Voigt has really stepped up, and so has Sean Krygier," Morris said. "Freshman Diogo Godoi is also doing really well. Those guys are there athletically and physically, but they don't have the mental experience as those other guys. Hopefully, they can catch up quick enough."

Long-stick midfielders Dan Whipple and Jake Dean, the third tri-captain, will also see a ton of action. Dean's most invaluable presence is on the faceoff unit.

"This year, [Dean] is going to be an absolute integral part of our defense," Reid said. "He is going to be a huge part of our faceoff unit, whether he is taking the faceoffs himself or lining up on the wing when Dane Collins takes them. His team defense has gotten impressively better over the years. He can split time with Whipple, and we'll have two great athletes out there with long poles whenever we need them."

Goalies

Schell closed out his career fourth on the all-time saves list with 547 stops, but the Minutemen have three viable options, all of whom have the opportunity to step up and take his place between the pipes.

Junior Efosa Guobodia, who started in net last year in the win over Rutgers that clinched the ECAC Championship when Schell was injured, will get a look, but the two incoming freshmen – Jonathan Schneider and Nick Sciubba, who were both high school All-Americans – appear to have as good of a chance to earn the leading role as any.

"We feel that we have three solid goalies," Cannella said. "Two of them are freshmen, and they are both very good goalies, very good stoppers and very good leaders. We are hoping we are going to be improved there, at least save-percentage-wise.

"Billy had great experience clearing the ball. He is a good leader, and we'll miss that, but these guys are good leaders. Efosa got some experience at the end of last year with the Rutgers game and the Syracuse game. It's really a neck-and-neck thing."

"We've got three goalies who can make a lot of saves this year," Reid said. "I look at that to be a strong point for us as the year goes on. I definitely think we have the kind of personnel that can make that happen. We've got to get them focused and not let them get down on themselves because goals happen. We've got to get them moving on to the next play. If they are doing that, they'll be fine this year."

Morris still the key

Jeff Howe

It seemed like the thing to do last year. Why not?

Sean Morris was dominant on the offensive end of the lacrosse field, scoring 44 goals, dishing out 25 assists and totaling 69 points, the most by anyone on the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team since Mark Millon's 81-point effort in 1991.

So it never came as a surprise when opposing teams would put two or even three defenders on him at a time to limit his production. One thing though; it hardly worked.

Morris never showed any qualms with dumping the ball off to one of the other pure scorers lined up at the attack position with him, whether it was Jeff Zywicki – who tied Morris for the team lead with 44 goals – or Gene Tundo, who was the perfect role player on the line but still racked up 20 goals and 17 assists.

But this year, with Zywicki and Tundo both gone after graduation, Morris is likely to see more intense double-teams, and he won't be lined up with any proven big-time scorers.

Still, it may not matter. In the first round of the NCAA Tournament last year at Garber Field, Morris fought off nearly the entire Syracuse defense while fighting his way to the net to score the game-winning goal with just 72 seconds left in the game – a goal that caused so many jaws to drop that it wound up on SportsCenter later that night.

No matter how much magic Morris can perform with the ball this year, though, the rotation of attackmen will be forced to step their game up, and the midfielders will be looked upon to score with more regularity than they were asked to last season.

While those double-teams came early and often, the defensemen were still forced to stay honest with Zywicki and Tundo down low and midfielder Chris Doyle, who netted 17 goals in his 2005 senior campaign, hanging around near the top of the box. Until the Minutemen establish a second and third look on offense – which will definitely happen, it's just a matter of who it will be – the opposing long sticks will focus the brunt of their prowess at UMass' Texaarion finalist.

"It will come, but I don't think it will change the way we play," Morris said. "Our offense is our offense. If they're going to focus on me, that's fine because we've got some really good midfielders and some other guys who can finish the ball.

"If that's their game plan, then that's their game plan. Other guys will step up. They've done it already. It will open up some opportunities for some other guys, and hopefully we'll capitalize on them."

"You can't really count on having one guy replace [Zywicki], but can you have two or three guys replace him? Maybe," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "Can you get close to replacing him with a couple guys? Maybe."

Senior Clay Stabert wasn't heavily involved in the offensive game plan last year, only picking up one goal and one assist, but he is expected to be a mainstay down near the crease this season. Freshmen Jim Connolly and Tim Balise are both coming off of stellar high school careers, and Connolly has stepped up so far throughout the exhibition season, jelling nicely with Morris and Stabert on the top line.

The top middie line of Brian Jacovina, Brett Garber and Pat Larmon combined for 42 goals and 20 assists last year, and the trio showed a marked improvement together from their freshman campaign in 2004.

Senior defenseman Jack Reid, a Preseason First-Team All-American, sees a huge bright side coming out of the three juniors already this year.

"They know what it's about playing midfield for UMass," Reid said. "You're going to get your looks. You don't have to shoot it every time. I've seen passes made in the scrimmages so far this spring that I haven't seen our middies make until May after a full season of getting used to the offense. I can definitely see the experience already showing through. They know the offense. They know where the ball needs to go and how it needs to get there."

Morris has once again received a ton of preseason hype, earning First-Team All-American honors as well as being tagged as the ECAC Preseason Offensive Player of the Year. There is a lot of pressure hanging over him as the Minutemen inch closer to their season opener against Hofstra on Saturday, but Cannella still understands that the offense runs through one particular person.

"You try to move on and go to your strengths," Cannella said. "Sean is a guy who has the experience. He is going to get the ball a lot. We're going to ask him to score a bunch."

And you know what? He will.

Deane leads supporting cast

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

Playing alongside a pair of All-Americans, it would be easy for someone like senior Jake Deane to go unnoticed on the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team. But while seniors Sean Morris and Jack Reid draw most of the attention from opposing teams, it's players like Deane who will have to step up if UMass plans on repeating the success it achieved last year.

Deane, who saw action in all 16 games last season as a long-stick defensive midfielder, is well aware that in order to justify its No. 9 preseason ranking, UMass will need strong contributions from the team's supporting cast.

"Playing with those guys is just an honor," Deane said. "Jack and Sean are the two best players in the country so those guys are going to have a lot on their shoulders and a lot of people are going to be gunning for them.

"Other people have to step up and take a load off of them, and I know we have guys on this team who are willing to do that. It's just a matter of playing with confidence and going out there and not being scared of anyone."

While it's unlikely that Deane whose nickname is "The Terminator" is ever scared of anyone on the field, what UMass coach Greg Cannella will be looking for from the senior is an increase in leadership this season.

"You look to guys like Jack, Sean and Jake because those are the leaders of our team; they're the tri-captains so they have a greater responsibility this year," Cannella said. "Hopefully they can elevate their games and themselves as leaders. A huge part of our success will be the leadership that we have in place."

Reid is expecting big things out of his defensive cohort as Deane settles into a more critical role with the team this season.

"Jake's going to have an enormous role," Reid said. "He's worked really hard through his four years and every year he's gotten to see the field more and more. He's a groundball vacuum, and it'll be nice to have the Terminator out there sucking those balls up left and right."

Deane has hung his hat on being a groundball specialist during his career, as he was second on the team with 54 groundballs last year, and will also be counted on to control faceoffs for the Minutemen.

"He's going to take a lot of faceoffs," Cannella said. "That's a huge part of our game and we need to be great there. So we're hoping that Jake can take a lot of draws. Facing off takes a lot out of you, but we always have that effort from Jake."

"When it comes to facing off, I'm not the best faceoff man, I'm more of a guy who tries to scrap it up," Deane said. "I'd rather consider myself a groundball guy than a faceoff guy. I'm more of a guy that when I see that ball on the ground and guys are around it, I feel that I can come up with it. I want it more than other guys. That's been my game all through growing up."

Deane, Reid and junior long-stick midfielder Dan Whipple will anchor the Minuteman defense which will face the challenge of replacing Aaron Paskalis and Matt Garcia who were lost to graduation.

While it won't be easy to compensate for the loss of Paskalis and Garcia on the backline, Deane is confident that the combination of returning players and newcomers will be able to form a strong defensive unit.

"It's more of a whole team defense concept," Deane said. "We all help one another out and it should be a good year on the defensive side of the ball. We have some young guys back there but they have so much potential it should be a fun year. We still have a lot to prove though."

UMASS AMHERST University of Massachusetts Amherst

UM faces St. Louis

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

Two games remain in the regular season for the Massachusetts women's basketball team, and with the Minutewomen currently in a three-way tie for seventh place in the Atlantic 10 standings, these two games are vital as the team prepares for the A-10 Tournament, which will begin on March 3.

The first of those two contests will take place tonight at 8 p.m. against the Saint Louis Billikens (6-19, 3-11 A-10) at the Bauman-Herhardt Athletic Center in Saint Louis, Mo. With such emphasis put on the last two games of the regular season for UMass, the record of the opposition, nor the location that the games will take place has much of an affect on the attitude of the Minutewomen.

"[Saint Louis is] a bubble team right now to get into the tournament, and they are going to go down fighting hard and we've got to take them down," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "We've got to come out and be aggressive."

The Minutewomen are presently tied in the conference standings with La Salle and Richmond, with the tie-breaker going to the Maroon and White.

The team arrived in that position after an unexpected late-season turnaround, but despite the improvement on paper (UMass has nabbed seven of its last nine contests), Dacko feels that there is still progress and development that must occur.

"I'm proud of my team, and the way we've played the last nine ball games, and I think that we've got to continue to get better," Dacko said. "There's still room for growth and there is still room for fine-tuning and reaching a level of excellence – we're not there."

Sophomore Kate Mills and the Minutewomen will take on Saint Louis tonight at 8 p.m. on the road. UMass has won seven of its last nine games.

While it doesn't appear difficult to produce excellence against a 6-19 Saint Louis team that is in 13th place in the conference, the Billikens have been able to come away with wins over A-10 foes Rhode Island and La Salle – both teams that were neck-and-neck with UMass this regular season.

The go-to-girl for the Billikens this season has been junior guard Tyler McIlwraith, who is currently averaging 15.5 points per-game and leads the team in steals with 43. Heather King, a sophomore forward, leads the team in rebounds per-game at 6.4, totaling 161 on the season.

Countering McIlwraith and King will be the Minutewomen's sophomore tandem of Patti Rosario and Kate Mills. Rosario leads the team in scoring, averaging 12.5 points per game, while Mills has registered 31 blocks during the season. Senior guard Katie Nelson turned her season around the same way the team did, and is fourth on the team in scoring with 6.5 points per game, and also has the best percentage from the perimeter (among starters) with a mark of .289.

The success during the latter portion of the season is a reflection of the team's ability to take advantage of home games. The Minutewomen have won five straight contests at the Mullins Center, while scoring a mammoth amount of points during that streak (66.6 points per game as a team).

Tonight's game will be over 1,000 miles away from the Mullins Center, however, and although the Minutewomen have thrived in Amherst, Dacko knows that in order to succeed at the A-10 Tournament, the team needs to be able to win away from home.

"You always want to be home, but we've got to be able to win on the road," Dacko said. "We've got to put the ball in the basket on away courts. The court doesn't change, it's the same size, baskets are 10 feet high, and it doesn't matter where we are, we've got to be ready to perform."

Late free throw sinks UMass' upset bid against Charlotte

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

Last night's game between the Massachusetts men's basketball team and Charlotte was a hard fought contest between two competitive teams in the Atlantic 10 conference – but it looked more like the 3-point contest at the All-Star game.

Charlotte's De'Angelo Alexander and Leemire Goldwire were a combined 11-for-17 from 3-point land in last night's battle at the Mullins Center, and it was too much for UMass (11-13, 6-7 Atlantic 10) to overcome. The Minutemen fell 72-71 to the 49ers (17-9, 10-3 A-10), after a Jeff Viggiano prayer from half court fell short at the buzzer.

The Minutemen are back in action on Saturday at noon when they take on the Dayton Flyers at home. At halftime, the Mullins Center court will be dedicated to the late UMass coach, Jack Leaman.

"There were way too many threes for us to stay in the basketball game," UMass coach Travis Ford said. "That was a big key for us, to hold them down from the 3-point line, and we just couldn't do it."

Junior captain Stephane Lasme and sophomore Lawrence Carrier carried UMass down the stretch. Lasme scored 10 points in the last 7:50 of the game (including a thunderous dunk at the 7:50 mark that nearly brought the house down), and Carrier added eight points in the second half, but it wasn't enough to get the Minutemen over the hump.

	UMass	Charlotte

Lasme went 7-for-7 from the field and tallied 18 points, but, once again, turnovers plagued UMass.

"Turnovers are really holding our team back," Ford said. "You can't turn the ball over 13 times like we did in the first half. You turn the ball over 20 times when you're at home and that's all we've been preaching for the last three days. I thought being at home might help us. Twenty turnovers is way too many."

UMass held the advantage down the stretch, when freshman point guard Chris Lowe hit a 12-footer to give the Minutemen a 68-66 lead with 2:47 left in the game. Junior captain Rashaun Freeman committed his second foul on Curtis Withers in Charlotte's ensuing possession, and the A-10's leading rebounder knocked down the two free throws.

Freshman point guard Chris Lowe had six points and nine assists in a 72-71 loss last night to Charlotte at the Mullins Center.

Lasme struck again at the 2:00 mark with an offensive rebound and put back to give UMass a two-point lead. A defensive stop left the Minutemen with a 70-68 lead and the ball.

Ford called a full timeout to ensure a good offensive possession, and the Minutemen got a good look from Freeman on the right block from point-blank range. He missed the lay-up but was fouled and hit the second of two free throws to give the Minutemen a three-point lead.

On the Charlotte end, a missed shot from Alexander clanged off the back rim and fell to Withers. He kicked it out to Goldwire who buried a three to tie the game at 71.

"Scoring at the rate we were scoring in the second half, and they come down and hit threes every four or five trips, it was just a killer for us," Ford said.

On the other end, junior Brandon Thomas penetrated on the left baseline and tried to sneak a pass to Lasme in the paint, but 49er defenders collapsed down and stole the ball, giving Charlotte the ball with 18 seconds left in the game.

The crowd came alive in anticipation as Charlotte put the ball in Withers' hands and wound the clock down.

Withers drove to the basket and was fouled by Freeman at the rim and went to the line for two shots with 3.7 seconds left in the game. Ford called a timeout before the two free throws, then Withers set up for the biggest shots of the game.

Withers made the first free throw, but the second shot clanged off the front rim. Viggiano grabbed the rebound and dribbled to half court. With time running out, he fired a shot from just inside half court. It was off the mark and the Minutemen dropped yet another close game.

Between the 14:12 and 10:00 marks in the second half, Carrier was the offensive option that the Minutemen had been lacking, he hit two 3-pointers in that stretch and, off of a Charlotte turnover, dribbled the ball from half court, cupping the ball in one hand as he glided in for the easy lay-up

The champs are back in action

UMass aiming higher this year

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

There are two ways to look at the 2005 Massachusetts men's lacrosse season. First, the Minutemen won the ECAC Championship, the New England Championship, defeated Syracuse twice – the second time to knock the Orange out of the postseason before the Final Four for the first time in 22 years – and advanced to the NCAA Quarterfinals where they fell victim to eventual national champion Johns Hopkins on its home field, which by NCAA Tournament standards, was a neutral site.

However, despite every earned accolade of a season ago, there isn't a single player or coach in the locker room who is satisfied with the way 2005 ended. They wanted more than just another quarterfinal appearance, but most importantly, they wanted a better showing on the last day of the season down in Baltimore.

"I was really bummed," senior tri-captain Sean Morris said. "We went to Hopkins and looked like we were in our first week of practice. We didn't play like ourselves at all. I credit them, but we just shot ourselves in the foot.

"We were a game before the Final Four, where this program has never been. We've been to the quarterfinals a handful of times. This program has already been there. If the program wants to have success that we've never had before, we've got to win there. It was successful because we won the ECAC, and that is something to be proud of. I shouldn't take anything from it, but I wanted more [everyone did]."

Morris is coming off his most successful season on an individual level, scoring 44 goals and dishing out 25 assists for 69 points, the most earned by a Minuteman since Mark Millon racked up 81 points in 1991. The Tewaaraton Trophy finalist is a First-Team Preseason All-American and was just tabbed as the ECAC Preseason Offensive Player of the Year.

Fellow senior tri-captain Jack Reid, who was just named the ECAC Preseason Defensive Player of the Year, echoed Morris' sentiments about last year's concluding chapter.

"Overall, we had a great year last year, but we didn't accomplish everything we set out to accomplish," Reid said. "Anytime you don't do that, you don't come out completely satisfied. I can't sit here and say that I feel satisfied with the way last year finished. It's been a motivator for me all fall and all winter to get ready to go this spring. Hopefully, we can build on last year, and that wasn't the top for where we can finish."

The biggest issue the 2006 team needs to face, though, isn't worrying about Hopkins, but rather focusing on moving forward despite the losses of key players to graduation such as attackmen Jeff Zywicki and Gene Tundo, midfielders Chris Doyle and Ryan Connolly, defensemen Matt Garcia and

UM starts season against rival

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

While there may still be some questions surrounding the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team heading into this season, there is certainly no doubting that the Minutemen will be ready to play when the season opens up against Hofstra on Saturday at 2 p.m. at Garber Field.

The biggest challenge for the No. 9 Minutemen may be the wait until Saturday, as the players were already fired up on Monday, closing out an intense practice with exclamations about defending their home turf.

Not that the Minutemen, who are coming off of a 13-3 season during which they reached the NCAA Quarterfinals, need any more motivation to get the 2006 campaign underway, but the fact that they are playing No. 16 Hofstra only adds meaning to the season opener.

"It's a big game," senior defenseman Jack Reid said. "Hofstra is a great game for us to start off with. It's just great rivalry. We really don't like them at all, and they sure don't like us. It's a nice intense battle to start off the season. We want to get it started off on the right foot, so we have to show up on Saturday and play our hearts out."

While Reid, who along with senior attackman Sean Morris was named a Preseason First-Team All-American, knows that Hofstra was also responsible for ending the UMass football season this fall, he says he already has plenty of motivation to beat the Pride on Saturday.

"My incentive to beat Hofstra is already stacked," Reid said. "I here isn't a lot more I can really pile on. But if I could make people like (UMass safety) James Ihedigbo happy by beating up on Hofstra, I'd love to do it for them, too. I have a lot of people just on the lacrosse team that want to see us beat Hofstra, so that request line is pretty filled up."

Senior defensive midfielder Jake Deane is one of those teammates who have grown to despise Hofstra, and Deane will be looking for the Minutemen to come out ready to play on Saturday.

"We hate Hofstra," Deane said. "In the four years I've been here it's been a rivalry, we've had great games every year. All that matters is who is ready to play when you step on the field and the whistle blows. Everyone wants to go after them and get a win."

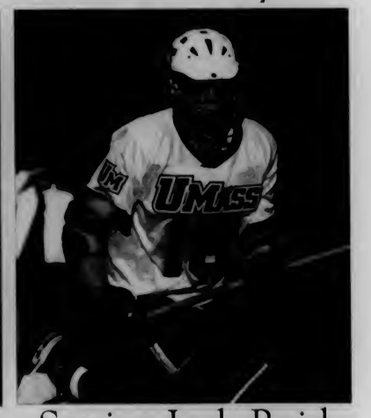
UMass coach Greg Cannella will take a more diplomatic approach into the matchup with a Hofstra squad that the Maroon and White defeated 12-7 in last year's season opener.

"Hofstra is going to be coming in here pretty hungry so we need to be really good early in the game and be able to sustain that," Cannella said.

The Minutemen have gotten off to slow starts in scrimmages against Dartmouth and Army in the preseason, but Canella expects that they will step up their play on Saturday.

"Each and every game we want to come out and play at the highest level we can, and Saturday is no different," Cannella said. "If everyone can be ready for it mentally and physically, and play at a high level, everything else takes care of itself. We try as a team to focus on those things rather than winning or losing. We just prepare ourselves during the week to go out and play at a high level."

What the All-Americans have to say:



Senior Sean Morris

"It's something you work for. It's nice, but I would trade all of those in the world – not even to have a win against Hopkins last year – just to play them again. They're nice for the family. It makes my parents proud. It means a lot to me, but it's just writing on the wall. It's not going to help me out or guarantee me anything on the field."

Coach Greg Connella

"The personal accolades always come when the team does well. If the team doesn't do well, these guys won't get anything. That's the way it is, unfortunately. Jack and Sean are two people who really understand that it's about the team and not about the individual. They'll be the first ones to tell you the same thing I just said. It's more about the team. If the team takes care of business, everyone is going to get patted on the back."

Senior Jack Reid

"It's an honor to be recognized. Personally, I care about the name on the front of the chest. As long as UMass is showing up, playing their hearts out and winning as a team, then this program is all I really care about. What other people think in the lacrosse world doesn't really matter. It's the people in the office and the locker room that make a difference to me. The heck with the rest."

Brotherhood of Groove rocks UMass for Katrina victims

By Melissa D'Amico
Collegian Correspondent

The New Orleans funk bands Brotherhood of Groove, Big Sam's Funky Nation and New Orleans Juice came together at the Fine Arts Center of the University of Massachusetts Wednesday night to take part in a Hurricane Katrina Benefit Concert, organized by University Productions and Concerts.

People who attended the benefit said that they were unaware or uninterested in the fact that the concert was organized to raise money for Hurricane Katrina relief efforts.

"I came for the funk, but the money is going toward the benefit, so I'm glad to have helped, too," said Jacob Porst, a freshman at Hampshire College.

The opportunity to support those whose homes were destroyed by Hurricane Katrina seemed to be overlooked by those who attended the concert, as well as the UMass community who did not show in great numbers.

"We advertised everywhere we could: MySpace, Facebook, flyers. I just wish more people would have shown up," said Jen Tortin, Production Manager for University Productions and Concerts. "I think that most UMass students don't take advantage of the opportunities they have here on campus."

The concert opened at 8 p.m. with New Orleans Juice and was followed by a performance by Big Sam's Funky Nation.

Big Sam's stirred energy in the crowd, capturing the audience. Most people in attendance moved to the stage front to dance.

"Ain't nothin' but a party!" sang both Big Sam and the audience as the singer danced around the stage holding his trombone and clapping his hands.

Big Sam's Funky Nation was followed by Brotherhood of Groove.

The concert not only attracted local students and community members, but jazz and funk music lovers from throughout Massachusetts.

Bonnie Hale, 56, of Medford and Gerri Malone, 45, of Milford danced in the crowd after driving two hours to see the concert. Hale and Malone said they heard about the concert through a Louisiana music related Web site. They too came mainly for the music, and were unaware that the concert was organized to raise money for Katrina relief efforts.

"I would have come to see Sam anyway, but the Katrina Benefit was an added bonus," Malone said.

"We're Louisiana music enthusiasts. There is a group of us who follow Louisiana-related music and go to as many shows as we can," added Hale.

At the end of the concert, the three bands joined together onstage, combining their individual talents to create a powerful finale. The group of musicians sang, danced, threw beads into the audience and welcomed the crowd onstage. The audience obliged, creating a large dance with Big Sam playing music.

"It was amazing. [Going onstage] brought you closer to the band. You realized that they were not just gods onstage, they were real people too," said Ankit Chandra, a freshman at UMass. "It was the best fusion of funk I've ever heard."

Although less than 100 tickets were sold, those in attendance seemed pleased with the show.

"[All the students who did not come] wasted a Wednesday night doing homework when they should have been here to experience true funk and to help others," said Chandra.

The proceeds of the concert will be donated to the American Red Cross Hurricane Katrina Relief Fund.

More information about donations to the Red Cross can be found on the organization's Web site, redcross.org.

Members of The Brotherhood of Groove rock out in the UMass Fine Arts Center. Proceeds of the concert were donated to American Red Cross Hurricane Katrina Relief Fund.

Dean O'Brien, head of ISOM, annouces resignation for 2006

By Derrick Perkins
Collegian Correspondent

Dean Thomas O'Brien speaks with UMass students. O'Brien announced he would be stepping down as dean at the end of the academic year.

Dean Thomas O'Brien of the University of Massachusetts's Isenberg School of Management has announced his stepping down as head of the ISOM at the end of the school year.

O'Brien has been the dean of the ISOM since 1987 and has overseen the construction of the $16 million Harold Alfond Management Center, the endowment of five faculty positions and a six million dollar alumni gift, the largest in UMass Amherst campus history.

The ISOM has also received top ten national rankings in both the 2005 and 2006 editions of the Princeton Review series of Best Business Schools publications during O'Brien's tenure. O'Brien announced last spring that the 2005-06 academic year would be his last.

Looking back, O'Brien said he considers the construction of the new Harold Alfond Management Center as the realization of his goals for the School of Management. He said the Management Center is a symbol of the way "undergraduates have identified with the school and how much they like being part of it."

In 2003, O'Brien expanded the ISOM by introducing two new departments, the Department of Sports Management and the Department of Hospitality and Tourism Management. O'Brien considered having both departments outside of the ISOM as redundant.

"They were recruiting from the same kind of disciplines we were recruiting from. They needed to learn accounting. They needed to learn finance. They needed to learn the organizational behavior, and we already were providing those within our own departments," said O'Brien.

O'Brien's role in bringing national recognition to the programs within the School of Management has been largely bureaucratic. He has worked toward gaining the resources necessary to improve the student experience at the School of Management. It is his relationship with university alumni, whom O'Brien describes as being "very enthusiastic," that has been the most important resource for the ISOM.

"In Massachusetts they had grown up with the assumption that the state would be the provider of funds and they now realize that in order to be competitive today they have to help and that's been very important. It's made all the difference," he said of alumni.

O'Brien said the contacts he has made while working for the state and various private corporations contributed to his ability to prepare students in the School of Management for careers after college. He also emphasized the role alumni have played in making the School of Management more suited to the needs of private businesses and organizations.

"It's been the contacts and my friends and my ability to relate to whatever organization our alumni work in and really talk about what's going on in their organization and helping them to understand how our students might be a great supply of talent," he said.

No replacement has been named as of yet to serve as the dean of the School of Management after O'Brien steps down at the end of the semester, but the process of finding suitable candidates is ongoing. O'Brien hopes that the school will continue to expand and increase capacity for students after he has left. He said he hopes this is done by hiring more faculty members and continuing to construct more facilities. O'Brien expects the next dean will increase fund-raising and continue to improve the School of Management.

After nineteen years as dean of the School of Management, O'Brien said he is looking forward to what comes next.

"I'd like to teach," he said. "I'd like to work for a living instead of being a bureaucrat."

Senator Rosenberg optimistic about University, state budgets

By Mike Sances
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts State Senator Stanley Rosenberg (D-Amherst) painted an optimistic view for the future of funding public higher education in Massachusetts in a speech to the University of Massachusetts Faculty Senate Thursday night. Rosenburg attributed his optimism to a "substantial surplus" projected for the state budget in the coming fiscal year.

Rosenberg, a graduate of UMass Amherst in 1977, received a warm welcome of applause and was repeatedly thanked by members of the Faculty Senate for his work for the University over his 20 year career in state politics.

After undergoing two recessions in the past four and a half years, Rosenburg said "we are finally seeing positive revenue growth in the Commonwealth."

The University has experienced those recessions first-hand, in the form of decreased funding from the state and rising student fees.

Rosenberg also pointed to the recent unanimous passage of a bill before the Massachusetts Senate that will provide $400 million to the state's public universities and colleges.

The bill was co-sponsored by Rosenberg and fellow Senator Steven C. Panagiotakos (D-Lowell).

The two also co-chaired the Senate Task Force on Higher Education, the group that formed the $400 million figure, the amount required to close the higher education funding gap in Massachusetts.

If approved by the House, the bill would also allow the UMass Board of Trustees to raise tuition at state colleges and universities, which currently is under the authority of the state Board of Higher Education.

Rosenberg also noted the opportunity for "new blood, new energy, new ideas" in the five Trusteeship spots opening up in the coming months, with four more set to open up one year later. Rosenberg said he hopes that a successful Board of Trustees will be a legacy left by Governor Mitt Romney.

The Board is currently made up of 22 members, including three student Trustees without votes and two with.

Responding to a question to the Board by Jamie Jee, a UMass graduate student and member of the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy, Rosenberg emphasized that members of the public may nominate themselves as candidates for Trusteeships when openings occur, though ultimately they must be approved by the governor. Future appointments by the Senate President and the Speaker of the House are also being looked into, Rosenberg said.

The Faculty Senate concluded its meeting with the approval of a new course, Judaic 344, titled "Film and Society in Israel." Dispute arose, however, with the proposed amending of a General Education Designation to a Spanish course. "The Occult in Literature," when it was realized that no one present at the meeting had any real knowledge of the course or could precisely define the meaning of the letters "A," "I" and "G" to be added to it.

"I'd like to know what is general about the General Education requirement," asked sociology Professor Roland Chilton. After a brief discussion, and with no satisfactory answer to be found, Chilton concluded he knew as much about the particular course as he did before he asked his question.

"Wouldn't it be a good idea to have the people preparing the course come and say something about it?" Chilton added.

The matter of the particular course, Spanish 266, was then tabled until the next Senate meeting.

Delay possible in ports deal, Democrats want new probe

By Liz Sidoti
Associated Press

WASHINGTON – Bush administration officials opened the door Thursday to a delay in allowing a state-owned United Arab Emirates company to assume significant operations at six U.S. ports as lawmakers pushed for a new 45-day investigation of the deal.

The company, Dubai Ports World, signaled to Congress that it, too, would be willing to accept a short delay while lawmakers review the deal.

"People don't need to worry about security," President Bush said shortly before administration officials who approved the transaction told a Senate committee their 90-day review did not turn up a single national security concern to justify blocking it.

Karl Rove, the president's chief political adviser, said Bush was willing to accept a slight delay in Dubai Ports World's purchase of terminal leases and other operations at six U.S. ports from a British company.

"There's no requirement that it close, you know, immediately after" a British government review of the $6.8 billion purchase is completed next week, Rove said on Fox Radio's "Tony Snow Show." "What is important is that members of Congress have the time to get fully briefed on this."

Lobbyists for Dubai Ports World indicated that while the company is eager to close the deal, it is willing to agree to a delay to satisfy demands by members of Congress, according to a person familiar with the conversations.

Nonetheless, Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada sought quick action on legislation relating to the deal when Congress returns to Washington next week.

In a letter to Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., Reid said the administration's handling of the deal "could not be more flawed." Reid said he was alarmed at the failure of the administration to "exercise the full statutory authority to conduct a complete investigation into the potential national security implications of this deal."

Also Thursday, administration officials said that weeks before Dubai Ports World sought U.S. approval for the deal, the UAE contributed $100 million to help victims of Hurricane Katrina.

The administration said there was no connection between the request for U.S. approval of the ports deal and the UAE's contribution.

The White House, which so far has gotten a total of $126 million in international donations, said the UAE's contribution shows the close relationship between the two governments.

The deal allowing Dubai Ports World to take over significant operations at ports from New York to Miami has created an embarrassing standoff between the president and a Congress controlled by his own party.

Raising concerns about national security in an era of terrorism, Republicans and Democrats alike are crafting legislation blocking or delaying the deal with an Arab country tied to some of the hijackers from Sept. 11, 2001. Bush had pledged earlier to veto such a measure.

Officials from the Homeland Security, Treasury, Defense and State departments appeared before Chairman John Warner, R-Va., and four Democratic members of the Senate Armed Services Committee for a briefing arranged while Congress was officially away from Washington.

The officials tried to assure the panel that the deal has been subject to a careful three-month review and that all security questions were satisfied. They said no one raised an issue that would have prompted the need for a further, 45-day investigation.

"We're not aware of a single national security concern raised recently that was not part of the three-month review," Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert Kimmitt told the lawmakers.

Democratic committee members accused officials of failing to take into account issues raised about the Arab country in the Sept. 11 commission's report.

Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, the top Democrat on the committee, derided the administration's "casual approach" in approving a deal involving a country "with an uneven record of battling terrorism."

Levin at one point noted that a special commission that investigated the Sept. 11 attacks found "a persistent counterterrorism problem represented by the United Arab Emirates."

"Just raise your hand if anybody at the witness table talked to the 9-11 commission," commanded Levin. There was no response from the administration's representatives.

White House Homeland Security adviser Frances Fragos Townsend said the UAE's cooperation in the fight against terrorism has changed since Sept. 11.

"They have been critical allies in Afghanistan," she told reporters at a news conference on a separate matter. "They have been critical allies in fighting the financial war against terror. They've been critical allies in terms of our military-to-military relationship."

Levin and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., accused the administration of ignoring a law that requires a longer review – an additional 45 days – if a proposed business deal could affect national security.

Kimmitt responded: "We didn't ignore the law. Concerns were raised. They were resolved."

Warner said he would ask Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to prepare a memorandum on the administration's interpretation of the law to see if it deviates from Congress's intent.

While Warner emphasized the UAE's cooperation in fighting terrorism, he questioned Kimmitt sharply on whether the reviewing agencies considered the Arab country's role in the transfer of money to al-Qaida and of nuclear components to suspect nations.

Kimmitt said those factors were taken into account.

Three Iraqi journalists killed

By Ziad Khalaf
Associated Press

SAMARRA, Iraq—The bodies of three Iraqi journalists, including a well-known correspondent for Al-Arabiya television, were found Thursday near Samarra, police and the network said.

Al-Arabiya's Atwar Bahjat and two colleagues from a local media company were covering the bombing Wednesday of a revered Shiite shrine. Their employers lost contact with them Wednesday night.

The bullet-riddled bodies of Bahjat, engineer Adnan Khairullah and cameraman Khalid Mahmoud were found Thursday morning near their vehicle, cameras and satellite dish on the outskirts of the city 60 miles north of Baghdad, police Capt. Laith Muhammad said.

Bahjat, who left Al-Jazeera television in December to join Al-Arabiya, was the seventh woman journalist killed since the start if the war in Iraq.

President Jalal Talabani's office called the killings "a criminal and cowardly act" in a statement that praised Bahjat and her colleagues as professional journalists who "never stopped defending the truth."

Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari ordered security authorities to find the killers.

The journalists had been reporting live Wednesday from the edge of Samarra, which was sealed off by security forces after the early morning explosion at the Askariya shrine, also known as the Golden Mosque.

The team was preparing to return to Kirkuk when two gunmen pulled up in pickup truck, shooting in the air and shouting "We want the correspondent!" according to a cameraman who evaded capture, Al-Arabiya reported.

The three were kidnapped and their bodies were found about six miles northeast of Samarra, police and Al-Arabiya said.

Press freedom group Reporters Without Borders expressed horror at the killings.

"We will never stop repeating that journalists are neutral and vital observers," the group said in a statement. "They are neither combatants nor targets to be shot down. Their work must be protected and respected, whatever their nationality and regardless of which media they work for."

Eighty-two journalists and media company employees have been killed since the start of the Iraq war in March 2003, including seven this year, according to Reporters Without Borders.

Al-Arabiya has had three other journalists killed since the start of the war.

In September 2004, correspondent Mazen al-Tumeizi was killed in downtown Baghdad when a U.S. helicopter opened fire.

In March of that year, correspondent Ali al-Khatib and cameraman Ali Abdel-Aziz were killed near a U.S. military checkpoint while covering the aftermath of a rocket attack on the Burj al-Hayat hotel in Baghdad.

Another Al-Arabiya corespondent, Jawad Kadhim, was injured last year when gunmen shot him in a failed attempt to kidnap him.

Local al-Iraqiya TV has been worst hit, with ten journalists and media workers murdered, Reporters Without Borders said

New fossil brings 'Jurassic' theory

By Randolph E. Schmid
Associated Press

WASHINGTON—The discovery of a furry, beaver-like animal that lived at the time of dinosaurs has overturned more than a century of scientific thinking about Jurassic mammals.

The find shows that the ecological role of mammals in the time of dinosaurs was far greater than previously thought, said Zhe-Xi Luo, curator of vertebrate paleontology at Carnegie Museum of Natural History in Pittsburgh.

The animal is the earliest swimming mammal to have been found and was the most primitive mammal to be preserved with fur, which is important to helping keep a constant body temperature, Luo said in a telephone interview.

For over a century, the stereotype of mammals living in that era has been of tiny, shrew-like creatures scurrying about in the underbrush trying to avoid the giant creatures that dominated the planet, Luo commented.

Now, a research team that included Luo has found that 164 million years ago, the newly discovered mammal with a flat, scaly tail like a beaver, vertebra like an otter and teeth like a seal was swimming in lakes and eating fish.

The team, led by Qiang Ji of the Chinese Academy of Geological Sciences in Beijing, discovered the remains in the Inner Mongolia region of China. They report their findings in Friday's issue of the journal Science.

Matthew Carrano, curator of dinosaurs at the Smithsonian's National Museum of Natural History, called the find "a big deal."

An important factor is how specialized the creature was, said Carrano, who was not part of the research group.

"It gives a hint that early mammals were not just these shadowy creatures at the time of dinosaurs" but were having their own evolution. There have been hints of such animals in the past but nothing equal to the remains found by Luo and colleagues, he said.

Thomas Martin of the Research Institute Senckenberg in Frankfurt, Germany, said the discovery pushes back the mammal conquest of the waters by more than 100 million years.

"This exciting fossil is a further jigsaw puzzle piece in a series of recent discoveries," commented Martin, who was not part of Luo's team.

It's the first evidence that some ancient mammals were semi-aquatic, indicating a greater diversification than previously thought, the researchers said.

Modern semi-aquatic mammals such as beavers and otters and aquatic mammals like whales did not appear until between 55 million years ago and 25 million years ago, according to the researchers.

The new animal is not related to modern beavers or otters but has features similar to them. Thus the researchers named it Castorocauda lutrasimilis. Castoro from the Latin for beaver, cauda for tail, lutra for river otter and similis meaning similar.

The researchers found imprints of the fur, both guard hairs and short, dense under fur that would have kept water from the skin.

Weighing in at between 1.1 and 1.7 pounds, about the size of a small female platypus, Castorocauda is also the largest known Jurassic early mammal.

The research was funded by the U.S. National Science Foundation, National Natural Science Foundation of China, Ministry of Science and Technology of China, Chinese Ministry of Land Resources, National Geographic Society and Carnegie Museum.

Government halts funding of abstinence-only program

By Jay Lindsay
Associated Press

BOSTON—A nationwide abstinence-only program that uses a silver ring to remind users to remain sexually pure has lost federal funding with the settlement of a lawsuit alleging it used the money for Christian evangelization.

The Silver Ring Thing, which presents its message though comedy skits and music, has received more than $1 million in federal funding during the past three years.

But it won't be eligible for more unless it changes its program to ensure the money isn't used for religious purposes, according to the agreement reached Wednesday between the American Civil Liberties Union and Department of Health and Human Services.

"Public funds were being used to fund a road show, really, to convert teens to Christianity," said Julie Sternberg, an ACLU attorney.

Sternberg said the ACLU supports the program's right to offer religious content, but not with taxpayer money. She added she hopes the lawsuit is a "wake-up call" to the federal government to more closely monitor the abstinence-only programs it funds.

Calls to Silver Ring Thing founder Denny Pattyn were not immediately returned.

An attorney for the organization, based in the Pittsburgh suburb of Moon Township, Pa., has said teens can chose between religious or secular programs and that the program's religious teachings have taken place separately from anything the government funds.

The ACLU claimed Pattyn openly talked about using abstinence education to bring teens to Christianity. In a 2003 interview with Agape Press, a conservative Christian news service, Pattyn was quoted as saying, "We don't ever want to take the gospel out of our message because we believe the power for abstinence is a changed heart, not a ring on a finger."

The Silver Ring Thing, founded in 1996, has taken its message all over the nation and abroad to Great Britain and South Africa. A tentative 2006 winter/spring schedule shows nearly 50 road dates, including Los Angeles, Houston and Boston.

Young people in attendance are given a silver ring and decide whether to pledge to abstain from sex. The ring then reminds them of the promise.

The ACLU suit, filed against the federal government in U.S. District Court in Boston in May, complained that the ring was inscribed with a Biblical verse which exhorts Christians to remain holy and refrain from sexual sin. It also alleged that group members testified how accepting Jesus improved their lives.

In August, the Department of Health and Human Services suspended funding for the program, citing concerns that "the federal project that is funded ...includes both secular and religious components that are not adequately separated."

The government terminated the grant effective Jan. 31. A call to a Health and Human Services spokesman Thursday was not immediately returned.

Under the settlement, which expires on September 2008, the Silver Ring Thing can reapply for federal funding for the upcoming fiscal year if it separates abstinence education from religious education, by doing such things as holding the programs at different dates, times or locations, and eliminating Bibles and other or religious materials from the federally-funded program.

It was unclear how much the Silver Ring Thing relied on federal funding for its operations. In an item in its December 2005 newsletter about the ACLU suit, the organization wrote, "The Silver Ring Thing will continue to rely on the Lord to provide and supply everything needed to continue proclaiming the Gospel of Jesus Christ."

Laughter indicative of social status, says study

By Michael Kay
Daily Californian (U. Berkeley)

BERKELEY, Calif.—Your posture, gestures and the direction of your gaze while laughing could all provide clues about your social status among your fellow laughers, according to preliminary research by University of California-Berkeley psychologists. The Laughter Project, conducted by the UC Berkeley Institute of Personality and Social Research, is examining laughter's role in acknowledging and asserting power in social relationships.

Using video recordings of University of Wisconsin-Madison fraternity brothers teasing each other in simulated situations, the 11-person Laughter Project team began by creating a list of 12 possible laugh types that occur in social interaction.

Next, every laugh on the tapes was assigned a score from one to seven in each of the 12 laugh type categories. Each laugh was also analyzed using eight channels of communications, including posture, gesture, acoustics and social context.

This was done in order to examine the behaviors associated with certain laugh types, the importance of roles — teaser vs. teasee — and the personality characteristics of the individuals in the study.

Three types of laughter that were most common emerged from the video analysis. Categories include dominant, submissive and forced laughter.

"We try to associate certain behaviors with certain laugh types," said Mary Liu, a fourth-year undergraduate in the UC Berkeley psychology department and Laugh Project coordinator. "What specific behaviors correlate with dominant laughter? What specific behaviors correlate with submissive and forced laughter?"

They used indicators ranging from the obvious, knee-slapping and puckered lips, to the esoteric, pitch modulation and spontaneity of the laugh.

"We try to code everything," Liu said. "That's why the coding process is very intensive."

But human behavior doesn't always lend itself to being classified. There are always other dynamics that one has to watch out for, according to Liu.

For example, researchers questioned whether the context of being teased produced submissive laughter, or if an individual's submission laughter is a reflection of a particular personality trait.

The team is trying to establish certain definitions for the most common laughter categories. Dominant laughter is used to assert authority in social situations, while submissive laughter is used to acknowledge the assertions of the dominant social actor. Forced laughter displays a desire to fit in.

Early analysis of the data has launched a handful of hypotheses. For instance, there seems to be a correlation between the use of one type of laugh and the likelihood of the use of another type. In other words, a consistently submissive laugher is less likely to laugh dominantly, but more prone to forced laughter.

Initial results also show that high-status and low-status groups — the long-time fraternity brothers vs. the newer members — laughed about the same total amount.

In order to expand their data set, the team is now coding the laughter of undergraduate couples from the University of Wisconsin-Madison. Liu expects to add other types of laughter to the three that emerged from the fraternity tapes.

Supreme court refuses censorship case

By Kaitlin Chase
Daily Texan (U. Texas)

AUSTIN, Texas—The U.S. Supreme Court rejected an appeal Tuesday by a student newspaper in Illinois against university administrators, upholding the right of administrators to censor public university newspapers throughout the Midwest. Student press advocates say the move infringes on the newspaper's First Amendment right to freedom of speech and threatens college papers everywhere.

Officials from the Illinois Attorney General's office counter that the case, Hosty v. Carter, isn't an issue of students' rights, but protects administrators from specific liability lawsuits.

The case was brought by journalism students at Governors State University against one of the school's deans, Patricia Carter, who censored the school's paper, The Innovator, after it published articles critical of the school, said Mark Goodman, executive director of the Student Press Law Center.

In June, the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which heard the case, ruled that administrators have the right to censor student newspapers based on a 1988 ruling in Hazelwood v. Kuhlmeier, which limited the freedom of speech afforded to high school journalists.

The ruling by the circuit court also prohibits censorship of student newspapers that are marked by the universities as "designated public forums," which are defined as an unrestricted space for free speech and debate, said Lance Speere, media advisor at Southern Illinois University and president of College Media Advisers, a professional association for advisers.

Gary Feinerman, the solicitor general with the Illinois Attorney General's office who represented Carter in the case, said the original ruling did not find Carter liable for financial damages because she didn't know the Hazelwood decision does not apply to college newspapers.

"At bottom, this case was decided based upon settled principles of qualified immunity," Feinerman said.

Officials at GSU declined to comment on the Hosty case and its implications on students' First Amendment rights.

Despite its extensive protections, freedom of speech is still limited, said Lino Graglia, a law professor.

"I think the University should be able to exercise some control over their funded publications," Graglia said. "The administration is able to censor anything — they can and they did."

Graglia added that it is a bad policy to take things out for criticizing the university.

By offering "no opinion" on the appeal, the Supreme Court lets the Hosty ruling remain in effect in the circuit court's jurisdiction, which includes Illinois, Indiana and Wisconsin, Goodman said.

Regardless of students' protection under a public forum status, the decision still threatens students' rights to freedom of speech.

John K. Wilson, founder of the self-described "academic freedom" Web site collegefreedom.org, said even though the Hosty decision applies only to students in Illinois, Indiana and Wisconsin, doubt over administrative authority to censor in one district allows officials to more easily violate the rights of students elsewhere.

"The mere creation of doubt in one circuit is enough to potentially threaten freedom of the press around the country," he said.

University of Texas officials require a professional adviser to read all Daily Texan content before it goes to print to check for libel and invasion of privacy. The practice, called "prior review," is designed to protect the University from lawsuits over the paper's content, said Texan editorial adviser Richard Finnell.

Finnell said in his 11 years at the Texan, the administration has never attempted to censor the newspaper.

The Texan is in the process of renegotiating its operating agreement with the University, a process that is expected to end prior review.

ABC cameraman leaves hospital

NEW YORK—ABC cameraman Doug Vogt, injured with anchorman Bob Woodruff in an Iraqi roadside bombing on Jan. 29, has checked out of Bethesda Medical Center, ABC News said Thursday.

Vogt and his wife, Vivian, are on their way home to France, where he will undergo further treatment.

In a statement, ABC News President David Westin described the couple as being "in good spirits and looking forward to getting back to their children."

The more seriously hurt Woodruff, recovering from head wounds and other injuries at the National Naval Medical Center in Bethesda, Md., is being slowly brought out of sedation, Westin said.

"Despite the fact that he continues to be mildly sedated, Bob has been out of bed in a chair and his physical strength continues to impress his entire team," Westin said. "We've come some distance, but we still have a long way to go."

Westin added that "in another sign of Bob's moving along his path to recovery," his doctors have said that in the next few weeks he might move to facilities near his home in the New York area.

ABC anchorman Bob Woodruff, who was injured in an Iraqi roadside bombing, has checked out of Bethesda Medical Center.

Charles Gibson and Diane Sawyer are currently subbing for Woodruff, co-anchor of ABC's "World News Tonight" with Elizabeth Vargas.

SGA and equal opportunity

Greg Collins

Recently the Student Government Association passed a motion that was brought to the UMass Board of Trustees, which ended up tabling the proposal until May. The motion mandated that administrators make an attempt to accept racial and ethnic minorities proportionate to the graduating high school classes in Massachusetts for that particular year.

One argument in favor of the motion is that it reflects the sentiments of our constituents. Any representative body has a duty to take into account carefully the views of its constituents. However, if UMass students are asked individually, out of the public eye, whether students should be admitted to the University based purely on academic and extracurricular credentials or whether more emphasis should be placed on the external characteristics of the applicant, I feel the overwhelming majority of them would favor the former. Even more so, the focus should be on what UMass Amherst can do to improve educational opportunity and to increase diversity of thought and outlook on campus.

The backers of this motion, in good faith, believe that the motion, if implemented, would improve educational opportunity. However, this proposed legislation exemplifies the tendency to identify a problem (in this case, what some perceive as a lack of educational opportunity and of racial and ethnic diversity on campus) and then diagnose a solution based on personal sentiments removed from real-world trends. It is this tendency that leads to flawed public policy decisions.

This motion and its backers confuse policy results with policy intentions. One intention of this proposal is to increase racial and ethnic diversity on campus, yet scant consideration is given to whether increasing such diversity promotes diversity of thought and outlook on campus. For example, if diversity is viewed as a way to promote an expansion of the worldviews of students, the SGA could vigorously support recruitment efforts to admit students, not just of all racial and ethnic backgrounds, but also of all religious and socioeconomic backgrounds from geographical areas currently underrepresented at the University.

At a public university, it is understandable that some may desire a more diverse student body in order to reflect the demographic trends of Massachusetts. But it is lazy thinking to merely associate the percentage of underrepresented groups with institutional discrimination. It also does no good to artificially set racial and ethnic goals without evaluating the percentage of minority applicants (not to mention majority applicants) who apply to UMass, and determining whether their academic and extracurricular records match up with the academic standards of the University. If the applications of blacks and Hispanics — two groups the SGA motion's supporters commonly cite who will be helped by the motion — do not match up, then SGA senators are on shaky ground to criticize the UMass administration for discriminatory policies, as many have done continuously while debating this motion. SGA senators would be on stronger ground if they supported efforts to improve elementary and secondary education in a manner that would provide opportunities to underrepresented groups to improve their academic qualifications.

SGA senators would be on stronger ground if they supported efforts to improve elementary and secondary education in a manner that would provide opportunities to underrepresented groups to improve their academic qualifications.

In this regard, racial and ethnic based affirmative action initiatives have performed poorly in the United States and worldwide in increasing the physical diversity and intellectual pursuance of academics among government designated groups.

There are possible programs and initiatives that encourage academic proficiency from historically underrepresented minorities at UMass. Outreach programs, as well as improvement and enforcement of academic standards in Massachusetts public high schools and elementary schools, will do more to improve this campus's racial and ethnic diversity than implementing motions similar to the one recently passed.

To address these issues, a motion urging the UMass Amherst administration to strengthen University public service programs and encourage University students to provide tutoring and mentoring services to low income Pioneer Valley elementary and secondary school students of all races would be beneficial. It would be a stepping stone to promote enforcement of academics among youths, so they will have the necessary skills and application credentials to be admitted into colleges.

Currently UMass is an affirmative action school because it already takes into consideration the socioeconomic background of students. Most likely it already makes an effort to consider the racial and ethnic makeup of applicants, and its administrators would be happy if these efforts led to increased diversity on campus based on how people look on the outside.

When discussing issues with respect to racial and ethnic minorities, oftentimes enough attention isn't paid to the opportunities denied at elementary and secondary school levels. Unfortunately, this is often due to the bigotry of neglect and low expectations.

Proposals such as the one described above would hopefully combat both these forms of bigotry. This would also help increase diversity of thought and the outlook on campus as well as the diversity of ethnic backgrounds, all the while maintaining UMass's academic standards.

Time to make our choice

Kevin Dooley

Having written four articles for the Collegian in a span of six weekdays, I must admit that the fuel is burning low on ideas for articles. Then I suddenly remembered where I could go to look for some inspiration, a guy who will always be there no matter what. God, of course, but as I will explain, God may not always be there for inspiration when I need him.

A couple of weeks ago, I was watching a story on the unbiased network Fox News, which was explaining how the Boy Scouts were under fire from the American Civil Liberties Union because the government is allowing the group to run some of their troops on government grounds. According to the ACLU, our government should not be allowing the Boy Scouts to use government land to conduct their activities because the Boy Scouts in their pledge say they have a duty to God. Yes, my friends, it has come to this state. The ACLU is now on a Boy Scouts crusade. Thankfully, though, those crusades aren't being led by Michael Jackson. He's just too easy.

The Boy Scouts are just one example of many instances where the ACLU, and people who claim they are looking out for our civil liberties, are trying to push God and religion out of our everyday lives. Now, this isn't going to be one of those articles that tell everyone to shape up because when they die they're going to meet their Creator up in the sky who will then proceed to open up a big book of your life and list all your sins.

The more important issue at hand is that those same people who run around in anger at the mention of God in the pledge of allegiance are the same ones who claim they're out to protect our civil liberties. I'm here to tell you they're the ones you should be most concerned about when trying to protect your freedom.

A few years ago, a courthouse in Alabama was forced, after a long battle with the ACLU, to take out a monument of the Ten Commandments. Those in the ACLU claim that the monument of the Ten Commandments in a government building is a clear violation of the separation of church and state. The ACLU says that the Ten Commandments promote religion in a public setting.

How are we ever going to find our peace of mind when we hear stories about a lunchroom monitor, who works at an elementary school, taking a six-year-old girl out of the lunchroom for saying a prayer before she ate her lunch?

I say let them put up a monument of the Holy Quran as well. In reality, all religions teach the same fundamental beliefs; they help us to live a better life and be at peace with ourselves. How are we ever going to find our peace of mind when we hear stories about a lunchroom monitor, who works at an elementary school, taking a six-year-old girl out of the lunchroom for saying a prayer before she ate her lunch?

The whole idea of separation of church and state is that our government cannot make a law that promotes one religion over another. I don't believe the framers of the Constitution would have supported going to a public school and having someone rip all the Santa Claus hats off of a bunch of first graders singing Christmas carols during a holiday show.

I believe America is facing a real identity crisis right now. MTV is allowed, under the first amendment, to put up images of rappers disgracing women and using them like sex objects. That's Ok, but we can't allow the Boy Scouts to use government land for their activities because then say they have a duty to God in their pledge.

Let's leave the Boy Scouts alone. They do more good than harm, unless you're still participating in them at the age of 18. As disgraceful as some music videos are, I would never advocate censoring them, because I don't believe in censorship. However, if you're going to let people be exposed to Marilyn Manson prancing around on television with artificial boobs, they should also be allowed to be influenced by something decent like God.

The last of the matter is, whether you decide to have God and religion as your initial guides in life, or if you decide on MTV and VH1 to be your saviors, you still have that choice. The people who are trying to press their God and their religion into all parts of our lives, or the ones like the ACLU who are trying to remove God from our lives faster than the people who were driving their new hybrid car on campus the other week, have made their choice ignorance.

Coping with everyday strife

Michael Toomey

A recent conversation with a friend, who happens to be a distressed social worker, addressed the infestation of the psychological field by people of stunted emotional intelligence (who sidestep their own internal woes to combat the struggles of others) when, in order to effectively help outside parties, a degree of internal stability is required.

This discussion brought forth, rather venomously on his part, a valid criticism of the personal stifling we do, which is perfectly exemplified by his example of callow, inexperienced psychology. I view the issue to be a more holistic one, however, with the discussed trend being a pretentious manifestation of a much bigger predicament at hand.

In this talk, my friend made repeated references to our general "look the other way" policy, specifically in dilemmas that challenge us personally: our identities. This is an astute observation considering that coping in this way is so universally operative, a sharp mind is necessary to not take it for granted.

There are countless messages which smugly suggest that diverting attention as far away from a problem as possible is undeniably the best course of action. A glaring display that jumps to mind is George W. Bush's sagely advice to Americans following those fateful terrorist attacks, which was to go to Disneyland.

There are countless messages which smugly suggest that diverting attention as far away from a problem as possible is undeniably the best course of action. A glaring display that jumps to mind is George W. Bush's sagely advice to Americans following those fateful terrorist attacks, which was to go to Disneyland.

While that's coming from someone who could be glibly titled the most powerful man in the world, there are millions more subtle cues to avoid looking deeply at what's really going on. Retail therapy is a relatively benign, widely practiced method of coping by which a person will stave off the insufferable hand they've been dealt that day by buying a nice pair of shoes.

Others still might prefer to sublimate our stresses by hitting the gym or playing sports. In and of themselves, there's nothing wrong with any of these activities, even going to Disneyland, but as parts of a larger, more complicated phenomenon, they still speak to a yet undefined fear.

You could easily extrapolate that we are fearful or have an aversion to all little things we might perceive to be threatening from the obvious tendencies we have. Without requiring much thought, it's clear that the potential harbingers of fear are innumerable to the point of being infinite. So, a good picture of what exactly we're running from becomes all the more hazy.

Some of us fear introspection, looking inside what we're really feeling, shaking hands with our ugliest notions and accepting exactly what's going on, socially acceptable or not. On the flipside are those terrified of extroversion, convinced that for concrete reasons their well-developed individuality is doomed to isolation, without any shelter in the outside world.

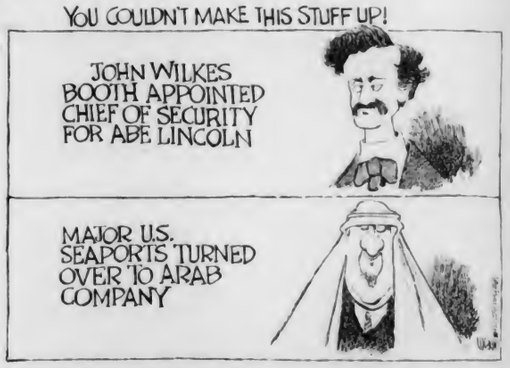
These two categories probably form the basis of most human anxieties, both resting on a general sense of insecurity, one group can't internally accept themselves, the other believes others won't be welcoming of who they are. So it almost seems as if we might justifiably point the finger at our enemy, insecurity. We still have almost no insight into why we are insecure.

The commerciality of America has seeped into our mindsets to the point where we believe, to varying extents, that every aspect of life can and should be improved. We learn to live our lives thinking that nothing is ever quite good enough, that we must keep plowing forward in all the realms of our being human.

If you take a look at the huge institutions of modern life, namely this emphasis on betterment and the elimination of worry, you'll notice a shocking polarity in our conceptions of the world. Life becomes an eternal battle between the ceaseless everythings we've stratified into good and bad. Every phenomenon we come to understand has been designated a right and wrong function, and each of those functions is divided like this ad infinitum.

So what, you say? This is just science describing how nature has unfolded, which perhaps is the most sensible practice we know of. What is the point of acknowledging the two halves that make up the universe?

Common sense says that deciding what parts of your environment will help or hurt you is an instinctive biological function. From this process the world around us begins to develop meaning by relating its many features to what we call ourselves. As some things are deemed to promote our well being, others will very well be classified as detrimental, which will eventually be grouped into uber-general categories, good and bad, respectively.



Where we as humans seem to stray from most species in making these sensible inductions is our inclination to over-generalize or over-apply our findings as objective truth. We learn that we are to strive openly for good things and squash any trace of bad without realizing that they are necessarily dependent on each other.

Present in a majority of our social events, from national governments to love affairs, most people seem to agree that getting as much pleasure as possible with little pain involved is optimal. It does seem, from a purely biological view, that we should be inclined toward experiences that are rewarding to an organism's survival, but it's quite strange that the human being should idolize this meaning of good and truly abhor even the thought of its opposite.

Perhaps the eccentric charm of the human is this mindset, where we believe, for better or worse, that through action we control or divert what happens to us, all for our benefit. We forget that we cannot appreciate benefit without detriment just as we cannot enjoy a sunrise without being enveloped in the darkness of night.

So while we might be wired to do things in a certain dread-filled, anxious way, spending much of our energy clinging desperately to our side of meaning, the secret might not be to tighten our grip, but something else entirely. What might be to our benefit goes against most of what we know, but we can only learn by letting go.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

TRUE LIFE: I'M SURROUNDED BY DRUNK PEOPLE

Puke in the sink, urine on the rolls of toilet paper, beer cans in the toilet, purposely clogged sinks to flood the floors, garbage in the showers – for people who don't spend their entire weekends drinking to oblivion, these issues are real problems. It's literally dangerous to walk into the bathroom at night on the weekends, wondering what you will step in. You don't have to go to the DC to find out what they are serving, just take a look in the sink of your dorm bathroom.

I was insulted and ashamed after reading Jonathan Klaucke's "Elders reduce freedoms they were afforded." While I read his opinions on drinking and the new alcohol policy, I couldn't help but think about my own experiences so far here at UMass. While I understand that underage and irresponsible drinking has become prevalent and acceptable in today's culture, the changes in the alcohol policy are most definitely not "discriminating and an embarrassment to our institution."

If anything, they are at least chipping into this epidemic of underage drinking. However, what was most insulting was Mr. Klaucke's statement "Beer pong, Kings and drinking in general help define our age group and society." For those of us who don't take part in these activities, this generalization is completely absurd and offensive.

When I chose to attend this University, I knew it was known for partying and drinking, but perhaps I was naive in thinking that on Thursday through Sunday, UMass dorms would be sanitary and safe. What angers me the most is not the beer pong games that go on, or alcohol in general, but rather the people in charge of assuring safety on campus don't take steps to really control this problem.

While it seems like a daunting task, I'm left to wonder why the authority figures of each building don't make checks on a weekly basis on the floors in which they know they are having the most problems. Meanwhile, I have to attend a meeting on a Tuesday night for two hours, instead of watching "American Idol" nonetheless, in order to be reprimanded and lectured. Well, what about the sober students? We are just as the untouchables were in Ancient Hindu society – overlooked, and invisible.

Passion beyond the Oscars

By Louis R. Carlozo
Chicago Tribune

With less than two weeks until the Oscars, you might expect some nominees are biting nails clean off the very fingers that long to grasp a golden statuette.

But as I've made the interview rounds, a different story has emerged. To paraphrase the finalists: An Oscar's nice if you can get it, but awards or peer recognition can't hold a candle to intrinsic rewards.

"You just do it for the love of the project and that's it," said Tim Burton, whose eponymous "Corpse Bride" is up for best animated feature. "There's no other way to think of it. ... Maybe people who have won awards think (another) way, but most people who are making things are doing it for the project, and you have to have that passion to do something, however misguided it may be."

Bobby Moresco, who's sharing a best screenplay nomination with Paul Haggis for "Crash," agrees.

"I don't think any artist can think like that," he said of awards obsession. "If you know something is going to be a success commercially and financially, why bother? Things like 'Crash' have always been uphill and that's the fun. If it's not hard, it's not worth it. Your knuckles have to be bleeding."

"I never came to Hollywood with an Oscar dream," said Josh Olson, also up for best screenplay honors for "A History of Violence." "I've wanted to be in movies since I was a kid, but I can't imagine you start a project thinking 'This is an Oscar project', and certainly not this story. It was a story that I wanted to tell. It got me up every morning, kept me from sleeping every night and that's it. And if I can communicate that passion I've lived with for months to an audience for 90 to 120 minutes, then that's (success)."

With "Tim Burton's Corpse Bride" (Warner Home Video, $28.98) and "Crash" (Lions Gate, $19.98) already on DVD and "A History of Violence" slated for a March 14 release (New Line Home Video, $28.98), we grabbed a few minutes with the creative minds behind each project.

Q "Corpse Bride" stays in the realm of old-school animation, which is almost unheard of these days. Why?

Burton: I just love the medium so much because it has such a tangible quality, seeing the work of Ray Harryhausen and the passion in it. With "Corpse Bride," I was looking for something emotional to do and the right story. And because it's going back to this old medium from the beginning of cinema, it feels more personal.

Q. You and actor Johnny Depp have this amazing, long-standing relationship. Is it more of an auto-pilot thing, or a situation where you continue to push and challenge each other?

Burton: We can communicate abstractly and it will all be fine, but at the same time be never feels that he wants to do the same thing, and that's what's great about him. There was even some resistance period where he'd be doing Willy Wonka during the day and "Corpse Bride" at night and he'd still be in his Willy Wonka outfit and be saying, "I'm still not sure what I'm going to do." And he'd nail it. I'm lucky to work with actors like that who are willing to let it fly.

Q. You have a reputation as this pop culture iconoclast who dismissed the "Batman" TV show and the original "Willie Wonka and the Chocolate Factory" film. How do you respond to that?

Burton: I don't really say those (kinds of) things. ... It sounds like it's coming from a third or fourth party. "Charlie and the Chocolate Factory" (up for a costume design Oscar) was an easy one for me, because it wasn't that we didn't like the other version of it, we just wanted to do our own thing. But the media likes to create "Johnny Depp vs. Gene Wilder" things. The fact is, Gene Wilder is amazing and Johnny is Johnny and that's two different things.

Q. Does it ever bother you that Paul Haggis has gotten much of the attention for "Crash" even though you co-wrote the film?

Moresco: That's unimportant. The critics have gotten it into a fashion where it's all about the director, but every artist I know understands that we live in a collaborative art. Only the critics and to a certain extent the audience don't understand that. But it's something we (in the business) live with.

Q. "Crash" is on one level a traditional drama, but also has garnered attention as an issue-oriented film. How does that strike you?

Moresco: Haggis and I started this thing alone in a room with a written page and we never thought anyone would finance it as a movie about racism in America. So I'm grateful, we're exploring racism from a human point of view.

Q. How does the creative process work once you start writing?

Olson: When I'm really banging away there are several stages. My outlines are very rough. I need to know the beginning, the middle, the end and what Bruce Springsteen album it should feel like! "Violence" was "Darkness on the Edge of Town." Once I've got that, I go to the script and I'm typing the thing, and it totally takes me over. I'll work for at least 3 or 4 hours a day, and I like to make sure I leave off with a scene that I can't wait to get back to. It's always there in my head, once I'm at that stage.

Q. With the success of "Violence," there is always the danger of getting pigeonholed. Is that ever a concern?

Olson: I love old film noir and Westerns and if you told me that I could have all the work I could handle doing those two genres, I'd be happy with that. I'm more interested in following that dark thematic path — call it "Springsteen noir" — and in characters with dirt pasts. Not that I have one of my own; I haven't killed too many men. These days, I'm meeting more and more people and it's getting harder to remember their names. So I keep wanting to manufacture a story that I was shot in the head when I was a kid, in a canyon. Then people would understand. "Oh, so that's why he doesn't remember my name."

Q. You've mentioned Springsteen a few times, which makes sense since you're from Philadelphia. Springsteen has talked about getting into acting, would you ever consider writing a screenplay for him?

Olson: That would be a dream. I remember walking out of a solo tour show and he's got such great presence. I've got a great music supervisor on "Until Gwen" (Olson's latest film, which he's writing and directing). It would be great to have him do a song or give us a song, for crying out loud. There's a father figure who's a storyteller with whimsy to him and a sense of darkness. It would be perfect for him. I'd love to be the guy to get him into movies.

All Stars give listeners taste of their Mississippi blues

By Walter Tunis
Knight Ridder Newspapers

It's a curious time for the North Mississippi All Stars, the earnest roots-music trio that proved hill country blues sounds just as sweet in cosmopolitan concert halls as it does in juke joints of the rural South.

This year, Luther Dickinson, brother Cody Dickinson and longtime pal Chris Chew celebrate 10 years as the All Stars. But as their visibility intensifies, aided last year by the release of what is arguably their strongest album, "Electric Blue Watermelon", pioneers of hill country have been passing away, one by one.

Guitarist and songwriter Junior Kimbrough died in early 1998. Famed fife-and-drum stylist Otha Turner (depicted as an angel on the cover of "Watermelon") died in 2003. Last September saw the departure of R.L. Burnside, a hill country singer so popular in the '90s that hip-hop producers regularly recorded remix albums of his music.

"We're seeing this huge chapter sort of close for us," Luther Dickinson said recently by phone. "We were so fortunate to come up during the '90s and experience their music like we did. It really shaped us."

"We had to miss Burnside's funeral. We were on tour. But I went to see his family before we left. I pulled into the Burnside place and Garry (Burnside's guitarist son) and Cedric (his grandson drummer) were there practicing and playing loud as hell. I mean, the whole place was resonating with this loud, unabating modern blues. And that really made me happy. Because that's how it used to be for people like R.L. and their music. Before they had the juke joints to play in, they just partied around the house."

Hearing the swampy, funky immediacy of hill country blues picked up by succeeding generations struck a personal chord. Dickinson's father is famed roots-music pianist and producer Jim Dickinson, who has collaborated on several All Stars recordings, including "Watermelon."

"I know how important the Burnsides, Junior and Otha, have been to our music," Dickinson said. "But my dad got to share some of the same sorts of experiences. He used to play with Sleepy John Estes, Bukka White and all the great bluesmen."

So on "Watermelon," I just tried to write as many songs as I could. Then I brought them in for him to help shape. Some of the songs dealt with the grooves he grew up with. Some were more about our band's thing. So we just bore down on the music and had a ball."

What resulted is a slide-happy adaptation of Charley Patton's "Mississippi Bollweevil" and the big beat chain gang sing-along "Bang Bang Lulu" that highlights the trio's giddy, percussive drive. Lucinda Williams provides summery harmonies to "Hurry Up Sunrise," Hustle and Flow rapper Al Kapone helps modernize the beat behind "No Mo," pedal steel guitar pioneer Robert Randolph gives extra kick to "Stompin' My Foot," and the Dirty Dozen Brass Band adds Crescent City street parade soul to "Horseshoe."

"I grew up loving all music, the Delta blues, the Chicago blues, the Memphis blues," Dickinson said. "But so much of the music gets tied to the past. I got turned on to hill country blues by going to a juke joint and hearing this little electric band playing modern country blues. And it was from Mississippi. Man, at the time, I didn't even know that music existed. I just knew at the time I wanted to play it."

"And it's all a celebration of life, you know? Especially onstage. It's that sort of urban troubadour lifestyle where you're able to live the dream of playing music every night."

Luther Dickinson, Chris Chew and Cody Dickinson form a trio that is a unique product of Mississippi folk.

Dillon rides high with roles that inspire and stir motivation

By Denis Hamill
New York Daily News

The New York actor calls from Los Angeles while driving to the Oscar nominee luncheon, still radiating heat from the Best Supporting Actor Oscar nod for "Crash."

"When I went to the 'Crash' premiere I left before they showed the scene of me pulling over Thandie Newton in the car," Matt Dillon says. "It was too disturbing. It's a character up there, but I still see me."

Dillon said he was afraid of the way people would look at him afterward.

"I didn't want to watch myself putting my hand up her dress, degrading her in such a vile way, playing such a racist cop," he says. "I wondered how people would respond to me on the street after playing that character. I just hoped I didn't get someone with an eccentric reaction."

Instead, Dillon says people have been delighted that the topic of racism is actually being addressed on film without a filter of political correctness, but in a blunt and honest way.

"Laurence Fishburne told me that he loved the scene with my character's father," says Dillon."That he could identify with it because it was a universal moment. I guess I knew then that instead of playing some cookie-cutter racist bad-guy cop I had discovered the humanity in a flawed man by approaching him from inside out."

But still, Dillon, 42, who has been acting since 1979 when he was discovered at high school in New Rochelle by a casting director, says he never expected an Academy Award nomination for his role in this ensemble film that no studio or independent production company wanted to finance.

"And yet here I am on the way to the Oscar nominees luncheon. And that's what's so great about this business," he says. "The little surprises. I never know what's gonna happen next. My last film was 'Herbie: Fully Loaded,' and I never saw that coming. But I had a ball making it and it made me a hero to my nieces and nephews who used to look at me like I was a monster because of my darker film roles.

"And if I thought for a minute that 'Crash' was one of those films with Oscar written all over it I probably wouldn't have done it.

"I thought it was an accurate depiction of a certain element of the LAPD. A racist cop with a chip on his shoulder. I knew about these aggressive types of cops not just from following the news but from my own personal experiences over the years in L.A. He's a guy who came out of a failed marriage, his father is dying, he can't get medical insurance to save him, he has a lot of bitterness, and he just got lost along the way. And the only time he feels in control is in uniform, where this basically powerless man is on a power trip."

One of the things that "Crash" proved once again is that movie audiences often have the exact opposite reaction to films about hot-button issues such as racism that timid studio executives do.

"There is this 'business' mentality," Dillon says, "where people are trying to hedge, trying to protect themselves, don't want to take chances. But often the films that have been rewarded are the films that take risks. So if I am going to do anything with the little bit of recognition an Oscar nomination brings, it will be to try to take more risks on worthwhile movie roles. I also have several projects in various stages of development that I want to direct and act in because they are good, gutsy stories with real characters."

Dillon says that many years ago when he committed to do "Drugstore Cowboy," he remembers going around with director Gus Van Sant trying to help cast good actors and actresses in the film and being told by protective agents and managers that there was no way to make a successful movie about drug addicts.

"It was the time when Nancy Reagan was saying, 'Just say no,'" Dillon says. "Nobody wanted to know about drugs. But I think 'Drugstore Cowboy' survives the test of time because it took chances. Same with ('Crash'). It is not the issue du jour, like terrorism. For that alone I got very excited."

He says for the same reasons he chooses to live in New York City instead of Los Angeles.

"To start with I have family in New York," says Dillon, a never married bachelor from a family of six kids who lives in a high-ceilinged upper West Side pad filled with a massive vinyl record collection of jazz and Latin music. "That's really important to me. But New York is also an endless well of inspiration. Ideas come to me in New York. I'm drawn toward reality, authenticity. I find that more in New York than anywhere."

Matt Dillon, the award-nominated star of 'Crash', speaks of more serious movies and roles in his cinematic future.

Author Harris depicts literary journey of self-loathing

By Jeff Guinn
Knight Ridder Newspapers

FORT WORTH, Texas — Three years ago, E. Lynn Harris had everything he thought he wanted.

One of the bestselling black authors in history, Harris drove a Mercedes, owned a mansion in Atlanta, had an apartment in Trump Tower and had carved out a prominent place in the Manhattan social scene. The former Dallas computer salesman who, not so long ago, only dreamed of getting published had now forged the way for other African-American writers to make bestseller lists with entertaining, sexy fiction that rivaled the best efforts of Danielle Steel and Sandra Brown.

Perhaps most satisfying of all, Harris was finally able to give his mother, who'd raised him in Little Rock while working as a maid and then in a factory, everything she could ever need.

But amid the accolades, Harris says, he lost his way. For the second time in his life he felt the onslaught of crippling depression, a condition that previously drove him to alcohol abuse and even an attempted suicide.

"When you experience entitlement for a while, you start to constantly expect it," Harris says, sipping bottled water in his hotel room during a recent visit to Dallas. "With some of the things I did, you'd think I was brought up by wealthy parents. One time in Atlanta I was at my place there, which is built on four levels. The air-conditioning in my bedroom went out. I called somebody to fix it and was told they couldn't get there for three days, and my reaction was, 'What? I'm E. Lynn Harris! I don't want to wait three days!'

"I got a suite at a fancy hotel when I had the rest of a big house still air-conditioned," Harris says, bemused. "And I was a kid raised with no air-conditioning, and in the summer when I tried to sleep I'd have the mosquitoes eating my ass. How ridiculous was I acting?"

After turning out about a book a year for a decade, Harris stepped away from the literary limelight. He needed a break, and a new perspective on life.

Little did he know he'd find it at his alma mater, the University of Arkansas.

When he was invited to spend a semester teaching writing and African-American literature in Fayetteville, he hesitated, then realized he had to try something different.

"I was at a difficult time in my life," Harris says now. "I had to get away from being a celebrity writer. I wasn't enjoying my success. I was in a bad place with my partner. We were breaking up after a seven-year relationship. I figured I'd rent an apartment in Fayetteville, have my classes, and be gone."

He ended up staying three years and is going back for a fourth.

Meanwhile, he'll hit the road in May to promote a new novel, re-energized and ready to reclaim his place as one of America's bestselling authors.

And he'll need that rediscovered optimism to face down critics who have characterized his writing as "smut" that degrades African-Americans. In January, Nick Chiles, the editor of Odyssey Colour magazine and co-author of the literary novel "A Love Story," wrote a New York Times commentary complaining of "smut ... being produced by and for my people, and it is called 'literature.'"

Neither Harris nor any other prominent black author was specifically identified by Chiles, but Harris realizes he's part of the group being criticized. (Kimberla Lawson Roby, Harris's friend and fellow bestselling black author of pop fiction, says she knows exactly why Chiles would complain: "He didn't sell as many books as he hoped to. What other reason could there be?")

"I know I write to entertain," Harris says, exchanging his usual broad smile for a grimace. "But I get people to reading, and that's better than not reading at all. I don't know why people would let that bother them."

Harris says he knows who to thank for his new, relaxed outlook on life and fame.

"I owe it to my kids," he says, referring to his UA students and the members of the school's cheerleading squads, which he has helped coach. (When Harris matriculated at UA from 1976-79, he was one of the first black cheerleaders in the old Southwest Conference).

Everette Lynn Harris was no stranger to depression in fall 2003 when he drove his Mercedes convertible from Atlanta to Fayetteville. In "What Becomes of the Brokenhearted," his memoir published the previous year, he included a description of a 1990 suicide attempt. In the hospital after surviving the overdose of sleeping pills, he faced the facts.

Though Harris earned a six-figure income, he hated his professional life in computer sales. "Self-destructive behavior," mostly alcohol-related, was wrecking his health. He had pretended long enough to be, as he put it, "the perfect black boy," and decided he would openly identify himself as gay.

And he would pursue his dream of being an author.

In 1991, Harris self-published his novel "Secret Life" after being spurned by publishers leery of its gay characters. Unencumbered by job responsibilities — he'd left corporate life behind and was living off his savings — Harris peddled the book in every independent, black-owned bookstore he could find.

A copy found its way to Anchor Books in New York City, which offered to publish "Secret Life" in paperback. Its national sales success convinced hardcover publishing giant Doubleday to offer Harris a modest contract for more novels.

"Just As I Am" sold respectably, and Harris' third novel, "This Too Shall Pass," hit the New York Times bestseller list.

It made Harris rich — and a hero to a whole new generation of black writers.

During the early to mid-'90s, Harris and Terry McMillan ("Waiting to Exhale") were among the few black writers to regularly make bestseller lists as crafters of "pop" fiction. Literary works by African-American luminaries such as Toni Morrison, Richard Wright and James Baldwin were assigned in college classes; Harris' racy escapist fiction was what fans crammed into their carryalls for a weekend away.

"That was an important step," says Somyrea Tate, editor of The Washington Informer, a District of Columbia publication that focuses on African-American issues and artists. "It helped open doors for writers like me, when I was able to get my first book published in 1996. He proved a black author who could tell good stories could succeed, and that set such an important example."

Harris became a mentor to younger authors — Travis Hunter and Roby, among others, describe him as a friend and confidant.

"He felt responsibility to others as well as himself," says Tate. "And though he was open about his own life, his books did not just cater to the gay and lesbian crowd."

"I'm writing about people and the way they act and feel," Harris says. "That cuts across race and sexual orientation."

A few days into his tenure in Fayetteville, he got a call from an assistant athletic director who wanted to know if Harris might be willing to put his cheerleading expertise to use and assist the coach of the current squad.

Gluttily, Harris accepted. He was still feeling depressed, but at least coaching would be better than moping around his apartment, he figured.

Now in February 2006, Harris is counting the days until he returns to the college campus for his fourth fall semester. He'll teach — joyfully — and he'll coach the cheerleaders through one more season.

To them, he's Coach E., close friend to all and second father to many.

"It's been freeing for me to find these young people accepting me, embracing me, because of who I am," Harris says. "I wasn't putting on any act. I wasn't separated from everybody else in a fancy apartment. We were all together all the time, just enjoying each other."

Harris has caught the writing bug again. Because he's relaxed, story ideas are flowing.

During his Fayetteville sojourn, he's not only completed "I Say A Little Prayer" but a second novel as well. It's ready for the editors at Doubleday, and Harris is already planning his next tale.

Critic Paglia takes on poetry

By John Mark Eberhart
Knight Ridder Newspapers

OK, so she's really smart. But Camille Paglia brooks no B.S.

Yes, she's a scholar; she earned her doctorate in English at Yale. Yes, she's an academic, a professor of humanities and media studies at the University of the Arts in Philadelphia. And, yes, the author of "Sexual Personae" and four other books is a feminist.

But you won't often catch her defending today's scholars, academics and feminists. She thinks too many of today's female writers "whine about men or wallow in personal traumas." As for professorial types and literary critics, she vilifies any and all who would try to turn the arts into some sort of elitist, exclusive puzzle instead of doing what she sees as her mission: striving to share the thrill of discovery with the masses.

"I'm an evangelist for art," Paglia says, and that's a great description of her stance in her newest book, the national best-seller "Break, Blow, Burn," which was released in paperback last month. The subtitle explains what she's up to: "Camille Paglia Reads Forty-Three of the World's Best Poems." Make that "reads and analyzes." Paglia takes a classic approach, printing each poem (the selections include works by William Shakespeare and Sylvia Plath), then offering a few pages for each in which she helps the reader with explanations and interpretations.

In an e-mail interview with the Kansas City Star, she offered some insights on the book:

Q. Rather than offer the broadest approach, which would be to include just one poem from each poet, "Break, Blow, Burn" takes a deeper measure: Three poems each from the likes of Dickinson and John Donne, two each from William Blake and William Wordsworth, one from some of the later poets. Why did you decide to proceed that way?

A. Each poem in this book competed against thousands of other possible poems ... I made no decisions based on the fame of the author, only on the quality of the poem and its accessibility to the general reader. Many of these poems have proved highly successful for me over three decades of classroom experience. They've been selected to appeal to readers who may not have looked at a poem since college. One thing that's not there is the kind of contorted, pretentious postmodernism that's the toast of the Ivy League these days. Merciful Minerva, do I loathe that crap!

Q. A poem must retain some of its mystery if it is to continue to function for us on subsequent readings. For that reason, some argue that "explication of text," as you call it, can be harmful. What is your reaction to that?

A. Any critic who says that explicating a text is harmful should have his or her credentials revoked ... (We can't hear too much about any work of art. I have written that great works always retain their mystery. "Hamlet," for example, changes every time we return to it. Because inspiration wells up from the dream life, artists themselves don't fully comprehend the magnitude of what they have done. The problem with most contemporary literary criticism is that it knows how to trash but not how to appreciate. As a disciple of Oscar Wilde, I'm an evangelist for art. If the humanities are to survive or prove worthy of public funding, we've got to get the enthusiasts back into academe.

Q. In a 2005 Publishers Weekly article, Amy Boaz writes that you are "very concerned about America's hostility toward the fine arts." You also state in that article that it's "the critic's obligation to help art be understood by the mass audience." But many people in this country don't care about the arts, do they?

A. The arts have never taken deep root in America, which has always been a practical, commercial, action-oriented culture. The New England Puritans (whose descendants founded our first universities) were ideologically opposed to beauty, ornament and pleasure. I strongly believe that literary critics should be writing for the general audience and not for each other. ... Art belongs to all of humanity, not simply to an elite coterie. That there is an interested audience out there for art and ideas is suggested by the fact that "Break, Blow, Burn" is my fourth national best-seller in 15 years. I find few academic critics worth reading these days. I listen to talk radio instead, where the people speak!

Q. In "The Western Canon," your old thesis adviser, Yale's Harold Bloom, praised Emily Dickinson for her "startling intellectual complexity." I know, from the fact that you did your senior thesis on her and from your inclusion of her poems in this book, that you value her. Why do you think she is so compelling?

A. Dickinson's genius for condensation is staggering. She can get the whole cosmos into two tiny stanzas. She didn't just whine about men or wallow in personal traumas. ... She was a true intellectual who meditated on the major problems of human existence ... Her poetry is an education in writing: She shows how to exert maximum force in minimum space.

Q. Much has been made of your chance of Joni Mitchell's "Woodstock," a song lyric, for this book. What struck me, though, was the similarity of themes between Mitchell's verses and Langston Hughes' "Jazzonia." Both works ponder the power but also the struggle of creating art.

A. It was certainly polemical to begin the book with Shakespeare and end it with Joni Mitchell. Popular culture has overwhelmed the traditional high arts over the past century. I argue that T.S. Eliot's canonical modern poem, "The Waste Land," was totally wrong about the disintegration and collapse of Western culture. Hughes' ecstatic "Jazzonia," written at exactly the same moment, shows the rebirth of art in new, brazen form: Jazz and Hollywood would become America's world-conquering exports.

Casa Dominicana turns thirteen

By Eva Piccozzi
Collegian Staff

On Saturday, Feb. 25 in the Union Ballroom, Casa Dominicana will celebrate Dominican Republic Independence Day with live cultural performances and authentic Dominican food.

Casa Dominicana has been a Registered Student Organization since 1992 and is dedicated to the education and empowerment of Latinos.

"We try to promote education of our history. Our organization is not just for Dominicans, its open to anyone who is interested in Dominican culture and history," said Elizabeth Ruiz, Casa Dominicana Treasurer and coordinator of the Dominican Independence event. "This is the fourth of July for Dominicans," said Ruiz.

The Dominican Republic, located on the island of Hispaniola, declared its independence in 1821, however, it was immediately occupied by Haiti. It finally gained total independence on Feb. 27, 1844, and became the Dominican Republic.

Saturday's cultural event, "A Tribute to Our Founding Fathers," will be the 181st annual Independence Day celebration sponsored by Casa Dominicana at UMass.

"It's a way for us to express who we are not only as an organization but as Dominicans," said Ruiz.

Previous cultural events orchestrated by Casa Dominicana include "Tropical Rhythm," which took place on Feb. 11, 2006, and featured dance performances, food and an open dance floor.

Since 1994, Casa Dominicana has collaborated with the Haitian American Student Association (HASA) for an annual Carnaval Cultural Night. Last November, the event centered on the cultural systems that have affected Haitian-Dominican relations in the United States and the respective island, as well as the common bonds between Haiti and the Dominican Republic.

"There is a lot of animosity back on the island (Hispaniola) and we are just trying to show that over here we are not very different from one another and that one island can mean one love," said Ruiz.

Casa Dominicana will be part of the 5 college event, Pa Unic, scheduled for April 1. This event will be about promoting education for Latinos and future opportunities for college and graduate school," said Ruiz.

Dominican Independence night will begin at 7 p.m. with highlighted live performances by Ramon Rigo Rigo, a Salsa and Merengue group from Lawrence, Mass. UMass Hava Tuni hip-hop dance team and Cuvena Edward Martinez from the Dominican Consulate will be speaking about the history of the Dominican revolution and its independence. Various Dominican food will be provided by Fernandez Family Restaurant from Holyoke. DJ Andres Cruz will be playing Hip-Hop, Salsa, Bachata and Merengue for open dancing until 2 a.m.

"This is an open to all event and just for Latinos. It's going to be an good food and a lot of fun," said Ruiz.

This is a semi-formal event. Admission is $8 for 5-College students with an ID. General Admission is $10.

Home stretch for UM

has been presented with some challenges that I don't necessarily know that we were ready for or were good enough to overcome this year.

"We have to stay positive and be realistic with what our team is presented with," he continued. "This is a year where we're really learning a lot about ourselves and about the system, and hopefully it will make us better in the future."

While UMass has not gotten many breaks throughout the season, Ford still believes his team poses a threat in the Atlantic 10 Tournament, which begins on March 8 in Cincinnati. The Minutemen are currently tied for eighth place in the bunched up A-10 standings, and Ford knows it will be important for his team to build some momentum heading into the wide open tournament.

"You want to be playing well going into the tournament," Ford said. "That's what it's all about, especially when you're in the position we're in — right in the middle of the pack. We've shown that we can compete with any of these teams. The top three teams in this league [George Washington, Charlotte and St. Louis] have beaten us by a combined six points."

Tomorrow's game should offer a considerable home court advantage for the Minutemen, who are 8-2 at Mullins Center this year, as a large crowd is expected to be on hand for the dedication of the court to the late Jack Leaman.

UMass coach Travis Ford leads the Minutemen towards the Atlantic 10 tournament which starts on March 8.

the legendary UMass coach and broadcaster.

"Hopefully there will be a lot of fans here and it will be a great day to honor Jack Leaman and his family," Ford said. "Hopefully it will just be an overall great day and we finish it up with a win."

Cahoon says goodbye to four seniors and two prolific scorers notched his second of the night on an empty net to put UMass away in the third.

"Last time we really didn't compete as well as we'd liked to have," Anderson said. "We're going in there with a little bit of a chip on our shoulders because we walked out of that weekend pretty embarrassed about what happened there."

In that game the Minutemen were without Werner due to illness and freshman Alex Berry left the game early with a leg injury. The absence of Werner especially hurt the team because he has had the most success against the Huskies of anybody on UMass. In nine career games against NU Werner has 10 points on four goals and six assists.

"We weren't full guns I remember," Anderson said of the Werner's absence. "Obviously with Stevie back in its going to be a huge help. Anytime you lose your captain, a senior leader like that, it's a big deal." Anderson also commented on how the Minutemen can't look past the Huskies because of their record. UMass currently sits in seventh place in the conference standings in the middle of a playoff race with UMass-Lowell nipping at their heels.

"The rest of the way every game is a playoff game," Anderson said. "Every night we're going to play a good team, it's just the nature of our league.

"Every game since Christmas has been pretty much a playoff game. There are no easy games from here on in, no matter who we're playing."

Senior captain Stephen Werner is fourth on the UMass all-time scoring chart. He led the Minutemen in scoring in the last two seasons.

NOTES Degon has been heralded as one of the best defensemen in the league over the past few years. His 20 points this season are good for the second best among blue liners in the conference.

For the past four years Winer has been the anchor to the Maroon and White outmanning core. He holds 10 season and career records from his time spent in Amherst.

Not enough can be said of what Werner has meant to UMass since he entered the program as a freshman in 2002. Leading the team in scoring for the past two seasons, he ranks fourth on the UMass all-time scoring list.

Although he has had a relatively quiet offensive career in Amherst, Solon is thought to be one of the best defensive forwards on the UMass roster. His six goals this season constitute a career high.

Thomas continues to adjust

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

Junior Brandon Thomas entered this season with high expectations.

No one knew what his role was going to be as a Minuteman, but Ford knew he was a versatile player. Thomas responded in the first four games, leading many to believe that Ford discovered a diamond in the rough. Thomas dropped 12 points against Davidson on Nov. 22, then roughed up UAB with 22 points in a dominating performance; after a 15-point performance against Savannah State, things went downhill for the junior transfer.

He scored in double-digits only twice between Dec. 8 and Feb. 12. But last week, he scored seven points in the first nine minutes against Florida State, and scorched GW with a fast start, finishing the game with 13 points. The difference? No longer is Thomas saddled with point guard duty, and Ford moved him to the starting lineup before game at Florida State. Thomas responded.

"[Starting] makes me feel like coach has confidence in me," Thomas said. "I guess I was lacking confidence for a stretch there, and confidence is everything when you're talking about putting the ball in the basket."

Thomas commented on his stint running the point. "It was tough. I think it'll help me in the future. Maybe it didn't help me as far as scoring, it hurt me a little bit. I think it helped my progression as a player and it will definitely help in the long run as far as handling the basketball. Teams are starting to pressure us more knowing that C-Lowe [Chris Lowe] is our only point guard. As far as next year and going into the playoffs, I know I needed that and the team needed that."

Thomas on coming out of his slump: "I've been in a slump. I don't think I'm out of that slump yet. I'm definitely progressing as a player, my confidence is growing and hopefully it will get to that point where I can be a really good overall player that can contribute to us winning.

"I'm used to being the type of player that can do all kinds of things and not struggle too much like I have been. You hit the wall and I fell asleep on the wall, somebody slapped me and now I'm starting to wake up a little bit. It feels good, it definitely does."

Ford shared his thoughts on the Thomas' slump and his progression throughout the season. "I think it is a lot psychological, there's no question — especially for a player that has been sitting out a year. He started the season off playing what he thought was well and what everybody else thought was well, where I really saw a lot of things that he needed to improve on. He's just playing with more energy right now. Sitting back and watching for a week or so can sometimes make you a lot hungrier and that's what happened there.

Ford on the expectations Thomas faced to start the season. "He's not a scorer. That was the problem we had was that he's not a scorer. His strength is he's 6-foot-6. I told him, it's a bad comparison, but he's like Magic Johnson; he can handle the ball, can pass when he wants to. It took him a little while to understand his strength and weaknesses at this level, and he's still going through it, but I don't look at Brandon Thomas and say he's a scorer."

Travis Ford called Brandon Thomas the "most versatile player on the team." The junior forward has played several positions for Ford this season.

Senior Jamie Solon has the highest shooting percentage on the Minuteman squad this season, and already surpassed his season-high for goals.

Junior Brandon Thomas is averaging 6.2 points per game this season, and has shared point guard duties with freshman Chris Lowe.

Cohen strives for ultimate prize

By Barry Wilner
Associated Press

TURIN, Italy – Shizuka Arakawa skated off with Japan's first medal of these Olympics – a gold in the showcase event.

What a way to end a shutout.

The 2004 world champion stunned favorites Sasha Cohen of the United States and Irina Slutskaya of Russia to claim figure skating's biggest prize Thursday night.

Arakawa did it with an elegance and technical brilliance that even had two-time Olympic winner Katarina Witt standing and applauding before the Japanese skater was done. Cohen fell twice and finished with a silver; Slutskaya fell once and took bronze.

The Japanese team has struggled in the mountains and on the ice in Turin. But Arakawa, third after the short program and a mere .71 points behind Cohen, was magnificent. Her spectacular spirals thrilled the crowd and, more importantly, impressed the judges.

She was emotionless for most of her breathtaking four-minute routine, then broke into a smile that only got bigger when scores were flashed. When her personal best of 125.32 points for the free skate were displayed, she flashed a "V" for victory sign then pumped her fist when she moved into first place with 191.34 points.

Cohen had already flubbed her first two jumps – and her shot at gold. That left Slutskaya, a two-time world champion and 2002 Olympic silver medalist. She lacked sparkle in her free skate and the fall ended any chance she had.

That ended Russia's hopes for an unprecedented sweep of the gold after taking the men's, pairs and ice dancing titles.

Arakawa, 24, became the first Japanese Olympic gold medalist in figure skating and just the second with any medal; Midori Ito, one of Arakawa's idols, won silver behind Kristi Yamaguchi in 1992. Ito led the cheers of the flag-waving Japanese in the crowd.

Cohen's history of flopping in the biggest international events bit her again.

Even her first U.S. title last month came with some questions because nine-time champion Michelle Kwan was sidelined. She also collapsed in the 2003 and 2004 national championships that went to Kwan, and the 2004 worlds won by Arakawa.

Not to mention the Salt Lake City Olympics, where she faded from third after the short program and Sarah Hughes soared from fourth to the top.

Emily Hughes, Sarah's 17-year-old sister, fell on a triple loop and shortened another jump, but her seventh-place finish was remarkable for a newcomer.

"I am really excited about what happened, this being my first Olympics and my first big international. I am taking away a lot from this competition," said Hughes, who replaced the injured Kwan and arrived in Turin just a week before the free skate.

The other American, 16-year-old Kimmie Meissner, wound up sixth, one spot down from her standing after the short program.

New book shatters old myths

By Mark Pratt
Associated Press

BOSTON – Dig, story has been repeated for decades. It perhaps reached its peak during the 2004 playoffs when the Boston Red Sox vanquished their longtime antagonists, the New York Yankees, and went on the sweep the St. Louis Cardinals to win their first World Series in 86 years.

It goes something like this:

Red Sox owner Harry Frazee sold his best player, Babe Ruth, to the Yankees in 1920 because he needed the money to finance a Broadway musical, "No, No Nanette."

As a result of the deal, the Yankees became baseball's dominant and most storied team, winning 26 championships in the next 81 years. The Red Sox, shackled by the Curse of the Bambino, became baseball's lovable losers, reaching the World Series every decade or so, only to find some bizarre and heartbreaking way to lose.

The problem is, it's not true.

At least according to a new book by Michael Kun and Howard Bloom, "The Baseball Encyclopedia," a series of short vignettes that challenges some of the myths of the game, and offers some humorous and often controversial opinions.

The authors pontificate on the worst team nickname in the major leagues, and the worst uniforms in baseball history. They argue over whether Nolan Ryan and Cal Ripken Jr. should be considered "great" players.

Some readers might not like their opinions, but that's the point.

"People are supposed to read it, maybe learn a little bit, maybe have a chuckle, and then have an interesting conversation," said Bloom, who grew up in Massachusetts as a Red Sox fan and currently lives in Needham. "If that's what we do, we've accomplished our purpose."

Kun, who lives in Los Angeles, but who spent part of his youth growing up in Barrington, R.I., where he became a Red Sox fan, authored the chapter on the sale of Ruth to the Yankees.

Frazee did not need money to finance his Broadway musical, Kun said. He was already a wealthy man and a successful Broadway producer. "No, No Nanette" had not even been written at the time of the deal, and would not debut for another five years.

Rather, Frazee simply did not like Ruth and wanted him off the team. Ruth had become a distraction with his demands for more money, his wild behavior and his disputes with management.

Newspaper articles at the time never mentioned the Broadway aspect of the transaction.

Still, Kun concludes that no matter what the reasoning for the deal, it was a poor decision on the part of the Red Sox.

The authors, both labor lawyers for the same firm, also take aim at those fans who take baseball, and sports in general, too seriously.

"One of things I've always found is how some people take it far too seriously, and it plays too big a role in their lives, and when I hear baseball fans say baseball is a metaphor and helps us define human experience, I am puzzled by that," said Kun, who is a published novelist.

Each of the authors has a favorite chapter. For Kun, it is the chapter on the Babe Ruth candy bar. Conventional wisdom holds that the candy bar was not named after Babe Ruth, the baseball player, but after Ruth Cleveland, the infant daughter of President Grover Cleveland.

Carnival season ends for UM

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

With the 2006 Carnival season over, the Massachusetts ski team is looking ahead to the Eastern Collegiate Ski Conference regionals this weekend at Waterville Valley, N.H.

UMass will be one of five teams representing the MacConnell division and will be joined by the five best squads from both the McBrine and Thompson divisions.

Skiers will compete in the slalom and giant slalom events, as they have throughout the carnival season. The giant slalom will take place on Saturday, followed by the slalom on Sunday.

Last weekend the Maroon and White capped off the 2006 Carnival season at the Colby-Sawyer and St. Anslem's Carnivals. The men took consecutive second-place finishes in the Colby giant slalom and St. Anslem's slalom, while the women placed first and third in the giant slalom and slalom, respectively.

UMass finished the season as the only school with both the men's and women's teams in the top-3 of the conference standings. The men finished third behind Colby-Sawyer and Plymouth State, while the women finished in second, just one point behind first-place Boston College.

Like last year, both the men's and women's teams have earned berths to this year's regionals. The ski teams are gunning for another sweep of the regional championships.

In 2005, the men swept the ECSC regionals, taking first in both the slalom and giant slalom behind the same duo they hope will lead them this year.

Junior Rush Hawkins finished first overall in last year's regionals in both events, while sophomore Jason Small placed fifth in the slalom and second in the giant slalom.

Meanwhile, sophomore Eliza Hawkins led the women to a pair of second-place finishes en route to their own regional championship. Hawkins placed first overall in the giant slalom and third in the slalom.

With such impressive performances all around last year, UMass has left itself a touch act to follow.

"Our three best skiers are the same as last year, so I think we can only do better," Small said of the men's group.

Unlike the Carnivals, where the men's division scores the top five skiers for each school, the regional competitions use the NCAA scoring rules, which take the best three of five skiers for the men. The women will continue to take the best three, as they have for every event.

Nearly all of last year's key contributors are returning for this year's event. Joining the Hawkins siblings and Small are seniors Pat Bachant and Patrick Hofer for the men, and seniors Lisbet Rauh and Shaleighne Collins for the women.

Caitlin Doughty is the only top skier from last year's regionals not returning to Waterville this year. Doughty suffered a season-ending knee injury several weeks ago at the Brown Carnival.

In addition to the ECSC regionals, three skiers from both the men's and women's squads were invited to compete at the NCAA Division I regionals. Small, Hawkins and Bachant for the men, and Hawkins, Rauh and Collins for the women, all finished in the top-15 of the ECSC individual rankings.

That earned them the chance to compete against Division I competition.

The NCAA slalom will take place on Friday in Middlebury, Vt. The team will then travel to the ECSC regionals following the event. Because the NCAA giant slalom takes place Saturday, UMass's best skiers will miss the event.

"It's unfortunate that we can't [compete in both events], but our own division takes priority over the [NCAA events]," UMass coach Justin Rouleau said.

The Maroon and White's next event will be the United States Collegiate Ski Association Nationals, which start Sunday, March 5.

Solid performance from Mass runners

By Domenic Poli
Collegian Staff

With just over one week left before the ECAC Championships, the Massachusetts track and field teams head to Boston for the New England Championships this weekend.

All of the events will take place over the course of Friday and Saturday.

Only for athletes who qualified, the meet will be honored with the presence of 26 UMass athletes, 22 from the men's team and four from the women's.

The girls would have had another representative in Dionise Miranda, however the freshman sprinter badly pulled her hamstring at the Atlantic 10 Championships last week. The injury took her out of contention for the remainder of the season.

As far as the men are concerned, UMass coach Ken O'Brien expects the athletes who have performed top-notch throughout the season will rise up in unison with the significance of the meet.

Fifth-year senior Jon Korhonen has excelled in the mile all season long. He broke the UMass indoor record, set by Paul Beaulieu in 1981, with a time of 4:04.26. This feat won him the honor of UMass Dunn Bros. Athlete of the Week.

"Right now he's the fastest miler in New England and hopefully he is going to be able to run really well that evening," O'Brien said.

Senior Andy McCarron, whom his coach calls a great team leader, has done exceptionally well in the 5,000-meter event. He ran a season-best of 14:54.49 at the Boston University Valentine Invitational, but O'Brien said that his best race is yet to come.

O'Brien was enthusiastic about McCarron's upcoming race with the great runners from Rhode Island, the other school participating in the competition.

"Hopefully he can finish somewhere in the top-6," O'Brien said.

In addition to so many talented runners, the Minutemen will also send a few field athletes to Boston, like sophomore shot-putter Sean Caliechio.

An outstanding offensive lineman for the UMass football team, Caliechio recently chucked the fourth-longest throw in school history with a mark of 52 feet, 11.50 inches.

Though plagued with an injury to his throwing wrist, he exploded onto the scene and delivered two excellent throws. The mere two throws, however, were good enough to qualify him for the meet.

O'Brien commented that he expects Caliechio also to provide a season-best performance.

As for the women, they will be sending their four dominant athletes to Boston.

The four girls representing the Maroon and White will be freshman Jordan Veney, senior Elisabeth Budd and sophomores Christina DeRosa and Kristen Bakanowski.

Veney, a shot-putter, has broken the UMass women's indoor record three times this season, but the New England Championships' wide range of extraordinary throwers will prove to be a difficult challenge.

"She's going to have some outstanding competition," UMass coach Julie LaFreniere said, citing specifically Zara Northover of Northeastern University and Amanda Martin of UConn.

Budd, a sprinter, was second overall at the meet last year. Despite battling a chest cold all week, she has a great chance of taking first this weekend, according to LaFreniere.

Both of the second year students, DeRosa and Bakanowski are also sure to continue their excellence in their respective events.

DeRosa is a long distance specialist and has season-best of 10:03.16 in the 3,000-meter race. Her coach, however, expects her to surpass that time.

"I think she's very capable of breaking 10 minutes," LaFreniere said.

Bakanowski, described as "an outstanding pole-vaulter" for UMass, is currently ranked third. LaFreniere said that catching Northeastern's Laura Chmielewski, who has cleared 13 feet this season, will be a difficult, but achievable, task. In fact, she added that there is a chance Bakanowski could set a new UMass record.

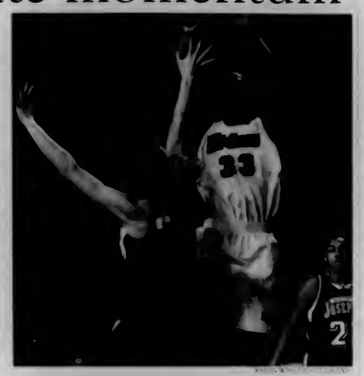
67-60 win over St. Bonaventure.

"Sometimes we're unprepared coming out, which I'm not happy with. But the kids are much more confident, and they understand what we're trying to do. They were able to withstand some harsh criticism at times in order to learn."

The Minutewomen would like to head into Philadelphia with some momentum and with a better seed, so defeating La Salle for a second time is a top priority. But in order to do this, they must shut down junior Crista Ricketts.



Ricketts leads the Explorers in scoring, and is 10th in the A-10 with 13.7 points per game. She also ranks 13th in the conference in rebounding with 6.6 boards per contest. Ricketts has also distinguished herself as one of the top players in the conference by shooting 49 percent from the field, which ranks fourth in the A-10.

La Salle is the best three-point shooting team in the conference, and has also been lights-out from the charity stripe. The Explorers lead the conference with a 41 percent three-point field goal percentage, and are shooting 74 percent from the foul line.

The Minutewomen have been solid from the free throw line as well, especially during their five-game home winning streak. They have shot 83 percent from the foul line during this stretch, and have averaged 46 percent from the field and 40 percent from behind the arc.

The impressive numbers for UMass during its Mullins Center domination over the past month do not stop there. Possibly the most intriguing statistic is the fact that four Minutewomen are averaging double-figures during this span of wins at home.

UMass has looked like a totally different team in the second half of the season, and while the players know there are still some things they need to improve upon, UMass has found an identity, and it could not have come at a better time.

Junior forward Tamara Tatham is averaging 9.5 points and 5.8 rebounds per game this season for the Minutewomen.

Coach K finds sense of purpose in charity

By Keith Parsons
Associated Press

DURHAM, N.C. — The spotlight always finds Mike Krzyzewski — hoisting a championship trophy, starring in a TV commercial, turning down an offer to coach the Los Angeles Lakers.

This time, the Duke coach simply stepped aside.

At the opening of a recreation center that bears his mother's name, Krzyzewski closed his remarks by praising his older brother, Bill, as his hero and the family leader. His voice faltered a bit as he handed him the scissors for the ribbon-cutting.

Coach K then thanked each of his players for coming, and a couple wiped tears from their eyes.

"If he does stuff like this, and raises the money to build this center, then he's a pretty good guy," said one of Kryzewski's three daughters, Jamie Spatola. "If somebody has something negative to say about him, I think we've gotten pretty good at ignoring it."

Such is the life led by the Hall of Fame coach. On one hand, he's a notorious agitator of referees, someone known as much for his sideline scowls and profanities as he is for leading the winningest program of this century.

The Blue Devils are 205-33 since 2000 entering the weekend, the only team with more than 200 victories. Illinois is next with 185.

But there's another side to Krzyzewski, the one Spatola, her sisters and the rest of their family gets to see. It's the one in which he devotes time to a myriad of charities, including the Duke Children's Hospital and the V Foundation, named after the late North Carolina State coach, Jim Valvano.

The Emily Krzyzewski Family Life Center now can be added to the list.

"I think a public figure, in coaching, you're always going to get some criticism," Coach K said. "Being involved in things like this make that worthwhile. It gives it substance, so it's not just about winning games and scoring more points than another team. It gives a soul to what you do."

More than ever, that includes more than simply worrying about No. 1 Duke (26-1). Krzyzewski was appointed coach for USA Basketball's first men's senior national team in October, and he will be in charge of the U.S. national program for the next three years.

That span includes the world championships in Japan in 2006 and the Beijing Olympics in 2008. He is the first college coach to lead a U.S. team in a major international competition since NBA players started playing in the Olympics in 1992.

Then there are the commercials. Krzyzewski is one of a handful of people used by American Express in its "My Life, My Card" spots, and his involvement alongside celebrities such as Tiger Woods and Robert De Niro immediately drew some questions around college basketball.

Surely, the spots that show him walking through Cameron Indoor Stadium – where the three national championship banners he has won are featured prominently – violated some recruiting rule.

Not so, according to the NCAA. While not specifically mentioning Krzyzewski, the organization released a statement to show it had no rules against endorsements for coaches. The issue might be revisited at some point, but for now there's nothing to stop him or anyone else from doing it.

And Coach K wonders if it helps at all.

"I don't think we need that," he said. "In some ways, people use that against you. Whatever edges we have here at Duke come as a result of having a great school and a great program, not any other things. I don't believe that."

This isn't the only perceived advantage that rankles Krzyzewski. Through 27 games this season, the Blue Devils have made 526 free throws, while their opponents have shot a total of 436.

The discrepancy was particularly glaring in back-to-back victories over Boston College and Florida State. In those games, Duke was 60-of-80, while the Eagles and the Seminoles combined were 20-for-24.

Krzyzewski points to the style of play used by his Blue Devils, as well an emphasis on getting the other team in foul trouble. Guard J.J. Redick, the second-leading scorer in Division I, does this better than perhaps anyone.

Speedskating provides good entertainment

By Paul Newberry
Associated Press

TURIN, Italy — It's the most thrilling moment in speedskating: a star like Shani Davis or Chad Hedrick hurtles around the final curve and powers down the final straightaway while roaring fans try to watch the scoreboard and the ice at the same time.

Will it be an Olympic record? Will it be a world record?

No need for that sort of anticipation in Turin.

The record book is on ice at the Olympic oval.

No one has come close to challenging a world record. Only two Olympic marks have been set, both assured before the skaters even took the starting gun: team pursuit was a new event for men and women, so naturally the fastest times went into the book, likely to stay only until the next Olympics.

"Ohhh, it's not as fun," American skater Catherine Raney said. "I'm not going to lie, it's not as much fun. You always want to skate on fast ice. It's a little bit disappointing that it's not that fast."

Not that it was unexpected. Turin was hampered largely by simple geography, negating any realistic challenge of the times at the 2002 Salt Lake City Games.

The Italian oval is a mere 660 feet above sea level, compared to the Utah Olympic oval – the world's highest-altitude track at 4,675 feet. Thinner air creates less resistance, which means faster times. Also, the thicker humidity in Turin makes it more difficult to maintain the quality of the ice, or ghiaccio in Italian.

"It's like hitting a golf ball in Colorado and a golf ball in Florida," said Joey Cheek, who won a gold and a silver at these games. "There's no comparison."

There were other issues, too.

The IOC wanted the speedskating oval up and running by January 2005, but the first competition wasn't held until this past December. Even then, competitors complained about the disheveled state of the building, including the construction dust that settled on the ice. U.S. skater Derek Parra wound up with a blackened hand when he rubbed it across the slab — hardly the sort of pristine condition that results in fast times.

Canadian icemaker Mark Messer, generally recognized as the best in the business as the guy who oversees the blistering ice in Calgary, managed to whip the Turin oval into shape, but he will readily admit that this ice doesn't meet his exacting standards.

"I am pleased in a couple of ways," he said. "We needed to accomplish three things. One was to make it even for everybody. So when the event started, it had to be the same ice at the end of the event. The second priority was to make sure it was safe."

Mission accomplished there.

"The third priority was to make it fast," said Messer, who was in charge of the speedskating venue at the last two Olympics. "I don't think we achieved that yet — and that is the hardest one to do. Usually, it takes years to get the right values for a building. We found it to be a bit of a challenge at that end."

Icemaking is a precise art. The ice must be maintained at the proper temperature, even when extenuating circumstances, such as a full house of more than 8,000 people, make the air warmer. In Turin, the thermostat inside the building has been known to jump as much as 11 degrees from morning to afternoon, when the races are held.

For Messer, there simply wasn't enough time to determine how the changing conditions, both obvious and subtle, affected the ice.

Minutemen await Flyers

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

In the wake of his team's latest heartbreaking loss, a 72-71 defeat at the hands of Charlotte on Wednesday, Massachusetts men's basketball coach Travis Ford went searching for answers as to why his team has seemingly been unable to pull out close games. Ford, however, wasn't able to find any magic solutions that will result in UMass (11-13, 6-7 Atlantic 10) finally getting the breaks in tight contests.

"Believe me, I've talked to a lot of coaches in the last six hours and they just say, 'Hopefully, eventually you'll get them back,'" Ford said prior to Thursday's practice. "It's part of any sport. We're right there. We're close, but these [losses] have been against very good teams.

"It's nothing we're doing down the stretch," he added. "There's some things we can do throughout the game, like not turning the ball over and making our foul shots, but I don't think it's anything down the stretch that we need to change."

UMass is 1-6 in games decided by three points or less this year, and despite the obvious frustration caused by so many tight losses, Ford is trying to keep his team's focus on finishing the season strong.

"There's no question it's frustrating, but I'm proud of how hard our kids are working and competing," Ford said. "We have to keep our eye on the ball and understand that there's still a long season left. There's still some games that we need to take care of. You can only control your future, you can't control the past."

The Minutemen have three games remaining in the regular season, beginning with a noontime clash with Dayton tomorrow at the Mullins Center. The Flyers (13-14, 5-8 A-10) have struggled away from home, as they are 0-6 in road games against A-10 opponents, and just 1-8 overall. Ford can certainly relate to Dayton's road struggles, as UMass is 3-11 away from the Mullins Center this year.

Sophomore forward Lawrence Carrier scored 13 points on 3-of-7 shooting from behind the arc against the Charlotte 49ers Wednesday.

"We've played one of the toughest road schedules in America," Ford said. "Our team

The Massachusetts women's basketball team lost to the Saint Louis Billikens, 61-57, last night, as the Billikens' 20-4 mid-game run proved too much to overcome.

Now the Minutewomen look ahead to the La Salle Explorers, who visit the Mullins Center on Sunday.

As the regular season comes to an end, the Massachusetts women's basketball team looks to head into the Atlantic 10 tournament on a positive note as it hosts La Salle (11-14 7-7 A-10) at 2 p.m. on Sunday at the Mullins Center.

The Minutewomen (10-15 7-7 A-10) will look to grab their sixth consecutive win at home when they take on the Explorers for the second time this season. UMass went on a 40-15 run on Jan. 27 to knock off La Salle, which at the time was in first place in the conference.

Since then, things have changed dramatically for both teams. The Explorers have lost six of their last seven, while the Minutewomen have won seven of their last nine. It should also be noted that before last night's game against Saint Louis, UMass and La Salle were both involved in a three-way tie for seventh place in the A-10.

UMass has put together quite an impressive stretch run since beginning the season with a dismal A-10 record of 0-5. The Minutewomen were struggling to find an identity early on, but as of late, UMass coach Marnie Dacko has put together a talented group that is playing like the team to beat in the conference.

"We play with a little swagger now," Dacko said after Sunday's

Senior night for UM Hockey

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

Saturday night will be the final chapter of the home careers for four Massachusetts hockey (12-18-0, 9-14-6 Hockey East) seniors at the Mullins Center. This weekend on Senior Night in Amherst, and Friday night in Boston, the Minutemen will conclude their season series against Northeastern (3-20-6, 3-14-6 HEA).

The home fans will be seeing the likes of captains Marvin Degon and Stephen Werner, as well as Gabe Winer and Jamie Sofon, for the final time on their home ice.

The four seniors on the UMass roster have seen a lot of things during the four years they have spent playing in the Pioneer Valley. Their sophomore season they were part of a team that made it all the way to the conference championship game before surrendering to Maine in three overtime periods. Then this season they defeated a No. 3 Boston College team whom the Minutemen were winless against in their previous 11 games.

"That was my class," junior captain Matt Anderson, who was redshirted his sophomore year while recovering from off-season shoulder surgery, said. "All four guys are pretty special people in and out of the locker room.

"They all have a tremendous future to look at ahead of them," he added. "I'm sure Saturday night will be special for them in their own way."

Anderson, however, isn't worried about the young guys on the team stepping up into leadership positions in the future.

"You can see there are definitely guys that are going to be able to fill in," he said. "It's going to be interesting to see how it plays out and see who wants it the most, that's pretty much what it comes down to."

Squaring off against the Mass Attack this weekend will be the Huskies of Northeastern. Coach Greg Cronin's inaugural season at the helm hasn't exactly gone as planned.

Entering the weekend, NU sits in ninth place in the league standings, six points out of the final playoff spot held down by UMass-Lowell. This season the Huskies have only managed to muster three wins, with one of those coming over the Minutemen back on Nov. 11.

In that 2-0 loss the Maroon and White allowed the first goal with just three seconds remaining in the second period. NU sophomore Jimmy Russo, then Senior Marvin Degon is currently 18th on the all-time UMass scoring chart. This year he set his season-highs for points, goals, power play goals and shots.

Maroon and White gears up

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

After a week off to rest following the Campbell-Cartier Tournament in California, the Massachusetts softball team (1-4) is on the road again, this time to Columbus, Ga. to take part in the NFCA Leadoff Classic.

Coming off a heartbreaking loss 3-2 loss to Cal, in which junior pitcher Brandice Balschmiter was one strike away from her first shutout, the Minutewomen return to action at South Commons Stadium and Complex. They will be competing against a number of ranked opponents and three teams from last year's Women's College World Series.

UMass will be in the third pool, which includes No. 12 Northwestern (7-3), Illinois State (1-6) and No. 24 Louisville (8-0).

The Minutewomen will play both Northwestern and Illinois State on Friday and Louisville on Saturday. The teams will then move to bracket play for the rest of Saturday and Sunday.

Although these teams are non-conference opponents, UMass coach Elaine Sortino looks at these games as UMass' conference schedule.

"This particular segment [of the schedule] is our only opportunity to play ranked programs," she said. "It is critically important to get an at-large bid to the NCAA tournament to a program like ours [because] we don't have the opportunity [during conference play.] It's highly unlikely that we'll see another ranked team."

Of the two ranked opponents UMass is guaranteed to see this weekend, Louisville, who is undefeated, has the better record, but Northwestern is the higher ranked team due to a tougher schedule.

"Northwestern has a very strong pitching staff, and have had good hitting for a 7-3 [record]. They haven't played any weak opponents," Sortino said. "I ven though [Louisville's] schedule is not as strong as Northwestern's, they're 8-0 and their numbers are incredible. They also have an Australian pitcher who I know is going to throw gas."

That Australian pitcher is junior Catherine Bishop. A native of Adelaide, Australia, Bishop had a team-low 1.41 ERA and a 21-9 record for the Cardinals last season as a sophomore. This year Bishop is

The UMass softball team is off to a slow start in the 2005-06 campaign, dropping four out of its first five games.

In four games she has posted a 0.56 ERA and is undefeated.

These are fairly unfamiliar opponents for the Maroon and White, which have a collective 0-3 record against them. UMass has met Northwestern only once, in 2003, when they lost 9-6 at the Speedline Invitational, and Illinois State twice, the last meeting coming in 1997. The Minutewomen had never faced Louisville in their program's history.

Also included in the field are defending national champion Michigan, as well as Tennessee and Alabama which advanced to last year's Women's College World Series.

The Minutewomen have a lot of experience in this tournament, participating in all 11 NFCA tournaments dating back to 1996. UMass is 20-32 all time at the tournament and won the event in 2003, when they defeated North Carolina 8-0 in the final round.

The Maroon and White were victorious in one of five games in their last tournament against some of the nation's top teams, and it is expected that this weekend's competition will be just as tough.

"This is the toughest tournament in the country because it's the national tournament field from the year before, so there are no weak sisters."

Sortino said. "I'd venture to say four out of the five teams we faced [in last week's tournament] will make it to the NCAA tournament this year. I think 80 percent of our opponents [in this weekend's tournament] will be in the national tournament this year, so I think we will see the same [level of play]."

The Minutewomen will compete in two more tournaments this spring before Atlantic 10 conference play begins in late March. They will travel to Florida on consecutive weekends to compete in the USF Adidas Spring Break Invitational in Tampa, followed by the FAU Parent's Weekend Tournament in Boca Raton.

UMass will play its first conference game against George Washington on March 24 in Washington D.C. The first home game will be March 29 against Dartmouth.

The Minutewomen play two games today against Northwestern and Illinois State and one game tommorow against Louisville.

Minutewomen open with the Crusaders

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team will begin its 2006 season this weekend when they take on Holy Cross at 12 p.m. tomorrow in Worcester.

The Minutewomen return 18 letter winners, including 10 starters from last year's team. Two of the most notable players that are returning are senior Kerri Connerty and sophomore Kathleen Typadis. They were UMass's biggest offensive threats in 2005, combining for 71 goals and 94 points.

The Maroon and White return several strong players on the defensive end as well. Senior Jackie Nesbitt and junior Erica Shapiro will be the leaders on the Minutewomen defense in 2006. Nesbitt led the team in groundballs last season and was 11th in the NCAA with 56.

UMass finished last season in last place in the Atlantic 10, but UMass coach Carrie Bolduc believes that her team is in much better shape for the 2006 campaign.

"We have high expectations," Bolduc said. "We have a lot more depth than last year. We're a little more experienced, but we're still young. Our freshman and sophomores make up the brunt of our roster. We're athletic, and we have some strong leaders.

"We should definitely win more games this year, given that we have more experience and more depth," Bolduc added. "For the most part, we're fairly healthy. This is the most focused I've ever seen our team. The players certainly want to get it done, just like we do as coaches."

The Minutewomen did not get any favors in their schedule for this season, as they will face off against four top-20 teams in the country.

Opening up against Holy Cross will be no walk in the park, either. The Crusaders advanced to the Patriot League championship game in 2005, and were picked to finish third in their conference in 2006.

Holy Cross is led by senior midfielder Carolyn Smirti and junior goaltender Megan Orr. Smirti had 30 goals and 36 points last season, while Orr returns to the crease as the reigning Patriot League Goalkeeper of the Year.

Despite coming out of the gates with a tough contest, the Minutewomen believe that they have the correct game plan to start the 2006 season off on the right foot.

"The key to being successful on Saturday is finishing our shots," Bolduc said. "[Holy Cross's] keeper is pretty strong, athletic and has a good presence around the crease. If we can take care of that we'll be OK."

Another storyline to follow in this match-up is the relationship between Bolduc and Holy Cross coach Stephanie Pavlick. Pavlick graduated from UMass in 2000, and played under Bolduc for one season in 2000. At the time Bolduc was only an assistant coach, but she knows Pavlick well enough to compliment her achievements at Holy Cross.

"They are well-coached," Bolduc said. "Their coach is a UMass grad. I coached her for one year. She's done a really good job there."

Time for a recovery

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

There were mixed feelings for Massachusetts softball coach Elaine Sortino after the Massachusetts softball team (1-4) squandered a 2-0 lead to No. 8/7 California and eventually fell to the Golden Bears, 3-2, in the eighth inning on Feb. 12 at the Campbell/Carrier Tournament in San Diego, Ca.

"It was like falling off a cliff," Sortino said of the heartbreaking loss. "We were on the first-base side dugout, the runner came through first-base and the umpire punched her out and I closed my book. And then I looked up and two runners had scored, and I was like, 'Wait a minute, what just happened?'"

The two Cal runners tied the game off of unearned runs in the seventh and then managed to score another unearned run in the eighth to take the victory away from the Minutewomen – a result that did not sit well with Sortino, or any of her players.

"It was really unsettling," Sortino said. "I don't think any of us will ever forget that."

While the loss was hard for the Minutewomen to digest, Sortino was more than pleased with the way two of her six rookies had performed during that entire weekend and the A-10 concurred.

Following the Campbell/Carrier Tournament, freshman Whitney Mollica was named the A-10 Player/Rookie of the Week and freshman Brandice Balschmiter was honored as the Pitcher of the Week, as the two newcomers swept the weekly conference awards.

At the tournament, Mollica had a batting average of .333, tallied a double, a triple, two RBIs and was walked three times. Her slugging percentage during the Minutewomen's first weekend of play was a team-high .583, but it was one at bat that was most vital.

In the bottom of the sixth inning during Game 2 of the tourney, Mollica stepped to the plate with two runners on base as UMass was fighting a 1-0 deficit to Sacramento State. The freshman then proceeded to crank a two-run triple to center field, giving the Minutewomen a 2-1 advantage and the eventual win.

In that same contest, it was Balschmiter who was able to hold Sacramento State to just one run, while posting six strikeouts during her first collegiate complete game.

Balschmiter's most monumental showing came the following Sunday against Cal. In that 3-2 near-upset, Balschmiter faced 31 batters while allowing just six hits and striking out nine. Throughout the weekend, Balschmiter accumulated an ERA of 1.70.

It was the fact that it was a freshman beating one of the top teams in the nation in Cal that impressed Sortino the most, and despite the eventual end result of the game, the future appears bright.

"For us to be a great team this year, the freshman class is going to have to have a nominal contribution to the year's results," Sortino said. "I think that we've already seen that they're capable of doing it – they're very poised and motivated."

Candle most likely cause of blaze

A fire in the Coolidge dormitory in the Southwest Residential Area created confusion last night when students were evacuated and smoke could be seen billowing from a 17th story window.

The blaze broke out in room 1711 around 7:15 p.m., according to the Amherst fire department. The fire was mostly contained in one room. No students were injured.

Within minutes after the alarm sounded, at least three trucks were on the scene, said Amherst Assistant Fire Chief Lindsay Stronigen. When firefighters saw smoke pouring out of windows, they sounded a box alarm, which called all on-and off-duty members of the fire department.

According to an eyewitness, "the fire alarm went off, [and] when the door from the room opened up, there was smoke pouring out and water coming from underneath the door... you could see flames coming from what looked like the closet. [The resident of room 1711] went into the stairwell and then ran back into the room."

It is unclear why the resident reentered the room, but the resident assistant of the floor proceeded to knock on the door and get the student to leave the room, said the eyewitness.

Only one resident was present in the room when the fire started.

Officials would not confirm the identity of the resident, however, the Massachusetts Daily Collegian has learned from several sources, including facebook.com and eyewitnesses, that the resident is Alex R. Topiano, a math major.

Stronigen would not state the probable cause

While an early evening fire filled the hallways of the 17th floor of the Coolidge dormitory, most displaced students weren't angry about being relocated to the University of Massachusetts Campus Center Hotel.

"It's kind of fun," said Doreen Maya, 19, a freshman who lives just three doors down from room 1711, where the fire began at approximately 7:15 p.m. "We get our own bathroom and king-sized beds for the night."

"I don't really mind," said Travis Bettinson, 18, a freshman who also lives on the 17th floor. "I'm glad none

Fake ID operation busted in JQA

A University of Massachusetts student was arrested in John Quincy Adams dormitory on Wednesday evening on six charges, including the manufacturing of false identification cards.

Alexander Lemieux, 19, of 424 Ridge Rd. in Orange, Conn., was arrested at 5:05 p.m. following two investigations within two hours, UMass police said.

The charges brought to Lemieux are possession of a Class D drug, three counts of carrying a dangerous weapon on school grounds, possession of a Class E drug and false liquor identification card.

Officers obtained a search warrant for Lemieux's room based on an initial drug investigation. Police arrived at his room around 3 p.m. last Wednesday afternoon and found marijuana during a search using a K-9 unit. Lemieux was arrested at 3:22 p.m. and charged with possession of a Class D substance.

During the search of Lemieux's room, officers found what they considered to be items related to the production of false identification cards. Among the items they saw were identification cards, laminating pouches and a computer printer believed to be involved in making the cards. Police also found Teslin paper, which is used to print the cards.

Police applied for a second search warrant, and returned to Lemieux's room within a few hours.

The officers took a number of items from Lemieux's room during the second search, including an X-Acto cutter knife, a water bong, a Dell 80 hard drive, a Dell Dimension 8400 desktop computer, miscellaneous cables, a Dell laptop, two glass smoking pipes, an electronic scale, a switch blade knife, a machete knife, a butterfly knife and Ziploc bags.

During an interview process back in the station conducted by officers, Lemieux made statements that police believe indicated that the machinery was indeed possessed for producing fake licenses.

UMass alumna dies in car accident on Friday

Police pull a car from a New York reservoir after an accident that killed a UMass alumna.

A University of Massachusetts alumna died over the weekend when the car her fiance was driving plunged off a Yonkers, New York highway and into a reservoir.

Rachelle Curry, 34, was in the passenger seat of a 1997 Ford Explorer being driven by James Callahan III, 38, when the accident occurred at approximately 4:30 a.m. on Friday. Callahan was able to escape the submerged vehicle and swim to safety. Curry, however, was trapped in the frigid water.

Callahan suffered from hypothermia and several lacerations, including one on the head. He walked a mile down the road to a gas station, where he collapsed in front of an attendant, who called 911. Callahan managed to tell police that his fiance was still trapped in the vehicle.

Police divers from Yonkers and New York City arrived at the scene of the accident, next to the Sprain Brook Parkway, at approximately 7:30 a.m. They recovered Curry's body from the vehicle and she was pronounced dead on arrival at the Westchester County Medical Center.

An autopsy report has already been filed, but neither the Westchester County Medical Examiner's Office nor police would reveal her cause of death.

Police would only say that the investigation was continuing and that Callahan had been interviewed. Investigators said that neither drugs nor alcohol appeared to be factors in the accident.

Curry attended UMass as an undergraduate in the early 1990's. She was involved with the Al ANA community and worked with the University Cultural Center. Curry first met Callahan during her time at the University.

Police are still investigating Callahan's claims that the accident occurred when another car cut him off. State Police Investigator Joseph Becerra told the New York Daily News, "We're hoping we hear from some witnesses who saw what happened."

Funeral and memorial arrangements for Curry have not yet been made.

Deadline passes; no word on Carroll

By Alexandra Zavis
Associated Press

BAGHDAD (AP) — The deadline set by kidnappers of American journalist Jill Carroll for U.S. authorities to meet their demands passed Sunday with no word on her fate and with no sign that American or Iraqi authorities are close to finding her.

An Iraqi Interior Ministry official said an extensive search was under way for the 28-year-old freelancer for the Christian Science Monitor, who was seized by gunmen in Baghdad on Jan. 7. Her Iraqi translator was killed.

"Our forces raided some suspected places, but she was not there," Maj. Falah al-Mohammedawi said. "We are watching the situation closely."

Carroll was last seen in a videotape broadcast Feb. 9 by the private Kuwaiti television station Al-Rai. The station owner, Jassem Boudai, said then that the kidnappers had set Feb. 26 as the deadline for U.S. and Iraqi authorities to meet their demands or they would kill her.

The kidnappers, a formerly unknown group calling themselves the Revenge Brigades, have publicly demanded the release of all women detainees in Iraq, but Boudai indicated the group provided more specific conditions that he refused to reveal.

The deadline could not have come at

AIDS advocate shares harrowing personal story

By Jake Monte
Collegian Staff

AIDS awareness advocate Vanessa Johnson shared her personal story to address why AIDS is the leading cause of death among African-American women on Thursday at the University of Massachusetts Everywoman's Center.

The speech was hosted by Sandra Mandel, the associate director of special events at the Everywoman's Center, an on-campus resource devoted to empowering and promoting equity for women.

Mandel said she noticed the statistic in September 2005, and immediately sought to find an expert on the subject. Her phone calls led her to Vanessa Johnson, who because of a busy schedule was unable to speak until recently. Johnson told Mandel that in the past she has found it effective to tell her story.

As a woman living with HIV and a longtime sufferer of sexual abuse, Johnson's story is intensely personal. Johnson said, "I use the personal story because a lot of people are afraid to talk about HIV, so it's really important to understand there are human beings who live with this disease — that it's more than what they see on the TV and read in the newspaper."

"Boundaries have always been an issue for me," Johnson said in her speech, "because they have never been properly set." She spoke of her father who left home at an early age and a teenage babysitter who molested her repeatedly while she wore a blindfold. When her father returned home he forced oral sex upon her. This sexual abuse went on until she was 21 years old. She finally told her mother about it when she was in college.

Johnson said, "Bits and pieces of my life have led to my risk exposure. That's why I'm telling you this story."

She got involved with her friend's father, Wayne. They both had multiple partners and were using recreational drugs on a regular basis to deal with what she believes stemmed from a lot of childhood abuse. Johnson was diagnosed with AIDS in 1990.

"[The] sexual abuse and assaults that children and young adults suffer ... can lead them down a path to promiscuous sex and drug use. Sometimes it's because that's what you know," she said.

The speech was co-sponsored by Amanda Collings from the Women's Health Project, Jacqui Tinn of Women of Color Leadership Network and Eboni Rafus of Graduate Women's Network.

"I was shocked to find out AIDS is the number one killer of African-American women," Rafus said. "By sharing what happened to her, she gave us all a sense as to why African American women are at risk for the disease. She did this in an organic, personal way that put a face to the problem instead of just bombarding the audience with numbers and statistics."

Johnson is the Deputy Director of the Capital District African American Coalition on AIDS (CDAACA) and Board Chair of the National Association of People With AIDS (NAPWA). She got her start as a volunteer for the Albany Medical Center as their HIV peer advocate.

When Johnson has talked to college students in the past, she's given out lollipops and told students to exchange the candy with their neighbor after having had it in their mouth. When they refused, she told them they'd be doing the same thing by having oral sex with someone they didn't know.

"HIV is preventable," she said, "If we just pay enough attention to ourselves and the people we're involved with we can prevent it."

Mandel said what she learned from the speech was that "it is possible to survive and have a meaningful life. I thought [Vanessa] was a shining example of that."

Johnson has a 22-year-old son named Brandon who is not HIV-positive. For a long time she was angry at God, but things are different now.

"I know God watches over me and I know I'm here for a reason," she said.

Kidnappers' deadline passes over weekend; Carroll's fate unknown while violence rises

a worse time, with Iraqi security forces facing a major challenge because of the sectarian crisis that erupted after bombers destroyed the golden dome of the Shiite Askariya shrine, triggering a wave of reprisal attacks on Sunni mosques in Baghdad and other cities.

The violence has pushed this country to the brink of civil war and threatened to sabotage American plans to establish a government of national unity capable of calming the Sunni-led insurgency so U.S. troops can begin to go home.

On the day of the deadline, at least 29 people, including three American soldiers, were killed in violence across the country. Mortar fire rumbled through the heart of Baghdad.

A ban on driving in Baghdad and its suburbs helped prevent major attacks during daylight, but after nightfall explosions thundered through the city as mortar shells slammed into a Shiite quarter in southwestern Baghdad, killing 16 people and wounding 53, police said.

Mortar fire also hit a Shiite area on the capital's east side, killing three people and injuring six, police reported.

Nevertheless, officials announced they would let vehicles back on the streets at 6 a.m. Monday — in part because shops were running out of food and other basics. Gasoline stations were closed, and people were unable to go to work Sunday, a work day in this Muslim country.

Although mosque attacks have declined sharply, sectarian violence went unabated.

A bomb exploded at a Shiite mosque in the southern city of Basra, injuring at least two people, police said.

More than 60 Shiite families fled their homes in predominantly Sunni areas west and north of Baghdad after receiving threats, said Shiite legislator Jalaladin al-Saghir and Iraqi army Brig. Gen. Jalil Khallaf.

North of the capital, gunmen stepped from a car and fired on teenagers playing soccer in a Shiite-Sunni mixed neighborhood of Baqouba, killing two of the youths and wounding five, police said.

In other violence, two American soldiers died when their vehicle was struck by a roadside bomb in western Baghdad, the U.S. military said. A third U.S. soldier was killed by small arms fire in central Baghdad late Sunday, the military said.

A roadside bomb also exploded near a police patrol in Madain, south of Baghdad, killing one officer and injuring two, police said.

To the west, gunmen killed an ex-general in Saddam Hussein's army as he drove his car in Ramadi, a relative said. Former Brig. Gen. Musaab Manfi al-Rawi was rumored to be under consideration to be military commander in the town, an insurgent hotbed, said his cousin, Ahmed al-Rawi.

Gunmen in a speeding car also seriously wounded an Iraqi journalist, Nabila Ibrahim, in Kut, southeast of Baghdad.

The sectarian crisis threatened U.S. plans for a government drawing in the country's major ethnic and religious parties, considered essential to win the trust of the disaffected Sunni Arab minority that forms the backbone of the insurgency.

With a broad-based government in place, the Bush administration hopes to begin withdrawing some of its 138,000 soldiers this year.

A former British ambassador to Iraq predicted Sunday that increasing sectarian bloodshed would require the U.S.-led foreign military coalition to stay for some time to help keep peace among rival ethnic and religious groups.

"One could almost call it a low-level civil war already," Sir Jeremy Greenstock, who was Britain's envoy in Baghdad until 2004, told British television channel ITV1.

During a meeting at Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari's residence, representatives of the main political parties agreed late Saturday to renew efforts to form an inclusive government.

But Sunni politician Nasir al-Ani said Sunday that his side was looking for some tangible steps before ending their boycott of government talks.

Sunni and Shiite religious leaders have also called for unity and an end to attacks on each other's mosques.

Radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, whose own militia was blamed for many of the attacks on Sunnis, repeated the appeal Sunday when he addressed followers in the southern Shiite stronghold of Basra upon his return from neighboring Iran.

He accused Americans and their coalition partners of stirring up sectarian unrest and demanded their withdrawal.

Also Sunday, the Arabic-language Al-Jazeera satellite channel broadcast a tape it received from the family of Canadian hostage James Loney appealing for his release and that of three colleagues from the Christian Peacemaker Teams abducted with him in Baghdad on Nov. 26.

"James is a loving, compassionate, selfless man," said a woman relative who appeared on the tape. She did not say what her relation to Loney was, but may have been his sister-in-law since she said her husband and his relatives were scared for their brother.

Associated Press writers Robert H. Reid, Bassem Mroue, Qassim Abdul-Zahra and Jalal Mudhar in Baghdad, Ali al-Fatlawi in Hillah and Hana Abdellah in Baqouba contributed to this report.

Journalists' rights group appeals for Carroll's release

NEW YORK (AP) — Two days before a deadline set by kidnappers holding American journalist Jill Carroll, the Committee to Protect Journalists issued a public appeal for her release.

Jill Carroll was reporting from Iraq for the Boston-based Christian Science Monitor when she was kidnapped Jan. 7.

"Many leading Arab and Muslim journalists, scholars and others have come out publicly calling for her release and we join them in their appeal," the CPJ, a New York-based nonprofit organization, said in a statement.

Carroll's kidnappers set the Feb. 26 deadline earlier this month, according to the owner of a Kuwaiti TV station that aired the latest videotape of her on Feb. 10. In that tape, she appealed for her supporters to do whatever it takes to win her release "as quickly as possible."

Two previous tapes showing Carroll were aired by Al-Jazeera TV on Jan. 17 and 30. The first included a threat to kill Carroll within 72 hours unless all Iraqi women were released from custody.

The Feb. 10 tape did not make that demand, although five Iraqi women remain in U.S. military custody.

Carroll, a University of Massachusetts graduate, grew up in Michigan and worked as a reporting assistant for The Wall Street Journal before moving to Jordan and launching her freelance career in 2002, learning Arabic along the way.

The CPJ also called on kidnappers to release two Iraqi journalists, Marwan Ghazal and Reem Zaeed of Iraqi Samaria TV, who were abducted in Baghdad on Feb. 1.

COOLIDGE DORM ROOM UP IN FLAMES

Freshmen Megan Silva and Doreen Maya were displaced from their dorm room on the 17th floor of Coolidge Hall after a fire last night. The roommates remained upbeat as they checked into a Campus Center Hotel room around 11:30 p.m.

of my stuff got ruined."

Sixteen students, half of the 32 that were displaced, checked into rooms just before midnight last night. Carrying bags, laptop computers, and toiletries, residents of the 17th floor of Coolidge adjusted to their own temporary hotel suites.

"I don't really mind at all," Maya said. "I'm afraid of fire, so I'm just glad that nobody was hurt. It could be a lot worse."

Maya said she was in her room last night at just after 7 p.m. when she heard the building's fire alarm go off.

"I just figured it was another Coolidge fire alarm," Maya said. "We get fire alarms all the time for stupid reasons, but never because of a real fire."

It was then that Maya said she heard a door swing open a few doors down from her room. When she looked out her doorway, she saw Alex Topiano, a freshman, soaked in water and running into the men's bathroom.

"He was drenched," Maya said. "I could see that there was puddle on the floor in front of his room and the rooms next to it. Then everyone came into the hallway and was asking him if he was OK."

Maya and the students on her floor were then told to evacuate the building. As she left the building, Maya said she walked down stairs with Topiano. She said Topiano told her at that time that the fire had been started with a candle.

"We were walking down the stairs and then all of a sudden he started running back up like he forgot something," she said.

Maya and her roommate Megan Silva, 18, who is also a freshman, said they were allowed to return to their room to gather belongings for the night for only five minutes at around 10 p.m. last night.

"The whole placed smelled like smoke really bad," Silva said. "There was water all over the floor of the hallways, but there were already cleaning people there."

The girls said most of their friends who live on the 17th floor of Coolidge took a PVTA bus from the Southwest horseshoe to the Campus Center hotel. A resident advisor told them they would not be allowed to return to their rooms until at least noon today.

Both girls said they were concerned that Topiano would face serious repercussions because of the fire. UMass Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Michael Gargano confirmed that the student who was involved would be meeting with university officials tomorrow to discuss possible disciplinary actions if, in fact, a candle was involved.

"I just hope he doesn't get in any trouble with the school," Maya said. "I'm sure it was an accident. He is a really good kid and a really good student."

of the fire until further investigation.

Michael Gargano, Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs at UMass, said that there was a high probability that a candle was knocked over, which started the fire.

If Topiano was in possession of the candle, he would be "suspended immediately ... fire is a serious offense and it is a life hazard," Gargano said.

The University also plans to take action against several students that did not leave the building during the fire alarm.

"We searched the floors to see if everyone evacuated, and we found several people that did not," said Stromgren.

"We were pretty slow getting out of there," said Coolidge resident Meg Elliott, a freshman biology major. "The alarm goes off every week so we don't take it seriously anymore, but I guess we were wrong this time."

Freshmen Seth Czarnecki and Mike Chin, who live two doors down from Topiano, said that upon leaving the room, Topiano was soaked with water and in shock yelling, "Oh my god, oh my god."

During the evacuation, Coolidge residents took shelter from the cold in the lobby of the Hampshire Dining Common, which stayed open past its usual closing time to accommodate displaced students.

Around 10 p.m., the fire department reopened Coolidge to its residents, with the exception of residents who live on the 17th floor.

The sprinklers left between 1.5 and two inches of water in the rooms on the 17th floor, according to UMass spokesperson Ed Blaguszewski.

The 32 residents of the 17th floor were forced to take only a few belongings and stay overnight at the Campus Center Hotel.

"UMass Housing is working to clean up the 17th floor in the hope to have it in shape so that students can return sometime 'Monday,'" Blaguszewski said.

Stromgren said that all of the fire safety measures worked properly, including the building fire alarm and sprinkler system. He also said that it is extremely dangerous to remain in the building when the alarm goes off, and that in the future, "people should get out and not assume it is a false alarm."

Bush accepts review of ports

By Ted Bridis
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration said Sunday it will accept an extraordinary offer by a United Arab Emirates-based company to submit to a second — and broader — U.S. review of potential security risks in its deal to take over significant operations at six leading American ports. The plan averts an impending political showdown.

The Treasury Department said in a statement it will promptly begin the review once the company formally files a request for one. It said the same government panel that earlier investigated the deal but found no reason for national security concerns will reconsider it.

In six pages of documents sent earlier in the day to the White House, Dubai-based DP World asked for a 45-day investigation of plans to run shipping terminals in New York, New Jersey, Baltimore, New Orleans, Miami and Philadelphia.

The announcement means the White House likely won't face a revolt by fellow Republicans when lawmakers return Monday from a weeklong break. A united Republican Party can assert that its leaders — both in Congress and at the White House — have taken additional steps to protect national security.

In a statement Sunday, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said he will recommend that the Senate wait for results of the broader review before acting on legislation to delay or block the deal. Frist said he anticipates oversight hearings to continue to examine the agreement and its implications on maritime security.

DP World's offer was highly unusual. The secretive U.S. committee that considers security risks of foreign companies buying or investing in American industry has conducted such full investigations only about two dozen times among the more than 1,500 international deals it has reviewed.

The company said that during the renewed scrutiny, or until May 1, a London-based executive who is a British citizen would have authority over DP World's U.S. operations. It pledged that Dubai executives would not control or influence company business in the U.S., but said it was entitled to all profits during the period. It also said it will appoint an American to be its chief security officer in the United States.

"We hope that voluntarily agreeing to further scrutiny demonstrates our commitment to our long-standing relationship with the United States," said Edward H. Bilkey, the company's chief operating officer.

President Bush has forcefully defended his administration's earlier approval of DP World's proposal to buy London-based Peninsular & Oriental Steam Navigation Co. It was not immediately clear whether the re-examination by U.S. officials would produce a different outcome.

"We're satisfied that there's been a complete review of the deal," Francis Fragos Townsend, the White House homeland security adviser, said on "Fox News Sunday."

In the administration's earlier review, completed Jan. 17, DP World agreed to cooperate with law enforcement investigations and disclose records on demand about "foreign operational direction" of its business.

Go Facebook these guys

There is a great deal of worry circulating that college students may have to start revamping their Facebook profiles, as companies are now viewing these Facebook profiles in order to get a better sense of the level of professionalism (or lack thereof) of prospective employees.

Employers who have a college e-mail address are, right at this moment, looking at your "Screw reading" quote under the favorite book section, finding out that you like your wine straight from the box and are leafing through the flattering pictures of that night you pounded an entire 30 rack.

Not to worry, however. There are people who have had Facebook profiles who have written things which are not the best examples of professionalism, and yet they have still been able to find decent, well-paying jobs. Below are excerpts from the profiles which prove this.

The grand and vocal minority

Jeff Napolitano

My friend has this bumper sticker, "No War But the Class War." I find it fairly amusing, if not fairly accurate. Struggles in life are always about the "haves" versus the "have-nots," as perhaps most relevantly and painfully demonstrated by the current power struggle going on in Iraq. But that struggle isn't localized in Iraq. The class struggle has come home to root in Amherst, at our University.

What we have at UMass Amherst is a struggle to make the University as "prestigious" as possible. I use that term in quotes because that's the term that's used, not simply to justify physical improvements to the school (new buildings come from "New Dirt"), and not simply to justify hiring more faculty. Those things are fine, and no one, correctly, questions the validity of those decisions. That's why Chancellor Lombardi, when talking about fee increases and any other financial burdens at the school, always explains that to make this a "competitive" school, we need to see "New Dirt" everywhere. Fine. New dirt. I'm with you, Lombardi.

The problem is that Lombardi never talks about the impact of the things that he's doing to justify financial burdens, or shifts in administration, or new projects at the University — like the fact that support programs for women, students of color, the LGBT community and others are allowed to stagnate at the school. He doesn't talk about how two years ago, at about the same time outreach programs were cut to the urban centers of Holyoke, Springfield and other Massachusetts towns, $300,000 was allocated by the school to look for students of color outside of the state.

It's a puzzling contradiction, and one might wonder what the difference is. Why look for students of color outside the state? Well, it's all about class: UMass can charge out-of-state students a whole lot more money (over $10,000 per student) than in-state students. Plus, why look in the financially disadvantaged neighborhoods in Massachusetts when you can look for rich blacks and Latinos in the rest of the country?

It's about money, folks. When the Chancellor talks about UMass becoming a "world-class research institution," who's going to argue? Who doesn't want to become a great source of research? What is missed, what is always left out of the conversation, is that the push for becoming a "world-class research institution" means a push to get more government contracts (primarily from the Department of Defense) and a push to bring in revenue by selling off the fruits of the labor of our graduate students and professors to private business.

If that's what we're going to do, great, but let's at least include in the conversation the wisdom — or the morality — of fueling weapons research. Let's ask the question: Is the research on polymer technology going to be used to make bigger and better bombs to murder our brothers and sisters overseas?

Similarly, no one is going to argue, on the face of it, that a diploma from UMass shouldn't be a prized and valuable accomplishment. But the question is: How are you going to make it more prized and valued?

Let's at least talk about whether, as students and workers who make this school run, we think that selling our intellectual property to private business is how public universities should function. How many of us have heard the claim that UMass is the biggest seller of intellectual property in the state? How many of us have talked about how appropriate it is that the tax payers, the population, pay for our innovation to be handed over to private business?

Similarly, no one is going to argue, on the face of it, that a diploma from UMass shouldn't be a prized and valuable accomplishment. But the question is: How are you going to make it more prized and valued? By jacking up GPA and SAT requirements in order to get in? Fine, then let's talk about the validity of SAT requirements, particularly how they discriminate against students of color while being an inaccurate predictor of intelligence or success. Let's talk about how the University, in prior years when the numbers weren't so disparate, actually made a (successful) effort to reach out to bright, successful students from Holyoke, Springfield, Lawrence and Boston. And then let's ask why we're not doing that now.

This is about the "haves" and the "have-nots." And it goes beyond race and gender. This is about class. According to a recent Boston Globe Magazine article, 50 percent of students in the lower income bracket have been lost in the ranks of UMass students in the past several years. I've talked to white students who have justified the loss of diversity through the rationale, "Letting students of color from poor, underperforming schools into UMass is ruining the worth of my diploma." That fallacious argument aside, the irony of the situation is that fewer white students from working-class and middle-class backgrounds are able to come to our school.

The crux of the matter is that things are changing. Perhaps the worst part about these changes is that we, as students and staff, don't have a lot of control about how it is changing. As long as we don't have that control, we're not going to end up with a benevolent, anti-racist, feminist chancellor or president in charge. And we're not going to get that control by being quiet, passive students and professors, hoping that this committee or that committee is going to come out with the right recommendation. If we're going to obtain such control over our lives, it's going to start with a "vocal minority," which can hopefully persuade a larger majority. In my mind, it's far better to be a member of a "vocal minority" than an uninvolved, inaudible majority.

Disney's Cruel Intentions

Debbie Friedman

It was the shot heard 'round the world, a shot that came from the gun of a stealthy hunter into the body of an unsuspecting bystander. By now, I assume everyone knows this story very well, and if you're anything like me, you strongly empathized with the parties affected by this violent act. From the minute the bullet was fired my heart stopped, and fifteen years later I can still recall the sinking feeling in my stomach and remember the trauma that followed. All I could think was, poor Bambi.

Our generation grew up in the pre-Pixar, classical Disney movie era. "Bambi," "Cinderella," "Lady and the Tramp," "The Lion King," "Old Yeller" and many others were all such staples of childhood. These movies are timeless and are loved by people of all ages and backgrounds. However, did you ever stop to wonder why they are so beloved?

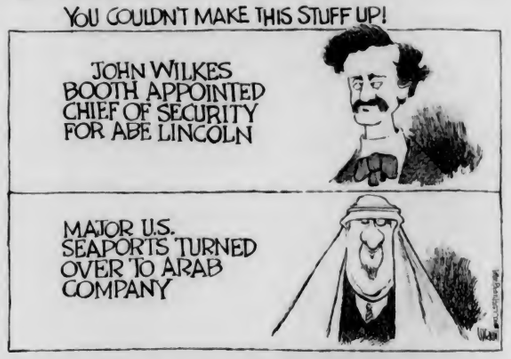
If you examine all of these movies, you will find that they all have one similar quality. They bring you down to lift you up. Every movie is a cleverly crafted emotional rollercoaster. And the people crafting these touching films have the same intentions as the theme park ride engineers working in Disney World making money.

Our whole life we slowly become increasingly disillusioned, and whether it's coping with the death of Bambi's mom or trying to understand the ills of capitalism, it's all really the same thing.

The release of "Bambi II" made me think back to being a five year old, sitting in my living room engrossed in the happy-go-lucky adventures of Bambi, Thumper and Flower frolicking around the forest. Disney starts off every "ride" by making you feel euphoric and content with musical numbers and comedic story lines. And then, just as you start to feel all warm and fuzzy inside, BANG. The mom gets shot. The dad dies trying to save his son. Someone gets kidnapped. Or a boy is forced to shoot his adored dog.

Even though the endings are always heart-warming and full of virtue, the downward emotional catapult scars. After watching "Bambi," I carried around a picture of my mom for all of kindergarten, and over the years I have come to see that most people have some type of emotional baggage from Disney movies. Luckily for Disney, that baggage translates into a lifelong customer.

Watching these movies feels just like riding Space Mountain or seeing Cinderella's Castle for the first time. They all create a sense of magical enchantment. That enchantment is something that captivates children, and keeps adults loyal, always yearning for the nostalgia. Disney has perfected the capitalization of sentiment and that is how they have become an empire — a powerful, money hungry empire with the sweetest facade you'll ever see.



I won't deny that I love all these movies. I actually think it is next to impossible not to love them. But is it necessary for them to be as traumatizing as they are? Is it good or bad that Disney introduces children to such tragic and intense feelings? And if you accept the fact that they are purposely toying with your emotions to brand you, does it take away from the "magic?"

It would be naive to think that a huge corporation, even Disney, is not out to make money, and this truth is not necessarily wrong or evil. Yet it does take away some of the magic for me. It's like finding out the person playing Mickey Mouse is a 22-year-old girl on waking up to see your mom slip a $5 bill underneath your pillow. Our whole life we slowly become increasingly disillusioned, and whether it's coping with the death of Bambi's mom or trying to understand the ills of capitalism, it's all really the same thing.

Aside from the intentions behind the emotionally distressing Disney movie moments, I wonder: what are the effects? Are these movies bursting our bubbles too early, or are they a rite of passage, like chicken pox once was? Perhaps they make us better, stronger and more emotionally capable human beings. Maybe I should be glad Bambi's mom died. It was a daunting feeling, but it sure made me appreciate my mom more. In that light, I guess that Disney is on a par with people's therapists. After all, both make us laugh, make us cry and get a hell of a lot of our money.

Money takes the magic out of just about everything, yet it never fails to put a glimmer in the eyes of those receiving it. I know it's just how the machine works, but it is sad that these great movies would never have been made if there weren't predictions of large profits. While I can't quite decide if Disney is deserving of my lifelong support, I think kids do deserve the experience, because everyone needs to have a time in their life when the death of a cartoon deer seems like the absolute worst thing that could happen.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

UNDERSTANDING DRUNK CULTURE

Wednesday's Collegian featured a letter from UMass student Jonathan Klaucke, who angrily admonished the administration for their efforts to "reduce our choices and put down our culture" by instituting a stricter anti-alcohol policy across campus. To say that I disagree strongly with Klaucke's opinion would be putting it mildly.

As I read his letter through, I began to get over my initial bewilderment with his assertion that the updated policy can be classified as "neo-conservative, neo-Nazi ideology" and tried to understand his vantage point a little more clearly. After an afternoon of trying to see where he was coming from, I found myself more puzzled than ever in regards to his vehement stance.

I wondered how many times he has walked into the bathroom in his dorm to find a sink smashed off the wall, or a pile of beer cans waiting for him in the shower. I wondered how many times he has sat up at night waiting to make sure a female friend arrived home safely. I wondered how many times he has watched fist fights erupt in the hallway outside his door, only to have them be shrugged off later as drunken misunderstandings.

And then it occurred to me that he probably hasn't had to deal with any of those problems, because if he had, then he would see how clear it is that alcohol is a major problem on this campus. The new policy was not put into effect as a means to control students and stifle their "culture" or way of life. It was put into effect to protect the property and students for which the University is responsible.

When a New England area sports team wins a championship and riots erupt, causing thousands of dollars in damages in a single night, and when any given weekend can reveal dozens of incidents of alcohol abuse and alcohol related crime, it is the responsibility of those in charge to take further steps to quell the problem.

Now, I am by no means an apologist for the administration, but I can't help but speak out when someone comes out likening their reluctance to allow unbridled drinking, underage and otherwise, on state property, to Hitler's decision to systematically slaughter millions of innocent people.

If Jonathan Klaucke has such a problem with the rules, he can always move off campus somewhere and enjoy beer pong to his heart's content. And if he wants some help redefining his rather skewed concept of culture, then I suggest he partake in any of the dozens of museums, art galleries, concert halls and sporting venues throughout the Pioneer Valley that, remarkably, entertain thousands of people a year in ways that destroy nothing and allow everyone to remember them in the morning.

Sunshine's rays

Apollo Sunshine returns home to heat up the Iron Horse

By Alex Butler
Staff Writer

Energy was, simply put, not conserved on the evening of Feb. 24. Not in the least. Well maybe someone on the balcony of the Iron Horse was holding out a little bit. Probably not, though.

Opening band Fashion People were interesting to watch, that's for sure. Their performance was full of duality, it seemed. Their really tight act was a blend of funk and Devo. Their vocals had a youthful vitality, with a similar tone to Mark Mother-baugh.

However, the most prominent aspect of the band — and the aspect that everyone seemed interested in — was their age. The quartet was comprised of what looked like four upper-middle-school or lower-high-school teenage boys. Confusion struck. The audience in the balcony, generally the spot where the more mature and aged members go, squinted at the stage to see four kids, half their age, playing a few songs that were tight-knit and catchy. The crowd looked from their wrinkled hands to the stage in a double take. No one wanted to be depressed at a rock show, and certainly not at Apollo Sunshine.

It seemed that these kids had it pretty much figured out, though, and though they certainly need time and practice to grow to their full potential, they played a solid routine. And here was an audience who wanted to be entertained, paying good money to see good music. Dualits. For the Fashion People, it killed two birds with one stone. Maybe the money could go help pay for their prom suits and flowers, as well as time in the studio.

No, that's a pretty cheap shot. The band was tangible and their material, though somewhat common and similar, was catchy and had a good beat.

Apollo Sunshine came out quickly after with a set list of fury. Their energetic fingers were accompanied by deadpan facial expressions of pure concentration. Buster Keaton is perhaps the most well-known for this unique ability. It was only after the songs that they each realized what they had made: long, lengthy pieces complete with solos that would have easily satisfied the musical god Apollo. Other significant figureheads who would have been pleased? Jimi Hendrix and Robert Plant. The band covered "Crosstown Traffic" and "Whole Lotta Love."

Failing can be quite a breeze sometimes, but not for these three. The trio played a concrete show, and everyone basked in the constant barrage of notes and energy that the guitar dealt out.

With a band like Apollo Sunshine, there is little to critique. Their shows have reached a high water mark for the time being, and this performance was no exception. Fans have a great picture of what the night will turn into with bands like Apollo Sunshine days in advance. On certain days, it might be possible to compare the feel of their show with a much louder, much more dynamic version of the Grateful Dead. They don't sound at all alike, but the message of the music is still very much present — that, along with a solid fan base and without the vast amounts of hallucinogens.

The night was a great success, and the crowd was so giddy toward the exit that the cold wind didn't seem to matter anymore. Perhaps, if the crowd was a little more into it a party could have sprouted down the street like it did last year.

Apollo Sunshine, performing here at the "Best of Boston" Showcase, joined with Fashion People for a stellar show at the Iron Horse Music Hall.

'Chronicles of Narnia' DVD unmasks creature effects

By Hanh Nguyen
Knight Ridder Newspapers

LOS ANGELES — On the forthcoming DVD of "The Chronicles of Narnia: The Lion, the Witch and the Wardrobe" (in stores April 4), the filmmakers demystify the visual effects that made the fantasy land and creatures believable.

Director Andrew Adamson wanted Aslan the lion, Narnia's spiritual leader, as realistic as possible. That's how Rhythm & Hues, the team responsible for the Aslan character, found themselves doing research only a few feet from a real-life lion.

"We did go to an animal training facility. We were actually in a cage with a high-def camera," says R&H's Bill Westenhofer at a DVD sneak preview presentation at Sony Imageworks last week. "You're looking around you to make sure there's someone shower than you in case the lion gets out.

"We'd take a clip of a lion walking and play it side by side with our animation, and you could see immediately, 'Oh, this muscle wasn't firing right,'" he adds. "With visual effects, 80 to 85 percent was there the first couple of times you try. It's really that last 15 percent that is incredibly difficult to get."

Aslan also required human facial expressions to reflect his noble personality, but since certain scenes were shot before Liam Neeson was cast as Aslan's voice, the filmmakers looked elsewhere for inspiration.

"We went to Gregory Peck from 'To Kill a Mockingbird.' The Atticus Finch character had some of the same regal qualities that we wanted," says Westenhofer. "We took traits of Gregory Peck from that movie and then took our Aslan facial rig and built our library of shapes. Wonderfully enough, Liam Neeson's performance gelled perfectly well with our Aslan character."

The filmmakers didn't completely rely on computer graphics, though. Three types of hands-on Aslans were made for the film as well, including a puppet for the stone table scene, a full-sized stand-in for blocking and lighting, and a mechanical bull-type Aslan that Lucy and Susan (Georgie Henley and Anna Popplewell) ride to battle.

This mix of CG and practical effects was especially necessary for "Narnia's" numerous hybrid creatures. The centaurs and fauns featured human actors with prosthetic makeup effects wearing lime green tights, which would be replaced by animal legs via computer graphics during post production. The unique nature of this collaboration created an atmosphere of mutual admiration on set.

"We ended up building some practical legs which we sent over for reference, but (the CG ones) were far, far superior to what we were able to build," says prosthetic makeup designer Howard Berger. "The first time I saw the film, and Mr. Tumnus came out, I gasped out loud. It was the first time I had seen Mr. Tumnus with legs. I had spent eight months looking at green legs with orange dots all over them. So when Mr. Tumnus played by Jim McAvoy came out, it was like, 'Amazing.' It was exactly how I had always pictured it."

"Narnia" has earned three Oscar nominations for best makeup, visual effects and sound.

As the new "Chronicles of Narnia" DVD hits movie shelves, audiences are eager to experience the magic of the creatures from the big screen in their homes.

Music fans question 'rent or buy'

By Heather Newman
Detroit Free Press

Ask Frank Ginis of Troy, Mich., about online music services a year ago and he could not have cared less.

His collection of CDs, ranging from classical to jazz to blues to show tunes, kept him more than entertained. He didn't own a digital music player. He didn't plan to download music.

But in the past 12 months, all that has changed. He got an MP3 player as a freebie when buying some cellular phones. And while Ginis, 42, still prefers CDs when purchasing albums, he's now shopping for a good music service to use for singles.

"There are certain songs that I like that I don't want to buy an entire CD for," he said. "I'd like to be able to play those songs when I like, because they aren't on the radio too often. I'm just looking for stuff I can burn on a CD. I can't imagine I'll be a download junkie ... but you never know."

Fortunately, Ginis has a pile of alternatives for finding that copy of Todd Rundgren's "Hello It's Me" and the other two dozen songs he's looking for. (iTunes alone has a couple dozen versions of the track.) Music services, whether they rent you a song for a month or let you keep it forever, have become part of the American entertainment landscape.

One sign that the selection out there is maturing is that you've now got two choices when you go to buy music downloads: You can rent them by the month, or buy them and keep them forever. Some services offer both options.

Rented music acts just like the real thing — it sits on your hard drive, where you can play it whenever you want. Services like Napster To Go even let you download it to compatible MP3 players, so you can take it with you. But like your electric service, if you fail to pay your bill, at the end of the month the lights go out — your tunes will no longer play.

Purchased songs are yours to keep forever, but even they might have some limitations. Some can only be listened to on a limited number of computers or portable players. Some can only be burned onto a CD once.

Others allow unlimited personal use — including just about the entire collection of Audio Lunchbox, a nifty alternative music service.

If your music tastes change often — you get into a song, love it and then are ready to leave it after a while — then renting music is something you should seriously consider. Rental is much cheaper than buying tunes because you have access to the service's entire catalog — Napster To Go has 1.5 million songs, for example — at any time. (A basic Napster subscription runs about $10 a month; Napster To Go, which allows you to take the tunes on a portable player, runs about $15.)

But if you love your songs and plan to keep them forever — even as your budget and your attention shifts to other things — you might consider sticking with a pay-as-you-go plan. Most services charge about 99 cents a song or $9.99 an album for music, thanks in part to Apple's industry-leading iTunes price plans.

Nathan Bomey, 21, a senior at Eastern Michigan University, used Napster through the university's cheap agreement with them before switching to iTunes. He listens to contemporary Christian and Top 40 music in his car, walking around campus and working out at the campus recreation center.

"It was a nice experiment ... With Napster, you can't keep the songs permanently. I didn't see the point in renting the songs. It was nice being able to get a taste of every song, but I generally know what songs I like, what artists I like," he said. "iTunes isn't perfect, but it seems to supply better options for me."

There are notable holes in the collections of all the music services. While you'll find two dozen versions of that Todd Rundgren song, you're not going to find much from the Beatles. That's because some bands, or their publishers, haven't made deals that cover digital music rights.

Out-of-print songs, including older versions of your favorites, are typically not available. Think of the major services as incredibly complete big box stores of music: You're not going to find everything there and there isn't anyone around to help you track down obscure tunes. For those, you're better off searching sites like eBay for original CDs or LPs.

Fortunately, for some genres, there are niche services that can help. Audio Lunchbox has a terrific collection of alternative bands, ranging from metal to hard rock to pop to folk. Recent Top 10 sellers included folk singer Stephan Smith's Mark Knopfler-esque, mostly spoken ode to people who aren't cowboys, and the cheerful, hook-y rock stylings of Hellogoodbye. Well-known names include Death Cab for Cutie, Marcy Playground, Blink 182 and Queens of the Stone Age.

Al Tochet of Bloomfield Hills, Mich., wrote recently to say he's thinking of moving into digital music to find some of his classical favorites.

"I do not have an iPod or anything similar, but am ready to take the plunge," he said. "I am a fancier of classical music and pop music of the '50s and '60s."

Tochet will likely find what he's looking for at eClassical.com, another niche service that caters to the classical music crowd.

Regardless of your tastes, digital music has definitely hit its stride. It's commonly available, cheap and legitimate, and the software that comes with most sites makes it a one-button operation to burn a CD or transfer music to your portable player.

The iPod Shuffle, seen above, is only one of many devices which pepper the digital age of music.

Aspiring Mexican musicians look to spread their influence

By Justino Aguila
The Orange County Register

Ask any regional Mexican musician his inspiration and almost everyone points to Los Tigres del Norte. The five-member norteno band of siblings and extended family moved to San Jose from Sinaloa in the 1960s and went on to become icons of the genre.

"Tigres del Norte are the ultimate rags-to-riches story, and particularly for Mexican musicians on this side of the border," said Elijah Wald, an expert in Latin music and the author of "Narcocorrido."

"Tigres came here from Mexico as teenagers with nothing and became the biggest stars, but they have never for a second let go of their roots."

Regional Mexican music encompasses many sounds from various parts of Mexico. Marco Antonio Gonzales, a former publicity manager for the leading Latin label Univision Music Group, sees the genre as having two deep-rooted influences.

The first area stems from the instruments, Gonzales said. There are many brass instruments in regional Mexican, which is influenced by polka and other European styles.

"The second component of the genre is the cultural and intangible rustic characteristics that traditionally has been the music of the masses or proletariat," Gonzales said. "The music finds its origins in the social fabric of the Mexican population, pre-Revolution and pre-modern music."

Here is a guide to some of those sounds:

Mariachi: The mother of regional Mexican music. Elements in this music are most often heard at events such as Cinco de Mayo. This is the symbol of Mexican music and culture. A group usually comprises five or more musicians. Linda Ronstadt made the music more popular in 1987 with "Canciones de Mi Padre" ("My Father's Songs"), a collection of Mexican ballads her father enjoyed.

Ranchera: This is not a separate genre, but a subset of mariachi music. Songs originated from rural ranches around the time of the Mexican Revolution in 1910. This sound is the closest Latin style to American country music, with singers performing in traditional cowboy attire. Life in the country and lost love are common themes, combined often with passionate cries and cackles to add spark to the melodies.

Norteno: This music was born in northern Mexico and is most popular with those along the border. It's influenced by other types of music, including the polka and the waltz, but it clearly has the country music sound, with uptempo compositions performed on instruments that include the accordion and the booming bajo sexto, a 12-string guitar.

Banda: The word means "band," and this type of music is mostly played with a brass ensemble. The music emerged from the Mexican state of Sinaloa. Featured instruments include percussion, trumpets, trombones and tubas. It's often compared to the American big band sound.

Cumbia: The Mexican cumbia is almost always uptempo dance-tropical music with influences from Colombia, where the style is especially popular.

Durangueme: This is a 21st-century creation from the state of Durango with a strong following in the United States. This uptempo style, popular at Mexican dance clubs, uses a pipe organ as the main instrument. The sound is a variation of banda music.

King loses spark with 'Cell'

By Jessica Ellertson
The Daily Cardinal (U. Wisconsin)

MADISON, Wis. — Roaming charges and dropped calls are the least of your concerns. What if instead of a bomb or biological warfare, terrorists attack using your cell phone? This is the basic premise of "Cell," Stephen King's newest thriller.

The novel tells the story of Clay Riddell and various other refugees in the aftermath of The Pulse, an unexplained "virus" that attacks people through their cell phones. Violence ensues as the "phone crazies" first attack each other, and then begin to evolve into zombie-like creatures with group telepathic powers. The only ones saved from this terrible fate are the people not using their cell phones during or after The Pulse. The story follows Clay and his loyal band of followers as they head north in search of loved ones. Making various stops along the way, more people join their group in the struggle for survival in a now-uncertain world.

While the first couple of chapters promise an intriguing story, King, known for leaving plot details open to interpretation, makes this particular plot too loosely-woven for comfort. The story dawdles for most of the novel and the ending leaves much to be desired. The lack of plot fails to make the novel what it could really be — a tantalizing and frightening zombie thriller. While there are indeed many instances of graphically-explained violence, it is nothing that frightens. King also limits the reader's knowledge about what is happening in the aftermath of The Pulse to the perspectives of a handful of survivors. While it would seem that this narrowed scope might provide some insight into the characters, it also limits true understanding of what is really happening in the world.

Furthermore, there is an extreme lack of character development. After a cursory explanation, King never elaborates on what makes these characters tick. Readers are told that Clay is separated from his wife and is worried for his son's safety, but not much more. The other main character, Tom, is an older man with a strong love for his cat. The interaction between Tom, Clay and the younger Jordan leaves the reader confused. The constant touching and kissing seems odd and misplaced. In addition, the relationship between Clay and the 15-year-old Alice is worrisome. While it certainly makes sense that these two people would turn to each other for comfort after the terrible events they witness, the line that should exist between a full-grown man and an underage girl seems to be quite blurred.

The book does have its good points, however. King draws his inspiration from zombie-flick director George Romero and horror-fantasy author Richard Matheson, whom he acknowledges in his dedication. As such, his descriptions of the zombies are realistic and imaginative. The fact that the telepathic messages between the zombies are sent through some of the worst "elevator music" ever written is King's own little joke.

Overall, this is not the worst book ever written, but it lacks the spark of King's classics such as "Carrie" and "Salem's Lot." If you are looking for a frightening zombie thriller from one of the world's best writers, keep looking. Wait until King publishes a new novel and hope that he regains some of his old spark.

Latino bands find a growth spurt in self storage

By Justino Aguila
The Orange County Register

SANTA ANA, Calif. — The long hallways are refrigerator-cold and silent when no one is there, but those who filter in nightly transform the narrow walkways into something of an undiscovered world.

Juxtaposed against bright orange walls, where rolling steel doors rumble loudly as they open and close, musicians assemble inside small storage spaces most evenings shortly after the sun has set. Outside it is relatively quiet except for faint sounds: accordions, electric guitars, keyboards and drums from somewhere inside the long rectangular buildings.

It looks like any other day at Townsend Self Storage in Santa Ana, where two structures holding 300 units in this industrial neighborhood keep each renter's personal items safe. But for dozens of musicians, these walls symbolize more than just space to store their instruments.

This is a place of dreaming, where these musicos specialize in several types of regional Mexican music, one of the most popular Latin genres. They rehearse here to become better so that ultimately they can perform in local nightclubs as a launching pad to someday getting on the radio.

Townsend Self Storage where bands usually gather after work, staying until the gates close at 9 p.m. — is a safe place for musicians. The rooms, often 10-by-10 feet and costing about $130 a month to rent, are relatively out-of-the-way spaces where bands can perfect their showmanship skills, choose play lists for upcoming shows and decide on their schedules for performances that can pay anywhere from $200 to $400 a night.

"It really is a place of culture and we encourage that," said Ruben Rivera, a regional manager for TNT Storage Management, the company that manages the facility. "We try to reach the Latino population of Santa Ana and cater to that particular culture and language. There's a certain respect here that you won't find at other rental storage places."

Townsend Self Storage was never meant to be a haven for bands, but when Rivera's employer began managing the place two years ago, it was already established as a practice venue, with about two dozen groups rehearsing there. Hoping to attract more traditional rental clients, the property managers started asking bands to vacate, but eventually the company realized that some of its best customers were the musical groups.

"Unlike other rental places, Townsend gives us the opportunity to rehearse," said Victor Nova, 28, whose band Grupo Prisionero has used the site for four years. "Behind these gates is a community of bands who often count on each other. Whether it's about music, compositions or finding a venue to perform, many bands work together because we have the same aspirations."

Others agree.

"We can be loud, too!" said Felipe Gutierrez, 23, a landscaper who plays the drums for Juventud Musical. "Having our own space gives us the time to focus on the music. If we can't make a gig, we can tell another band we trust about the job and they'll likely take it."

Currently there are about a dozen bands who use the place to practice several times a week for weekend performances at weddings, quinceaneras and dance clubs from Orange County to San Francisco.

The musicians, usually five or six in a group, are determined to succeed at their lifelong endeavors. For them, the music speaks to their cultural pride as they perform songs that tell of everything from legendary drug-trafficking lords to supreme love in tales as lyrically rich as old-fashioned American country music.

For decades, these musicians, and those who came before them, have lived the musical stories that speak of their traditions, roots, sacrifices and their lives on the fringes of survival, a microcosm of their existence in the United States.

"When I was a kid I always dreamed of being a big star," said Arturo Gonzalez Rivera, 35, the lead singer of the Santa Ana band Desafio Norteno. "The person who doesn't dream, doesn't live."

Affirmations like those brought Gonzalez Rivera to Orange County in 1999. He left Mexico and his family's bakery, a panaderia, for the chance to pursue his musical dreams in California. Like any aspiring artist, the singer with the deep voice and charming onstage persona knew it was going to be challenging to make his way into the music business, one beset with moments of promise and disappointments.

"You learn more than anything that this industry is 60 percent fantasy," Gonzalez Rivera said with a hint of sarcasm. "Whatever they tell you, 1 percent is true. What you learn is to have thick skin and learn to decipher when someone is telling you the truth or not."

Gonzalez Rivera's story epitomizes scores of musicians in search of the one big break that could propel their careers. The genre has done so well for so long that recording labels, both independent and mainstream, continue looking for bandas.

While Latin pop music often gets more play on awards shows such as the Latin Grammys and the traditional Grammy telecast, regional Mexican — which includes norteno and ranchera among other types of music — resonates more with millions of Mexican-Americans who find comfort in musical stories that speak to their experiences.

Gonzalez Rivera has managed to stay focused on his music even though his job as a computer technician keeps him busy most days. After five years of performing together, his band finally secured a record deal last year with independent Premier Image Entertainment based in Claremont. Calif. Desafio Norteno's first commercial CD will be released later this year.

"They're old-school, they work hard and they're consistent," said Luis Alvarado, 40, president and CEO of Premier Image Entertainment. "Desafio Norteno is not the most polished band, but they put everything on the line and their music is a good reflection of things that a lot of people are listening to right now."

Gonzalez Rivera, who has been singing since he was a child, speaks of the music business with optimism, even after the band encountered road blocks. In recent days the band fired one of its members for failing to show up to a job.

The hardest lessons, however, come from business deals, Gonzalez Rivera said. Last year a high-profile businessman in Latin entertainment asked the Desafio Norteno to open for a major Latin rock band. Later it was asked to be a signature band for a major sports team and also write its theme song.

Things looked to be changing for the better, but no opportunities materialized in the end except false promises. Faithfully, the band members returned to Townsend Self Storage where a community of other musicians encouraged them not to give up.

For these musicians, there is more at stake because collectively they make decisions to pool their money for CDs, posters, business cards, calendars and hotels, meals and gasoline when they tour.

Manuel Arenas, 31, and his Santa Ana band, Grupo Alma, practice at their storage space three times a week. Like most bands, they play a variety of styles of music.

For Arenas, a construction worker, making it as a music artist is something he has wanted since he was 9, when he started learning to play the guitar.

"I loved the Beatles," Arenas said. "I was lucky that my parents were able to afford classes and instruments for me, but I know not everyone had those opportunities."

Arenas continued studying music into his adulthood and eventually went on to perform with three local bands in Acapulco, where he grew up. Later he moved to Florida to study music and then briefly returned to Mexico before finally settling in Orange County.

"Most of us move for a better life," Arenas said. "You leave the people you love behind, but you make your own trail with the idea of making your dreams a reality. There's a lot of sentimentality and sadness, but at the same time there is hope and satisfaction."

Arenas, who has lived in Santa Ana for eight years, writes his own music and is now actively searching for a way to get record labels interested in his band's sound, which is a mix of several genres including cumbias and romantic music.

"Having a band is not easy because not everyone can handle concerts, rehearsals and touring," said Arenas, who has gone through several drummers. "Sometimes people romanticize the music business, but it's really a lot of hard work."

Gonzalez Rivera, who is already promoting his band on an Internet radio show that reaches a national audience, is preparing to take another good year. All of the Desafio Norteno members have full-time jobs, but they are still planning a busy schedule of nightly events, including local television appearances as a way to announce the arrival in the music business of their first commercial studio album.

"Dreaming is important because it gives you need to feel passionate about something in order to live the life you want to live every day," Rivera said. "That's what it's about. We made a dream. We fought a dream."

New vision, music with Guns N' Roses current resurfacing

"Don't you wish your girlfriend was hot like me?" And can you believe that a slew of people bought this record? The contemporary musical climate is in heinous disrepair, which is certainly a qualifier for understatement of the year. Not that it particularly matters, music is now just another distraction for the ADD generation. So in our age of celebrating the gold digger, a time when we still deny that the Rolling Stones have stopped rocking and when a singer can make unsavory implications about our girlfriend's attractiveness without a pimp slap, it might be easy to miss the dust clouds in the horizon. Something big is coming our way and I implore you to heed my warning.

"Chinese Democracy" is at the verge of changing the world as we know it. This is not a political revolution, turning international dynamics upside down and inside out, but rather a rock 'n' roll revelation. Close to twenty years ago, a band of five destructive, neurotic, dysfunctional gypsies trampled all over a decade's worth of hapless bands, had their way with our older sisters and their friends and in a shocking display of consideration warned, "You're in the jungle baby. You're gonna die." This was during the rule of Guns N' Roses, who with one record almost instantly made the jump from Hollywood alley trash to the undeniable biggest thing to hit the music world since Led Zeppelin set their sights on the Western shore.

for three years, from 1972-74, and was 16th on the UMass all-time scoring chart and ninth in assists by the time he finished his college career.

"[Leaman] is a tremendous ambassador," Skinner said. "I'm happy for his family and I'm happy for his university because I think it shows some classy recognition."

Julius Erving played for Leaman from 1966-71 and was an All-American in 1970-71.

"[Leaman] had a fundamental knowledge of the game," Erving said. "He had the player's perspective, the passion for the game. Jack always tried to stay current with how the game had evolved. He was a sharing-type guy, whether he was talking to a group or team in practice or taking a guy one-on-one."

A warm applause followed the conclusion of the video. Chancellor John Lombardi took the microphone and made a brief speech, declaring how much Leaman meant to the University.

"Jack Leaman was one of the best people we could hope to know. When you spoke to him you knew you were talking to the soul of this place," Lombardi said. "We're delighted to be here today to dedicate this court to Jack Leaman. Go UMass!"

And with that burst of enthusiasm, the black sheet was slowly pulled off the hardwood floor, revealing the lettering that spelled out, "Jack Leaman Court."

Leaman's wife Rita spoke after the lengthy applause died down.

"This is certainly overwhelming and it's the highest tribute that the University could pay to Jack. I want to thank everyone here for being here today to share this with us," Leaman said. "As Jack looks down on us, I think he would be astonished at how many people think he is deserving of this."

From Leaman to Ford

In Saturday's game against the Dayton Flyers, the Massachusetts men's basketball team (12-13, 7-7 Atlantic 10) was sluggish in the first half. It faced a three-point deficit going into the break and UMass coach Travis Ford was not pleased with the effort.

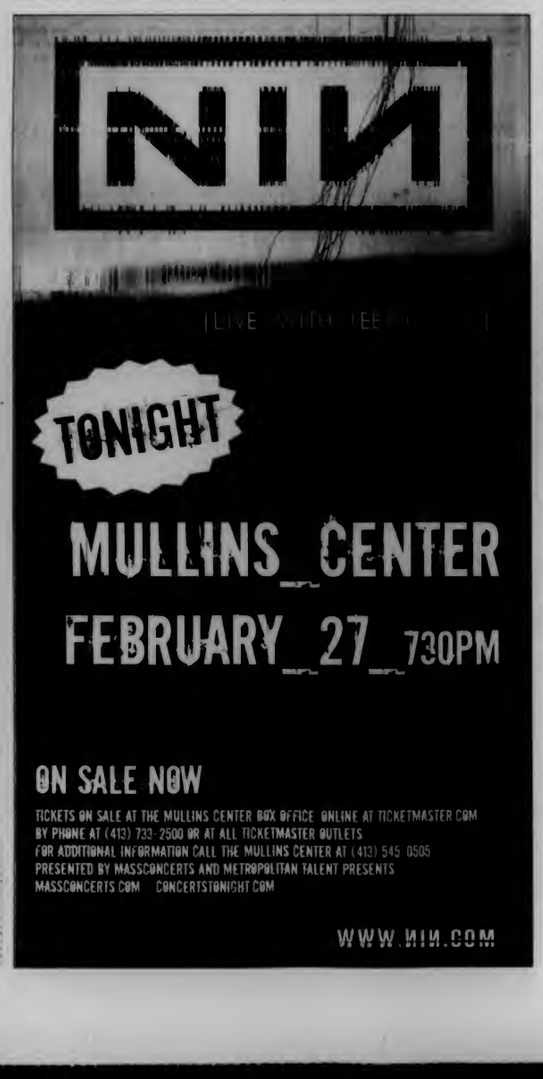
The new coach, according to his players, was animated at halftime, and got on his big men for their rebounding woes.

While Ford was fuming in the locker room, Jack Leaman was honored on the Mullins Center floor, the former coach who won 217 games at the helm. There were high expectations for these Minutemen, who watched the ceremonial video before the game on Saturday and felt the need to win in light of the occasion.

"It was a little added pressure," senior Jeff Viggiano said. "We came out and saw [Leaman's name] and that motivated everybody. I know it motivated me."

"For two years [Leaman] was always around," Viggiano continued. "I saw him every day. He was just a great guy. He helped me out a lot with my shooting."

"I knew that this was a great win for UMass," junior captain Rashaun Freeman said. "I learned a lot from [Leaman]. I knew he was a good guy, and he had a lot to bring to the game. He gave me a lot from a little time."



Ford, the newest member of the UMass basketball community, arrived after Leaman passed, but through the University, the Kentucky grad learned how much Jack Leaman meant to the Amherst community.

"I learned a lot about [Leaman] through coach Pitino," Ford said. "He helped [Pitino] grow as a person and helped him grow into the person he is today. It wasn't until I got here that I understood how much he was admired as a person. He's what UMass basketball's about.

"He's the face of UMass basketball," Ford added. "And that says a lot when you've had Julius Erving and John Calipari walk through this campus."

The Mullins Center court was dedicated to UMass legend Jack Leaman during halftime of Saturday's game between the Minutemen and Dayton. Numerous former players turned out to honor the late coach.

captain hit two free throws with his seventh and eighth points of the afternoon at the 10:30 mark to give his team a 47-37 lead.

Freeman gave UMass a spark around the 15-minute mark of the second half when he scored, blocked a shot, then scored again on an assist from Lowe on a fast break. It gave UMass a 38-34 lead and some needed energy.

Milligan stole a pass on the ensuing Dayton possession and pushed it ahead to Lowe, who dished it to Life going to the basket. Life drew a foul and hit the two free throws to push the UMass lead to 40-34, then Freeman scored again at the 13:23 mark, extending the lead to six points.

The first half was back and forth with lead changes scattered throughout the action. It was 7-5 UMass three minutes into the game after a Life 3-pointer found the bottom of the net off of a ball reversal from Lowe. Life hit his second three of the game at the 14:36 mark, burying the jump shot from left side and giving UMass a 10-9 lead. Life finished with five treys on the day.

Lasme cracked the scoreboard with a couple of free throws at the 10:10 mark of the first half to give UMass a 14-13 lead. Ford was forced to call a timeout at the 8:32 mark, after a defensive lapse left Dayton guard Warren Williams a free look at a 3-pointer. Williams hit that shot en route to 13 points, which led the Flyers, on 3-of-3 shooting from behind the arc.

Junior guard James Life tied a career-high with 25 points in a 66-47 win over Dayton on Saturday. The win improved UMass's record to 12-13.

Dayton continued to wear down the UMass guard tandem of Life and Lowe, running them off numerous screens every offensive possession and making them work hard on the defensive end. Lowe looked exhausted in the first half, which wasn't a good sign for Ford, considering Lowe is the only true point guard on the UMass squad and plays over 35 minutes a game.

shooting only 34 percent from the field. The Minutewomen got the job done on offense as well, shooting 50 percent from the field, and 80 percent from the free throw line.

However, the afternoon belonged to the three UMass seniors. Ashley Sharpton, Katie Nelson and Patrycja Gulak all said farewell to the Mullins Center crowd yesterday in their final regular season game wearing the Maroon and White.

The trio combined for 17 points in yesterday's win, and Dacko has taken much pleasure to have been able to be their leader over the past few years.

"They've been very enjoyable to coach," Dacko said. "They bring a great deal of intensity, and the will to win. Katie brings a consistent game everyday at practice. Ashley wants a career in coaching, Katie is going to probably be an official and Patrycja is going on to business school. So all three of them are very different with what they bring. And again, they've been a joy to coach."

UMass women's basketball turned into a second home for Sharpton and because of that, senior day was an emotional one for the guard from Georgia.

"I wouldn't want to be anywhere else," Sharpton said. "I transferred here, and there's no place I'd rather be. I've had my ups and downs with injuries and having to sit out, but this is my home.

"[I'll miss] my teammates and my coaches, and the game of basketball. They're not only my teammates, they're my family. That goes with the coaches, too. You spend so much time with these people. This is my family. That's going to be the hardest part."

Even though Sharpton will be done playing basketball after this season, that doesn't mean she will walk away from the game completely.

"I'm looking into coaching, so I'm still going to be involved in basketball. But as far as losing my teammates, I'll never lose them as my friends because they're family."

Gulak's basketball experience has been one to remember, and she gave much praise to the fans that have supported her throughout the years.

"It's been fun," Gulak said. "We have good coaches and great teammates. I'll miss the fans because they are there, and they know our names. They created a fun atmosphere, so that made me feel good."

With senior day, marking the end of an era for the three seniors, Nelson is extremely grateful of everything around her at UMass, but remains confident that the next game won't be her last.

"I want to thank them for everything," Nelson said. "I wouldn't be anything without them. My teammates and coaching staff have been really supportive and great to work with throughout the years. It's just a nice ending to my five years here."

"I'm just glad we're ending the regular season on a positive note. In other seasons, we didn't end on a positive note and went into the A-10 tournament on a low note. But we have been playing really well lately, and hopefully we'll be able to bring that into the tournament and make my last year here a special one."

"I'm going to miss basketball in general," Nelson said. "I'm probably not going to play anywhere else. I'm going to miss the experience of being on a team and having great friendships with my teammates."

Senior point guard Katie Nelson had five points and three rebounds in a 63-55 win over La Salle on Sunday in the final game of the regular season.

Ski teams gear up for Nationals which accepts the five best teams from the EOSC.

Sunday was an improvement over Saturday for both teams. The men, once again led by Hawkins, placed first overall in Sunday's giant slalom, earning the Minutemen the regional championship.

Hawkins stood alone on the slopes that day, winning the event by three seconds over teammate Small, who was second overall and finished another full second ahead of the third place finisher.

Bachant finished 14th for the Minutemen, giving the team the top two skiers and three in the top 15.

The race was oddly similar to last year's EOSC giant slalom, in which Hawkins finished first by a two-second margin ahead of second place Small. Bachant even got in on the consistency. He placed 17th last year, making this year an improvement for him.

The women's team saw even greater improvements in the giant slalom, finishing second as a team, and third overall on the weekend.

Eliza Hawkins finished second individually, making up for Saturday's fall. Making a huge leap up the leader board was freshman Erica Mains, who finished 10th overall, a career best. Mains had the fifth best time in her second run alone. Rauh followed, placing 20th, giving the Minutewomen three skiers in the top 20.

"I can't say I'm surprised [with Mains's performance Sunday] because she's been doing it all year at practice," UMass coach Justin Rouleau said. "It was nice to see it come out on race day."

Rouleau is in his first year as head coach of both the men's and women's teams after spending a year as an assistant coach at Harvard. With consecutive regional titles coming into the weekend, Rouleau knew there was some pressure on him.

"I'm relieved," he said Sunday. "We put a lot of work into this all year and for it to come together like this is a big relief."

The Minutemen and women will hope to see more of the same next week at the USCSA Nationals, where last year Rush Hawkins became the first American in 10 years to sweep the event, winning both the slalom and giant slalom as a sophomore.

Minoso paved the way for many

after breaking in with the Indians following his three-year stint as a member of the New York Cubans team in the Negro National League. His transition was relatively smooth because of his effervescent personality, and his passion as a player.

"Minnie has an elegance, grace and humor, no bitterness," Burgos said.

And he had style.

"I swear," Pierce said, "he had the sharpest crease in his pants. He was an immaculate dresser."

All that didn't go unnoticed by Bill Veeck.

"Bill had great affection for Minnie," said Roland Hemond, who became the Sox's general manager in 1970, served under Veeck in 1975-81 and still works as an adviser to the club. "I remember when Bill came back [in 1975], he said, 'Where's Minnie?' And I said, 'He's playing in Puerto Vallarta in the Mexican Winter League. His son is batting third and Minnie is batting fourth.'"

Veeck brought him back, and while coaching in 1976, Minoso was activated. It happened again in 1980 to give him one more decade for a seemingly ageless body. It was more than a Veeck stunt; "it was very meaningful to Minnie," Hemond said.

After his first retirement, Minoso became a community representative for the Sox, had his No. 9 retired in 1983 and was honored in 2004 with a life-sized sculpture on the U.S. Cellular Field center-field concourse.

the afternoon.

Schneider proceeded to make a couple difficult saves in the next two minutes before Morris netted his first goal of the season to give the Minutemen a 3-0 lead.

"My defense played great," Schneider said. "They kept the guys to low angles and far out. It's my job to back them up. They just played great defense and that helped out."

"If you do prepare the right way, you're hopefully going to go out onto the field and perform," Cannella said of Schneider. "He is a strong-willed kid and a very good leader. You're nervous for him [as a freshman], but you have confidence in his ability to go out there and lead."

After Iannucci got the Pride on the board, UMass went on a 4-1 run to go ahead 7-2. Morris set up three of those four goals, including redshirt freshman Evan Blum's first career score, which came on a rocket over Southard's right shoulder.

"We were just able to move the ball unbelievably well," Morris said. "We got some easy looks so it's a credit to the whole team."

Though Morris stole the statistical show, the Minutemen got key efforts from a number of different players, including a two-goal performance by Jamie Yaman, a two-assist day from Brett Garber and goals from Pat Larmon, Andrew Recchione and Jim Connolly — the first of his career.

"You hope those guys can be consistent," Cannella said. "I think a goal of every team is to be as consistent as you possibly can with your effort every day. I think it means a lot to those guys that they're able to get that opportunity, and hopefully they will continue to take advantage of it."

Senior attackman Sean Morris tied a career-high with eight points on three goals and five assists in an 11-7 win against Hofstra on Sunday.

Rain washes out tournament

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

What began as a rough trip south for the Massachusetts softball team (1-6) was cut short by heavy rains Saturday at the National Fastpitch Coaches' Association Leadoff Classic in Columbus, Ga.

The Minutewomen are off this weekend but return to action next week at the South Florida-Adidas Spring Break Invitational in Tampa, Fla.

The tournament began Friday with UMass slated to face three opponents and then proceeding to seeded bracket play. The Minutewomen never made it to the third team. After two losses Friday to No. 12 Northwestern and Illinois State, UMass's game with No. 24 Louisville was postponed from Saturday to Sunday due to heavy rains that made the field unplayable.

Sunday, however, the weather only worsened and the rest of the tournament was cancelled. With only so many chances to face ranked opponents, the team was disappointed at missing this opportunity.

"It's like these games were never scheduled and never existed, so it's pretty frustrating to lose these games [on our schedule]," UMass coach Elaine Sortino said.

The games that did take place before weather abbreviated play were difficult for the Minutewomen to swallow. Errors and missteps were costly, and left the Maroon and White with a five-game losing streak.

UMass first faced off against No. 12 Northwestern on what was already a wet and soggy field. The Minutewomen committed three errors early in the game and were not able to recover from them. Sortino said the field conditions contributed to the team's struggles.

"It was a slow field and we weren't coming to get the ball. We weren't finishing [plays] and we got caught in between hops," Sortino said.

"Every field plays a little different and this one was kind of slow and lumpy."

The key play in the game came in the third inning. What should have been an inning-ending double-play for the Minutewomen turned into a two-run score for the Wildcats.

"We had a great relay in from the left fielder in the corner to the shortstop [and then] to the plate to get the out, and then back to third base to get the trailing out, and none of the umpires were looking," Sortino said.

The Wildcats were credited with two unearned runs on the error.

That put the Minutewomen behind 4-0, and they were not able to recover, falling by a score of 7-2.

Later on Friday, the Maroon and White met Illinois State in another wet, sloppy game. Senior pitcher Jenna Busa was not on her game that day and it showed, as she allowed five run in the first two innings, putting the Minutewomen in a hole they could not dig out of.

Freshman pitcher Brandice Balschmiter came in for Busa and held the Redbirds scoreless through the next four-plus innings, including seven strikeouts, but the offense was only able to muster two runs. UMass dropped its second that day 5-2.

"In the second inning it got away from us quickly. We made a change and we held them [to five runs] but we couldn't get the runs across the plate," Sortino said. "We had our chances to keep a rally going and just didn't finish."

Minoso possible Hall inductee

By Dave van Dyck
Knight Ridder

CHICAGO — A 12-member committee will consider 39 players from the Negro Leagues and pre-Negro Leagues eras for induction into baseball's Hall of Fame, including Minnie Minoso.

Question: So was Minoso black or Latino? Answer: Yes.

You see, Minoso was both.

And though he was born in Cuba and played only three years in the Negro Leagues before reaching the majors, many expect Minoso to join the elite in Cooperstown when the special committee's vote is announced Monday.

Label him as you will, Saturno Orestes Arrieta Armas Minoso opened up an entire region for talent and eventually helped players from Latin America such as Sammy Sosa to blend easily into the modern fabric of the national pastime.

Or, as Orlando Cepeda wrote: "Minnie is to Latin players what Jackie Robinson is to black players."

There had been Latinos in the major leagues for years, but none black like Minoso, who broke in briefly with Cleveland in 1949 and became the first black White Sox player in 1951. And so it is that Minoso, now allegedly 83 years old and still a frequent, colorful presence around the ballpark, finally may reach the Hall of Fame, as much for who he was as how he played.

"He opened an important opportunity for other Latinos to follow," said Adrian Burgos, a University of Illinois professor who specializes in U.S. Latino history, African-American studies, sport and urban history. "The story of Negro [Leagues] baseball is incomplete without a discussion of Latinos."

Burgos is a member of the committee that will consider candidates. The group, he acknowledged, "had long deliberations" about including Latin players.

"But we had been commissioned to cover [baseball's] black history in its entirety," he said. "We need to realize the integration of baseball started with Jackie Robinson, but that didn't answer all the questions. There is an international ramification of black baseball, and Minnie was that link.

"Minnie laid the groundwork for players like Roberto Clemente who came after him, because he was the one who took the pounding and getting hit by pitches."

He did it all with that famous smile and a dash of Latin flair.

"He was friendly all the time," said Billy Pierce, who was a teammate for Minoso's first two tours with the White Sox. "He would get hit by pitches and be smiling all the time. He'd come back to the dugout after being hit and he would say the umpire said he couldn't see the bruise [because of his dark skin]."

In many ways, Minoso was an experiment in the major leagues: a "black" player from the Negro Leagues who spoke broken English at best.

"But he fit right in with our ball club perfectly," Pierce said. "He was colorful and exciting."

He went on to become one of the most popular players in franchise history.

"I don't think his color was played up hardly at all," Pierce remembered. "It was nowhere near like it was with Jackie."

Many Chicagoans remember Minoso as an established player, perhaps in his second tour with the Sox in 1960-61, or perhaps from 1964 or from cameo appearances in 1976 and 1980 that made him a Bill Veeck spectacle as a five-decade player.

step up," Degon said. "There are four guys on this team that have put their heart and soul into this team for four years, so it was a no-brainer going into this game that us four would play our best games."

On Saturday, the Minutemen jumped out to a 3-0 second-period lead, but the Huskies, who needed to win out plus get a lot of help from UMass and UMass Lowell in order to claim a playoff spot, came storming back to trim the deficit.

With NU netminder Adam Geragosian pulled because of an ensuing penalty, Northeastern was mounting a six-on-five attack in the UMass zone. Louis Liotti took a long slap shot from above the right circle that was tipped by Yale Lewis past Winer to trim the margin to 3-1 with just 16 seconds to play before the second intermission.

Then, at the 4:03 mark of the third period, Bryan Esner cut the lead down to 3-2 by picking up a goal that resulted from a tricky bounce in the crease.

"A two-goal lead is the worst lead in hockey," Degon said. "It may have been a wakeup call, but we were playing pretty well so we just needed to keep doing what we were doing."

A little more than 11 minutes later, UMass defenseman John Wessbecker sent a shot through traffic in front of the net that P.J. Fenton collected and banged home for his second goal — and the game's final goal — of the night, giving the Minutemen their 4-2 victory.

UMass freshman Alex Berry potted his first career goal to start the scoring on Senior Night. Fenton was bringing the puck into the zone on the left side and took a slap shot that deflected off of Geragosian's stick straight out to Berry, who finished off the charge at 1:34 of the first.

"Alex has been coming along in the second semester," Cahoon said. "The first semester was a difficult one. He sustained a bad injury and had some adjustment issues that freshmen have coming to college. He got through those, and since he got back from Christmas, his attention to detail has been better, his level of fitness has improved and he has been on the verge of breaking out during the last few weeks. It was nice to see him drive to the net the way he was trained to do and then be a real force in front of the net to tap that one in."

Early in the second, Degon was bringing the puck into the NU zone along the left side with Solon moving with him in the slot. Once Degon bought enough time to draw away the defense, he hit Solon with a crisp pass in the lot slot, and Solon redirected it past Geragosian at the 3:15 mark.

Werner pushed the lead to three goals nearly eight minutes after that. With Northeastern's Ray Ortiz in the box for hooking, Solon worked the puck over to Degon, who took a big slap shot from the high slot that rebounded out to Werner, and he added the finishing touch.

UMass forward Mark Matheson broke through the score sheet on Friday night after one-timing a pass from Chris Capraro over Geragosian's left shoulder 8:37 into the contest.

The Huskies answered the call a little over four minutes later. Joe Vitale made a nice pass from behind the net to Joe Santilli cutting to the net in the low slot. Santilli's first shot was saved by Winer, but he made good with his second bid to tie the game at 1.

Liotti was given a game misconduct for hitting from behind, and the Minutemen capitalized at the tail end of their five-minute man-advantage. Mike Kostka snuck a long pass down to Chris Davis, who was camped out at the left post. Davis' shot was saved, but Fenton collected the rebound and put UMass ahead 2-1 with just under 13 minutes to play.

Northeastern tied the game at the 12:29 mark of the third after benefiting from a controversial no-call by referee Jeff Bunyon. A group of Huskies charged into Winer, who was knocked down in his own crease just before Dennis McCauley forced the puck past the UMass netminder.

It was a similar situation to what happened during UMass's 4-3 overtime win at New Hampshire on Jan. 21, when the Wildcats tied the game at 1 in the first period after Winer was trucked in his crease. Bunyon's crew didn't whistle UNH for a penalty in that game, either.

"It doesn't matter what I think," Cahoon said. "The referee didn't think [he was interfered with]. I have my own thoughts, and we'll get a chance to look at it on tape. Maybe a few other people will get a chance to look at it as well."

Senior defenseman Marvin Degon and UMass secured a spot in the Hockey East playoffs this weekend with a tie and a win against Northeastern.

Ski teams advance to Nationals

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

It was a combination of the usual and the unexpected this weekend in Waterville Valley, NH that pushed the Massachusetts ski team to first and third place finishes at the Eastern Collegiate Ski Conference Regionals.

The Marion and Whitenow advance to the United States Collegiate Ski and Snowboard Association Nationals at Sugarloaf in Maine. The races will begin Sunday and will last all week.

Once again, as the races get bigger, it seems Rush Hawkins gets faster. The junior skier once again dominated the ECSC with teammates Jasin Small and Pat Bachant.

The Minutemen brought home their third consecutive ECSC regional championship, which concluded with the giant slalom on Sunday. Hawkins won the giant slalom event individually for the third straight year as well.

The women recovered from a tough slalom on Saturday to climb to third as a team on the weekend, which was enough for them to advance to the national stage next week.

The event's festivities began Saturday with the slalom event. Hawkins was first individually, leading the team to a second place finish overall behind Plymouth State. Behind Hawkins were Small, who finished fifth, and Bachant, who was 15th overall.

Hawkins was actually well behind after the first run, trailing Plymouth State's Topher Harlow by .8 seconds, a huge margin to overcome in a single run. Yet Hawkins won the second run by an even larger margin, and finished the day more than a full second ahead of second place Harlow.

The women struggled on day one of the event. Sophomore Eliza Hawkins fell during her first run, effectively eliminating her from competition. Hawkins finished the race however, climbing back uphill to the last gate and beginning again, to avoid being scored as "Did Not Finish."

Hawkins' teammates stepped up, however, to bring the team to fifth place overall. Seniors Isabet Rauh and Shaleighne Collins finished 15th and 17th, followed by freshman Erica Mains who finished 20th.

Making the fifth position was significant because it meant the women were still eligible to qualify for the Nationals.

A day to remember at Mullins

Maroon and White rise to occasion in second half of win

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

It was a game highlighted by lockdown defense and ugly, but effective, offense. The Massachusetts men's basketball team (12-13, 7-7 Atlantic 10), down three points going into the break, played inspired basketball in the second half to trounce the Dayton Flyers, 66-47, at the Mullins Center on Saturday.

The Flyers took a 29-26 lead into halftime after freshman Charles Little ended the first frame with a two-handed slam from the right baseline.

The court dedication to former UMass coach and broadcaster Jack Leaman was lengthy and emotional, and as the ceremony went through videos, speeches and tears, a Minuteman loss on Jack Leaman's day seemed more and more unacceptable.

But, appropriately, the Minutemen stormed back and outscored the Flyers 40-18 in the second half to get their seventh win in conference play. UMass held Dayton to 7-of-25 shooting (28 percent) in the second half, led by tough perimeter defense from freshman Chris Lowe, who played his usual 39 minutes.

"It was the tale of two halves, obviously," UMass coach Travis Ford said. "In the first half I was not happy with the way we competed. [Dayton was] being a whole lot more physical than we were.

"This is way too good of a day to not take advantage," Ford added. "They came out and they responded. We executed our offense and got some things that we were looking for."

Junior captain Rashaun Freeman played inspired basketball, scoring 15 of his 19 points after the break and grabbing 12 boards to lead the Minutemen to victory in the late-season win.

Junior sharpshooter James Life scored 25 points on 5-of-14 shooting from beyond the arc and 9-of-19 shooting from the field.

The Minutemen, off of a heartbreaking 72-71 loss to Charlotte on Wednesday, came out sluggish in the first half. The UMass big men tandem of Freeman and junior captain Stephane Lasme combined for just four rebounds in the first frame and heard an earful from Ford at halftime.

"I was not happy with our big men at all [in the first half]," Ford said. "[Lasme] didn't rebound in the first half. Ray only had three rebounds. I was happy with Dante's [Milligan] performance most of the time. The big guys are the key to our basketball team and I'm not just talking about statwise."

Whatever Ford said at halftime worked: Freeman scored 15 points and snatched nine rebounds in the second, while dominating offensively in the post; Lasme altered almost every Flyer shot down the stretch and ended the game with four blocks.

Freeman was instrumental in building UMass's lead down the stretch: he scored twice between the 6:15 and 5:35 marks in the second half continued to demand the ball on the offensive end.

Freeman got his wish when his teammates continually fed the big man on the block — and he went to work, scoring on three consecutive possessions (one ended with an emphatic dunk) to give UMass a 63-42 edge, its biggest of the afternoon.

Karen Winger/Collegian

Junior forward Stephane Lasme had nine points and four blocks in a 66-47 win over Dayton on Saturday at the Mullins Center.

Senior Jeff Viggiano gave UMass a 52-42 lead — with 7:55 left in the second half — on a drive to the right baseline. The defenders came from the weak side and forced him underneath the basket, but Viggiano surfaced on the other side with an up-and-under move that dropped softly in the net.

The Minutemen put constant pressure on the Dayton defense in the second half, abusing defenders off on pick-and-rolls and attacking the basket. Dribble penetration from Lowe or Life usually ended with a feed to Lasme cutting hard to the basket. The junior

Mullins Center court dedicated to legendary coach Jack Leaman

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

Jack Leaman's resume speaks for itself.

He graduated from Boston University in 1959, and led the Terrier basketball team in scoring and assists in his senior season. Seven years later, he took the head coaching job at the University of Massachusetts, which he held for 10 years, and won 217 games — losing just 126 — while leading UMass to six NIT appearances (the NIT was more prestigious than the NCAA at that point). And he won two New England Coach of the Year awards during his tenure at UMass.

Leaman went into broadcasting after his stint on the UMass sidelines, calling games with Bob Behler, the voice of UMass basketball today. In 1987, he took the head coaching job for the women's basketball team and went 14-12, the only winning record for the women's team in 15 years.

And that's just on the basketball court.

Off of the hardwood he was just as influential — helping players, coaches and friends along the way.

Saturday's ceremony during which the Mullins Center court was dedicated to Leaman was proof, if anyone needed any, of the powerful people skills that Leaman possessed, and his willingness to use his influence to help young up-and-comers.

Many former players showed up for the ceremony, which took place at halftime after the Minutemen went into the locker room trailing Dayton 29-26.

Tall men in suits, unmistakably former Leaman players, crowded onto the court for pictures, with one of them up front holding a sign with a picture of Leaman and the words, "A man for all seasons."

Memphis coach and former UMass head man, John Calipari, surprised everyone in attendance when he marched onto the court and sat down, front and center, with Chancellor John Lombardi and Jack's widow, Rita Leaman, to participate in the ceremony.

After photos it was the memorial video, which featured Calipari, Rick Pitino, Al Skinner, Julius Erving and Bruiser Flint, all sharing their experiences with and paying their respects to their former coach.

With the Mullins Center faithful looking on, voices from past and present beamed through the new, shining jumbo-screens on the far ends of the stadium. Here is what some of these basketball legends had to say about Leaman.

Pitino played for UMass as a freshman in 1971, Erving's last season as a Minuteman, and played for Leaman until he graduated in 1974. Pitino's first coaching job was at BU, Leaman's alma mater, and Leaman was instrumental in getting the young UMass-grad his first coaching stint.

"Jack Leaman was responsible for getting me [the BU] job," Pitino said. "He took a shot for me and it was the starting point for me. So he meant so much to me personally."

UM nets playoff berth

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts hockey team (13-18-1, 10-14-1 Hockey East) took three points from Northeastern (3-22-7, 3-15-7 HEA) in its home-and-home series this weekend to lock up a spot in the Hockey East tournament and effectively eliminate the Huskies from postseason play.

The Minutemen skated to a 2-2 tie with Northeastern in front of 2,503 fans at Matthews Arena in Boston on Friday night before taking down the Huskies 4-2 on Senior Night at the Mullins Center in front of 6,252 on Saturday.

UMass takes the ice next and finishes up regular season play this weekend with a two-game road trip to Maine, which is still alive for the Hockey East regular season championship.

"It's nice to have it out of the way," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "It would have been nice to do it last weekend against Vermont, but we knew we had to follow through with the commitment this week to get it done. We certainly didn't want to have to go up to Maine [to try to get into the playoffs].

"I want to focus on playing at Maine and improving and making some gains there and not feel like the weight of the world is on our shoulders because the following week, whether we like it or not, the weight of the world is on our shoulders in the playoffs. We need to go up there and use it as an opportunity and just let it all hang out and get some points. With the playoffs already being in place, that allows us to do that."

Senior captain Stephen Werner, who scored the game-winning goal on Saturday, said it was just a matter of time before UMass locked up a postseason bid.

"We knew that with the way we were playing that it was probably going to happen eventually," Werner said. "I don't want to say that there isn't any pressure on us now because we have a big weekend going into Maine. We like to go up there and battle hard. It's good to know that we're in the playoffs, but at the same time, the important hockey is ahead of us."

Besides Werner, the other three seniors also stepped up and played an important role during their final night of hockey at the Mullins Center. Marvin Degon picked up a pair of assists on Saturday to give him three helpers on the weekend, and Jamie Solon scored his seventh goal of the season, which added to his career year.

Gabe Winer stopped 43 of the 47 shots he saw in the two games, and he earned his 50th career win with his 12-save showing on Saturday. And when all is said and done, this quartet has become the winningest class in UMass hockey history.

"Every game, you've got to look for your senior leadership to

Seniors shine in last home game

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

Thursday night after practice, junior captain Matt Anderson said that the whole Massachusetts hockey team would be pulling for the four seniors who were set to play their last game at the Mullins Center Saturday night against Northeastern.

It turned out that the Minutemen's seniors took the whole team on their backs instead of the other way around. The 4-2 win over the Huskies was witnessed by 6,252 fans that came out to see all four seniors contribute to the victory that clinched a conference playoff berth.

When it was all said and done the senior class recorded four points on the night. Jamie Solon and Stephen Werner notched scores and Marvin Degon tallied two assists. Also, netminder Gabe Winer made 12 saves en route to his 50th career win.

"It definitely does feel great to know that all four of us had a hand in things tonight," Werner said. "Obviously with Marvin getting a few assists and me and Jamie chipping a few in. That's something that, besides just getting a win, is also satisfying."

Before the first puck was dropped all four seniors were honored with career highlights on the Mullins Center video boards. After each video tribute the players presented their family members with flowers and posed together for a group picture. Also in tribute to the seniors, the tops of the aisles were decorated with banners with each one having a senior's name and number.

"They've been a terrific class," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "The biggest thing about the class was that all four years, as was the case tonight, have been central to this team growing itself into a better program."

Over the fours years that Werner, Winer, Degon and Solon have worn the Maroon and White they have amassed more wins than any other class that has come through Amherst.

Cahoon commented on how the outgoing seniors were the first pieces in the puzzle of building up the hockey program at UMass. It was in their second season that the Minutemen made it farther into the Hockey East playoffs than any other UMass team.

As they are now, all four players were important players on the 2003-2004 Minutemen that advanced all the way to the conference championship game against Maine at the FleetCenter.

"They were a critical part of the development that took shape here," Cahoon said. "It's a big night for the seniors, it's well deserved."

The most unsung member of the group, Solon, was all smiles after the game to be able to go out with a bang.

"It was money," Solon said with a laugh about his second period goal. "It felt good, the last game after four years of battling and to end it like that was a real nice, good way to end it."

The accolades for the senior class read like a laundry list. Degon is a finalist — for the second year in a row — for the Walter Brown award, Werner is fourth on the UMass all-time scoring list, Winer holds 10 season and career records and Solon is heralded as one of the best defensive forwards in school history.

"It doesn't get any better than that," Cahoon said of his seniors' accomplishments. "I've got four kids there who have had great college careers."

The fact that he just skated off the Mullins Center ice for the last time hadn't hit Degon yet. He said it was the building he called home for four years that actually brought him to play for UMass.

"This is a pretty special building," he said. "Its one of the reasons a lot of guys come here, and it's a big reason why I came here."

Minutemen start season strong

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

All of the seasonal forecasts, pre-game speculations and questions regarding the depth of the No. 9 Massachusetts men's lacrosse team (1-0) were thrown out the window yesterday when the Minutemen were finally allowed to step on the field to show their stuff for the first time in the 2006 season.

UMass controlled the pace of play from Jake Deane's victory on the opening face-off all the way until Brett Garber ran out the clock to end the game, and the Minutemen came out triumphant over No. 19 Hofstra (6-1) by an 11-7 score at Garber Field.

All-American Sean Morris was his usual self on the offensive side of the ball, scoring three times and dishing out five assists.

"Obviously, as a top player, you expect him to take advantage of every opportunity that he has," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "He is a senior now, and he understands that. The thing that is great about it is he isn't a selfis h guy. He isn't a guy who just takes it and goes. He knows that he needs to include his teammates. When you coach, you wish you had every guy like that. It helps the team get better when one of your top guys is trying to bring along everyone else. I think those guys work hard for him, and he works hard for them."

Freshman Doc Schneider proved to be a force between the pipes, making 11 saves on the way to picking up a win in his first collegiate start.

"I was definitely a little nervous to say the least," Schneider said. "I was just antsy and wanted to play my first game."

Athan Iannucci sparked Hofstra with four goals and an assist, but the Pride struggled to find consistent rhythm all day, even during their trip to the field when their bus broke down, which caused a 15-minute delay to the start of a contest that was already postponed from its original scheduled start on Saturday.

"It just wouldn't seem to come," Morris said. "We just kept waiting and waiting, and then there was even a delay to start the game. Guys were fired up and ready to go. There was no letdown, and that shows a lot of toughness for our guys. It was definitely a lot of fun."

The Minutemen jumped out to a quick 2-0 lead in a span of 11 seconds. Rory Pedrick took a pass from Morris and worked off Pride defenseman Sean McCarthy before beating goalie Matt Southard up high for his first career goal.

Pedrick scooped up a loose ball directly off the next face-off and then hit Deane, who sprinted downfield and finished the play to put UMass ahead by two just 3:32 into UMass moves on to postseason

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

Even though the Massachusetts women's basketball team had already clinched an Atlantic 10 playoff berth, there was a lot on the line when UMass (11-16, 8-8 A-10) took the court against La Salle (11-16, 7-9 A-10) yesterday afternoon at the Mullins Center. The Minutewomen entered their final game of the regular season in a three-way tie with Richmond and La Salle for seventh place in the conference, and they rose to the occasion, defeating the Explorers by a score of 63-55.

UMass used a 23-3 run to dominate La Salle, clinching the No. 7 seed in the A-10 tournament this upcoming weekend. The Minutewomen held the lead throughout the whole contest, and a few lucky baskets by the Explorers late in the second half made the game look a lot closer than it was.

Sophomores Pam Rosario and Kate Mills combined for 37 points to help end the Minutewomen's regular season on a strong note.

UMass will begin its postseason run when it takes on No. 10 seed Duquesne at 4 p.m. on Friday in Philadelphia in the first round of the A-10 Championship.

While the postseason may be in the near future, the Minutewomen remained focused on their "one game at a time" mentality.

"Our goal was to come out and execute to a point where we could play both ends of the floor," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "But we really wanted to come out and make a statement defensively."

UMass did just that, forcing La Salle to finish the game

Displaced students return to dorms following fire

Students stand in Hampshire Dining Common while firefighters enter Coolidge Hall during the fire on Sunday night.

A firefighter outside of Southwest climbs into a fire truck on Sunday.

Students displaced by Sunday evening's fire in Southwest's Coolidge Hall returned to their dorms early yesterday afternoon as the investigation into the cause of that fire continued.

The Amherst Fire Department confirmed via press release that the fire was "caused by an unattended candle in room 1711" and was "accidental in nature."

After the fire was extinguished by the automatic sprinkler system, firefighters searched the building for any students who had remained in their rooms. According to the press release, "at least six rooms were found to still have occupants inside." Those occupants were then brought outside and turned over to UMass officials, who plan to take disciplinary action against them.

Students were permitted back into Coolidge Hall after the firefighters searched the building. Only students from the 17th floor were relocated to the Campus Center Hotel for the night.

Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Michael Gargano said that the person responsible for the fire, identified by several eyewitnesses to be Alex R. Topiano, was brought before the Dean of Students yesterday for a hearing regarding the start of the fire and possible disciplinary action.

Sunday night, Gargano said that possession of a candle could result in immediate suspension because, "fire is a serious offense and it is a life hazard."

Seventeenth floor residents were allowed to return to their rooms at 11 a.m. yesterday, according to Coolidge resident Kristen Sceppa, a communications major.

While the smell of smoke was still in the air, Sceppa said things were quickly returning to normal.

"There are a few little puddles of water of the floor, but there's no real damage," she said.

Doreen Maya, a veterinary and animal sciences major, who was displaced from her room on the 17th floor after the fire, also said that her room had a moistened floor, but no real damage and that her possessions were still intact.

Polina Shalts, a business management major, who lives next door to the room in which the fire started, said that her dormitory had minimal water damage.

Police arrest man for sex solicitation

A Chicopee man was busted on the University of Massachusetts campus yesterday afternoon for soliciting sex for a fee over the Internet, according to UMass police.

Adam Brogan, 26, of 73 Park St. in Chicopee, was arrested at the W.E.B. DuBois library on the UMass campus after an undercover UMass police officer arranged to meet Brogan for sex.

Police say Brogan placed a personal advertisement on the website craigslist.org asking for oral sex from female UMass students.

Through e-mail exchanges, police say Brogan offered to pay $100 for oral sex to an undercover officer, who responded to the ad.

"One of our detectives responded to the query and gained his confidence," said UMass Deputy Police Chief Patrick Archbald.

Police set up a sting outside the DuBois library around 1:00 p.m. yesterday, when Brogan was scheduled to meet with the undercover officer.

"A conversation took place between the undercover officer and the suspect that clearly indicated that Adam Brogan was indeed the person we had been e-mailing," said Archbald.

Brogan had scheduled a sexual encounter with the undercover officer inside a private study area of the library, police said.

Later yesterday afternoon, Brogan was arraigned on engaging in prostitution charges at Eastern Hampshire District Court in Hadley. He was released from police custody after a brief hearing and is expected back in court April 4 for a new hearing with his attorney.

A judge issued a "stay-away" order for Brogan, barring him from returning to the UMass Amherst campus for the remainder of his criminal case.

In vitro fetuses share right to life, says Pope

By Nicole Winfield
Associated Press

VATICAN CITY — Pope Benedict XVI said Monday that embryos developed for in vitro fertilization deserve the same right to life as fetuses, children and adults — and that that right extends to embryos even before they are transferred into a woman's womb.

The Vatican has long held that human life begins at conception, but Benedict's comments were significant because he specified that even an embryo in its earliest stages — when it is just a few cells — is just as much a human life as an older being.

The pope made the comments during an audience with members of the Pontifical Academy for Life, who opened a Vatican-sponsored conference Monday on the ethics surrounding the handling of embryos before they are implanted during in vitro procedures.

The Vatican opposes in vitro procedures because embryos created in a laboratory are often discarded, whereas others are frozen and still others are created solely for experimentation or to create stem cells.

Benedict repeated the Roman Catholic Church position that life begins at the moment of conception and deserves to be respected and protected from that moment on — a position set out most authoritatively in the 1995 encyclical "Evangelium Vitae."

That encyclical did not specifically address the status of an embryo before it is implanted after in vitro fertilization — the two or three days of growth in a laboratory during which the fertilized egg is dividing into a group of cells that are transferred by a doctor into a woman's uterus.

Benedict made clear that there should be no moral distinction between an embryo before implantation and after — even though he acknowledged there is no explicit teaching on the first days of life in Scripture.

"The Magisterium of the church has constantly proclaimed the sacred and inviolable character of every human life, from its conception to its natural end," he said.

"This moral judgment is valid already at the beginnings of life of an embryo, before it is implanted in the womb of the mother, who will care for it and nourish it for nine months until the moment of birth," he said.

"The love of God doesn't make any difference between the newly conceived, still in the womb of his mother, and the baby, or the young person, or the mature man or the old man," he said. "He doesn't make the distinction because in each of them he sees his own image and similarity."

While there is no consensus among scientists about when life begins — and thus deserves legal protection — many scientists believe life starts when the first neurological tissues are evident, about two to three weeks after fertilization, said Dr. Jacques Cohen, a reproductive scientist in New York who was not at the conference.

Iraqi official says he believes Carroll is alive

By Qassim Abdul-Zahra
Associated Press

BAGHDAD — Sunni Arabs are ready to end their boycott of talks to form a new Iraqi government if rival Shiites return mosques seized in last week's sectarian attacks and meet other unspecified demands, a top Sunni figure said Monday.

Meanwhile, Iraq's interior minister told ABC News that he believes American journalist Jill Carroll is alive and will be released, even though the Sunday deadline set by her kidnappers had passed.

Interior Minister Bayan Jabr also said he knew who abducted the 28-year-old journalist last month.

"We know his name and address, and we are following up on him as well as the Americans," he said. "I think she is still alive."

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad told Fox News Channel's "Fox and Friends" Monday that he spoke with Jabr about Carroll's plight.

"We are doing all that we can to help bring about a release and will persist with that," Khalilzad said.

Carroll, a freelancer working for the Christian Science Monitor, was abducted Jan. 7 in Baghdad and was last seen on a videotape broadcast Feb. 10 by a Kuwaiti television station, Al-Rai. The station said the kidnappers threatened to kill her unless the United States met unspecified demands by Sunday.

In Germany, the government denied a New York Times report that its intelligence service had passed information about Saddam Hussein's plans for defending Baghdad to the United States a month before the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003.

The Times said a German intelligence officer supplied the information to the U.S. Defense Intelligence Agency in February 2003.

"This account is wrong," German government spokesman Ulrich Wilhelm said. "The Federal Intelligence Service and, therefore, also the government, had until now no knowledge of such a plan."

In continuing violence, four mortar rounds exploded Monday in a Shiite neighborhood, killing four and wounding 16, police Maj. Moussa Abdul Karim said. U.S. helicopters fired on three houses 15 miles west of Samarra and arrested 10 people, Iraqi police said.

It was unclear whether the raid was linked to Wednesday's bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra, triggering the wave of reprisal attacks that shook the nation last week.

The Sunnis boycotted the talks Thursday after the Askariya shrine bombing sparked attacks against Sunni mosques in Baghdad, Basra and elsewhere. The walkout and Sunni-Shiite clashes threatened U.S. plans to establish a unity government capable of luring Sunnis away from the insurgency and raised doubts about U.S. plans to begin withdrawing some of its 138,000 soldiers this

Romney offers his opinions on the war in Iraq

By Glen Johnson
Associated Press

BOSTON — Gov. Mitt Romney assailed Sen. John Kerry during the 2004 presidential campaign for offering nuanced views on an array of issues, saying it evidenced indecisiveness that made the Democrat inferior as a leader to his fellow Republican, President Bush.

Now, though, as Romney lays the groundwork for his own potential White House bid in 2008, he is offering an assessment of the Iraqi war that is more gray than black-and-white.

Romney told a national television audience on Sunday — as he has around the country recently — that he unequivocally supports the war in Iraq. At the same time, he said:

— Bush did not do an "adequate job" explaining the reasons for the war before the first shots were fired.

— The attack was based on faulty intelligence.

— The United States hasn't had "sufficient" troops in Iraq to stabilize the country after initial combat.

— The prisoner abuse that followed at Abu Ghraib was "unfortunate." He did offer one olive branch to Bush, however.

"I think the president would agree there's a benefit that comes with hindsight," Romney said on "Fox News Sunday."

Romney's kaleidoscopic views have allowed him to express support for the war when it benefits him and his potential candidacy, but maintain distance from the president when necessary.

While polls show the war on terror remains his strongest issue, Bush is currently experiencing the lowest approval ratings of his presidency. That bifurcation is a problem for Romney as he courts the same conservatives who boosted Bush to the presidency, while simultaneously serving as chairman of the Republican Governors Association.

In that capacity, he is working to help GOP governors win re-election in this fall's pivotal midterm elections. Should Democrats regain the governorship in Massachusetts, for example, it could complicate a Romney run for the presidency two years hence.

Throughout the nearly three-year Iraqi war, Romney has consistently boasted about the president's leadership, even as he has questioned a growing list of issues emerging during his presidency.

In October 2004, just before the general election matchup between Kerry and Bush, the governor told the Telegram & Gazette of Worcester, "I believe President Bush represents a continuation of leadership which is essential at a time of war. We know where he stands. He doesn't vacillated."

At the same time, Romney acknowledged flaws in the administration's war policy, including a lack of readiness for the speed of the initial combat victory. "Of course there are mistakes made in the fog of war, as it is called," he said.

This past August, as he handed out the first medals honoring the service of Massachusetts National Guardsmen in the aftermath of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, Romney again voiced his support for the war and the broader offensive against terrorists also underway in Afghanistan.

"We're all concerned in America today with the high price of gasoline, but I think sometimes we forget about year.

Sunnis will resume talks with Shiites

Adnan al-Dulaimi, whose Iraqi Accordance Front spearheaded the Sunni boycott, said the Sunnis have not decided to return to the talks but are "intent on participating" in a new government.

"The situation is tense and within the next two days, we expect the situation to improve and then we will have talks," he told The Associated Press. "We haven't ended our suspension completely but we are on the way to end it."

He said there were "some conditions" that must be met first, chief among them the return of mosques still occupied by Shiite militants in Baghdad and Salman Pak. Al-Dulaimi did not mention the other demands, but some Sunni politicians have insisted on replacing Shiite police with Sunni soldiers in heavily Sunni areas.

Four people were killed Monday when several shells exploded near the Nasir Market in the mostly Shiite Shula area of western Baghdad, police said.

Otherwise, the city was generally peaceful Monday — the first day without extended curfews or a ban on private vehicles since the crisis erupted, pushing the nation to the brink of civil war.

Four bodies — blindfolded and handcuffed — were found Monday in Dora, a Baghdad neighborhood where a mortar barrage the night before killed 16 people and wounded 53. Two Iraqi soldiers were wounded in an ambush Monday in Mahmoudiya, about 20 miles south of the capital, officials said.

The U.S. military said an American soldier had died from non-combat related injuries suffered Friday north of Baghdad. The statement did not elaborate. Three soldiers were killed Sunday in combat in the capital.

Their deaths brought to at least 2,291 the number of members of the U.S. military who have died since the war began, according to an Associated Press count.

the high price of freedom," the governor told his audience.

Less than a week later, though, he was reluctant to discuss the war when pressed by a reporter during a visit to Amherst.

"I wouldn't presume as a governor to try to weigh in on a matter which is outside gubernatorial turf," he told The Boston Globe.

In October, the governor was asked if the Iraqi invasion had been a mistake. He replied, "Well, we went in under faulty impressions, faulty intelligence," but he declined to say if the country should have gone to war if, as the Globe related the question, "the lack of such weapons had been clear."

On Sunday, though, Romney and his staff were more clear.

In his interview with Fox News, Romney said: "I don't think we did an adequate job explaining to the American people all the reasons for entering Iraq. There were obviously intelligence failures. I think the prison abuse scandal is something which has been unfortunate."

He added: "I think also that we haven't had sufficient troops following the period of major conflict, and so those are not new or novel observations. I think the president would agree there's a benefit that comes with hindsight."

Afterward, Romney's communications director, Eric Fehrnstrom, elaborated by telling the Boston Herald: "The governor believes it was a mistake to base the premise of the war solely on weapons of mass destruction."

In an interview Monday with The Associated Press, Fehrnstrom said the war was justified because the United States faces a broader challenge from Islamic extremists.

Coast Guard questions Bush Administration in port deal

Deputy Secretary of Homeland Security Michael Jackson, center, speaks during a news briefing regarding the U.S. port deal with an Arab company.

By Liz Sidoti
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Citing broad gaps in U.S. intelligence, the Coast Guard cautioned the Bush administration weeks ago that it could not determine whether a United Arab Emirates-based company seeking a stake in some U.S. port operations might support terrorist operations.

The disclosure came during a hearing Monday on Dubai-owned DP World's plans to take over significant operations at six leading U.S. ports.

The Bush administration said the Coast Guard's concerns were raised during its review of the deal, which it approved Jan. 17, and that all those questions were resolved.

The port operations are now handled by London-based Peninsular & Oriental Steam Navigation Co.

"There are many intelligence gaps, concerning the potential for DPW or P&O assets to support terrorist operations, that precludes an overall threat assessment" of the potential merger, the unclassified Coast Guard intelligence assessment said.

"The breadth of the intelligence gaps also infer potential unknown threats against a large number of potential vulnerabilities," the assessment said.

The Coast Guard said the concerns reflected in the document ultimately were addressed. In a statement, the Coast Guard said other U.S. intelligence agencies were able to provide answers to the questions it raised.

"The Coast Guard, the intelligence community, and the entire CFIUS (Committee on Foreign Investments in the United States) panel believed this transaction received the proper review, and national security concerns were, in fact, addressed," the Coast Guard said.

That multi-agency government panel reviews foreign purchases of vital U.S. assets.

The report raised questions about the security of the companies' operations, the backgrounds of people working for the companies, and whether other foreign countries influenced operations that affect security.

Sen. Susan Collins, chairman of the Senate Homeland Security Committee, released an unclassified version of the document at a briefing Monday. The Bush administration agreed Sunday to DP World's request for a second review of the potential security risks related to the deal.

Congressional leaders who brokered the arrangement for a second review hoped it would defuse a bipartisan political uproar over port security and scuttle any push for legislation this week that would force such an investigation and could embarrass President Bush.

Senators introduced several bills Monday anyway, even though Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., told reporters in Detroit, "I don't think it's necessary to legislate."

Criticism persisted from both Republicans and Democrats.

"This report suggests there were significant and troubling intelligence gaps," said Collins, R-Maine. "That language is very troubling to me."

Appearing before the Collins committee, administration officials defended their decision not to trigger a 45-day review of national security implications of the business transaction following their initial review.

"In this case, the concerns that you're citing were addressed and resolved," Clay Lowery, the Treasury Department's assistant secretary for international affairs, told Collins. "There were no national security concerns that were not addressed."

The Coast Guard indicated to The Associated Press that it did not have serious reservations about the ports deal on Feb. 10, when the news organization first inquired about potential security concerns.

"Any time there's a new operator in a port our concern would be that that operator has complied with the (International Ship and Port Facility Security) ISPS code overseas and we just want to take a look at their track record," Cmdr. Jeff Carter, Coast Guard spokesman, said at the time. "And then we would look forward to working with them in the future ensuring they complied with all applicable regulations and international agreements," he added.

Stewart Baker, an assistant secretary for the Homeland Security Department, told lawmakers that the report was an internal Coast Guard document that the interagency panel that reviews foreign investment deals did not see. However, Baker said, he was aware of the Coast Guard concerns.

"I think it's a little unfair to judge this report by one paragraph that happens not to be classified," Baker said. "This paragraph is not really representative of the entire report."

"I think the paragraph speaks for itself," Collins responded before adjourning the public hearing for a closed session to explore the issue further.

Also Monday, a bipartisan group of senators introduced a bill that would delay the deal and give Congress an opportunity to block the takeover. The group did not plan to push for a vote yet.

"We're in a position now of watchful waiting," said Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y. "If we feel the need, we will get a vote."

College may cause increase likelihood of eating disorders

By Erik Blair
Collegian Staff

NEW YORK — With as many as one in four American college students suffering from an eating-related disorder and 86 percent of such afflictions beginning by age 20, college campuses are quickly becoming a battleground for the fatal psychiatric illnesses that contribute to nearly 3,000 deaths annually, according to the National Center for Health Statistics.

Existing insecurities are often deepened by the feelings of loneliness, worthlessness, and imperfection that accompany a student's transition to the college lifestyle.

Those insecurities are what spurred Guevara's relapse. "I was the new kid here, so I wanted to build friendships and possibly start a relationship right away," she explained. Believing that such goals might be easier to achieve with a slimmer figure, Guevara began to change her eating behaviors. She said she paid more attention to the weights and eating habits of her friends and started to evaluate herself accordingly.

"I felt like there was some kind of competition amongst the girls in my hall to look their best," Guevara said. Though she refrained from discussing her own issues in public, "inside I was going back to my old ways."

"Eating disorders are a symptom of something in one's past that is reactivated by stress," says Julia Sheehy, associate director of the Rosemary Furman Counseling Center and coordinator of the eating disorder team at Barnard. "College is an at-risk time because it is a time of transition, where basic things in a student's life become very different. ... That stress is increased in a very competitive school."

Duke attributed her relapse to this competition. Despite a 4.0 grade point average and a solid group of friends, Duke said she felt insecure. "It was easier to say, 'I'm sad because I hate my body' than to [confront] what was really making me sad," she said.

Having suffered from anorexia during high school, Duke knew her inborn perfectionism and self-described Type A personality had a way of leading her to dangerous extremes with her weight. She partially attributes her first bout with the disorder to pressure from her family. But, "in college, it was a lot more about seizing control of my life," Duke said.

Adjusting to a new environment and a new city "made me feel like I was lost and sinking," she explained. "I used food and exercise to feel like I had control over my life. The normal fear of the freshman fifteen became an irrational fear of gaining weight."

The social pressures to attain the perfect body are often intensified once students move away from home and into university residences. Because college students dine, sleep, work, and play with the same group of people, the living situation serves as a constant reminder of how their peers look, eat, and exercise. For some students, it is just another indication of how they aren't measuring up.

"Eating with people ... gave me a hyper-consciousness of what I put in my mouth, even though my friends couldn't have cared less what I ate," said Duke. "Just knowing that there were people who knew my schedule on any given day, I felt lazy if I skipped the gym. I sometimes felt that everyone around me is more put together than me-and thinner."

"Some of my friends are dancers, so they try to eat as healthily as possible," Guevara added. "It made me feel guilty about my own choices and I would sometimes not eat some of the stuff on my plate because I was scared of a comment or quip they might make. Some other friends of mine are extremely thin and active and eat whatever they want. Sometimes I'd think, 'Well, so-and-so is having the burger and the frozen yogurt, so I guess it's OK [for me]."

Both Duke and Guevara found that this pressure was amplified by their new location in New York City.

"New York feels like a city filled with beautiful people, so even as I just walk to Duane Reade or sit on the subway, I am constantly comparing myself to other people ... this constant awareness of my body obviously affects my eating choices," Duke said.

"You have to look your best to go out to all the trendy and chic restaurants and clubs," Guevara added.

Kabul prison inmates agree to end revolt

By Amir Shah
Associated Press

KABUL, Afghanistan — Rioting inmates at Kabul's main prison agreed to halt violence late Monday and prison authorities restored supplies of water, electricity and food cut off a day earlier in an attempt to put down the revolt, officials said.

The sounds of gunfire and inmates shouting "God is Great" could be heard as authorities negotiated with prisoners controlling most of the facility. A government negotiator said four inmates had died in the two-day standoff blamed on al-Qaida and Taliban militants.

Security forces backed by tanks and heavy guns surrounded the notorious prison.

Sibghatullah Mujaddedi, the chief government negotiator, said the rioting inmates had agreed to temporarily halt violence.

"I promised them I would do my best to solve their problems and they trust me," Mujaddedi said. "They said they would not launch any more attacks right now."

Abdul Salaam Bakshi, chief of prisons in Afghanistan, said the situation was calmer on Monday night.

"The food, water and electricity have been restored. For the time being, I am optimistic. Everything is quiet. Let's see what happens tomorrow," Bakshi said.

Earlier in the day, authorities warned they were prepared to use force to end it.

"We can take all these prisoners in one hour," deputy justice minister Mohammed Qasim Hashimzai told The Associated Press as he traveled to the prison Monday. "But to prevent bloodshed we are trying to negotiate."

Government negotiator Mohammed Ibrahim Sahdat told journalists after talking to the prisoners that four rioters had been killed and 38 wounded during the siege.

The prison holds about 2,000 inmates. The area now under the inmates' control includes a wing that houses 70 women prisoners and about 70 children who live with them.

Officials said the violence began when inmates refused to put on new uniforms, which were ordered after seven Taliban prisoners escaped last month by disguising themselves as visitors.

The riot started late Saturday in Block Two of the prison, which houses about 1,300 of the 2,000 inmates, including 350 al-Qaida and Taliban loyalists.

Hashimzai confirmed that rioting spread Sunday to Block One, which houses hundreds more inmates. No prisoners had escaped, he said.

A man claiming to be a spokesman for the Block One inmates called The Associated Press and demanded retrials for all the prisoners, saying many were innocent while others were serving unfairly harsh sentences.

The man, who identified himself only as Maqsodi, said the riot would continue until the government met prisoners' demands.

"Two-thirds of the prisoners here are innocent. The courts were unfair," he said. It was not possible to immediately confirm the man's identity.

Sahdat, the government negotiator who is also a member of the Afghan Independent Human Rights Commission, confirmed that some prisoners were demanding their cases be retried.

Afghan policemen were on hand in Kabul on Monday, during the final days of religious riots by prison inmates.

Second deadly strain of Avian flu found in African country

By John Leicester
Associated Press

PARIS — Niger has become the second African country with confirmed cases of the deadly H5N1 bird flu strain, a lab official said Monday.

Ilaria Capua, chief of the laboratory in Padua, Italy, said the tests were confirmed Monday and the government of the impoverished West African country had been informed.

The H5N1 strain had earlier been confirmed in Nigeria, Niger's southern neighbor, and officials had said in mid-February they were investigating whether it had surfaced in Niger.

Experts have been particularly concerned about the spread of H5N1 to Africa, which is unprepared for such a health crisis because of its weak infrastructure. The virus is believed to have spread unchecked in Nigeria before it was identified, and Nigeria's efforts to contain it have been hampered by a lack of resources and information.

In Niger, a senior Health Ministry official said the virus was detected in Illela, a small village 45 miles from the border with Nigeria. He had no word on how many birds may have died or any other details. He spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the media.

Further tests were being carried out to determine how closely the strain found in Niger matched the H5N1 strain detected elsewhere in the world.

Capua, speaking at a bird flu conference in France, said she feared the arrival of the virus in a second African country was "just the prelude to the virus becoming endemic in Africa."

"Given the sort of agriculture they have and given the hygienic standards they have in animal farming, I believe that this is just the start," she said.

Humans and poultry live close together on small farms across Africa, as in Asia where the current H5N1 wave began and where the virus first jumped to humans.

Capua offered a glimmer of good news, though, saying tests on birds from Senegal had come back negative.

The lethal H5N1 bird flu strain has spread from Asia to Europe, the Middle East and Africa, and scientists fear it could mutate into a form that is easily transmitted between humans, sparking a pandemic. The disease has killed more than 90 people, mostly in Southeast Asia, according to the World Health Organization.

U.S. negotiates over proposed U.N. council

By Edith M. Lederer
Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS — The United States will vote against the proposed new U.N. Human Rights Council unless negotiations are reopened to address what it considers serious deficiencies, U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said Monday.

After months of divisive and highly contentious negotiations, General Assembly President Jan Eliasson presented a compromise proposal last Thursday to create the new council and called for a quick vote, preferably this week.

It received wide support, though the United States immediately expressed reservations and raised the possibility of reopening negotiations.

A primary U.S. goal in the negotiations has been to ensure that human rights offenders are barred from membership on a new council, and it wanted a small, permanent body.

The council would replace the widely criticized and highly politicized Human Rights Commission, which has been attacked for allowing some of the worst-offending countries to use their membership to protect one another from condemnation or to criticize others. In recent years, commission members have included Sudan, Libya, Zimbabwe and Cuba.

"I say this more in sorrow than in anger, but we're very disappointed with the draft that was produced last Thursday," Bolton told reporters Monday. "We don't think it's acceptable."

"My instructions are to reopen the negotiations and to try and correct the manifold deficiencies in the text of the resolution or alternatively to push off consideration of the resolution for several months to give us more time," he said.

Bolton said it was his understanding that Eliasson would bring the matter to the General Assembly floor for a vote within the next two days.

"If he continues on that course, we will call for a vote and vote no," Bolton said.

While supporters of a major overhaul of the U.N. human rights machinery were not happy with all the provisions in Eliasson's final draft, human rights groups and a dozen Nobel Peace prize winners urged the United States to support the new council, calling it a significant step forward.

Secretary-General Kofi Annan, who first proposed replacing the discredited Human Rights Commission in March 2005, also urged support, as did France, South Africa, Costa Rica and a number of other countries.

Last week, Bolton said the General Assembly should consider the possibility of reopening negotiations between nations — not using a "facilitator" like Eliasson.

Human rights groups, U.N. officials and many diplomats said reopening the text would almost certainly weaken it, not strengthen it.

Under the proposal, the 53-member Human Rights Commission would be replaced by a 47-member Human Rights Council elected by an absolute majority of the 191-member General Assembly — 96 members — and not the two-thirds majority that Annan, the United States and human rights campaigners had sought in an effort to keep human rights abusers off.

My online dating experience

Melissa Garber

The Internet provides some crazy services these days. I can't check my e-mail without being bombarded with offers for enlarging body parts I don't have, to cutting down mortgage payments on property I don't own, to dating services promising me the love of my life a few clicks away. It's a little ridiculous. Personally, I couldn't imagine finding a potential boyfriend off the Internet, but I've always been curious about the kind of people who try.

I tested the waters and posted an ad on Craigslist, a website whose services in the personal ad arena range from finding long term relationships to finding casual sex partners. I won't get into the details of what I wrote to describe myself but the gist of it is that I am an 18-year-old girl who is perky, young, innocent, and adventurous. I even posted a fairly generic picture of myself to accompany the ad.

Honestly, I couldn't have been less serious about this personal ad. I just wanted to see what the dating pool was like out there on the Internet. I figured anyone with some sense would see right through my charade. My roommate and I had sat around snowed in on a Sunday afternoon trying to think of the most ridiculous things to put up on this website, we're just a bunch of bored college kids going stir crazy stuck in the dorms.

I had three pages of responses filling my mailbox in the first 15 minutes after my ad had been posted. Apparently this wasn't a joke to the men who frequent Craigslist in the Boston area.

My descriptions couldn't even begin to give justice to the things these guys wrote to me. On the milder side I got cell phone numbers, requests to meet for coffee, dinner, drinks. I got generic responses from guys who replied with the same letter to every ad. I got photos of guys down the shore, at the bar, with friends.

The milder responses were definitely far and few in comparison to the more extreme ones. I got e-mails from 49-year-old men asking to photograph me, to guys who said they looked 25. One guy offered me lines of cocaine. Another said that as long as I had a passport I could go with him to Costa Rica the following Thursday. I received pictures of things I never wanted to see, with detailed explanations of things I never wanted to do. I got asked if 50 was too old or if marital status was a problem.

Some of my most frequently asked questions were, "do you like it kinky," and "how are you, 18?" Forty-five year old men noted that they preferred girls ages 18-21. At one point I was averaging a response a minute. Days after I posted when my ad was a couple hundred ads deep in the back pages of the website my mailbox was still being stuffed to capacity.

The average age of a respondent was 44. Out of the hundreds of replies I got, I could count on my fingers the amount of respondents within four years of my age.

I received pictures of things I never wanted to see, with detailed explanations of things I never wanted to do. I got asked if 50 was too old or if marital status was a problem.

So what does that say about Internet dating? Obviously I didn't conduct a study on all the different dating websites, but from my not-very-scientific research, I've come to the conclusion that the website I used is basically a forum for horny older men. I may have posted my ad under the long term relationship header, but it was blatant that the men who replied to me were looking for sex.

At first glance, the responses are hilarious, but I cannot even begin to explain how disgusting I felt after reality set in and I realized that these people responding to me were real. They were living breathing human beings and they lived in neighborhoods with family, friends, even children. I had a strange feeling in the pit of my stomach. It's weird, but I felt sad for the middle-aged men who were so pathetic they were responding to 18-year-olds on dating websites with obscene pictures and gross requests.

I think I'm just going to skip out on the whole Internet dating scene. I don't know, I'm sure it suits other people just fine. Maybe all those people who have found their significant other off the Internet have tapped into a great dating resource, I don't know, and I don't care to know after the experience I had and the conclusions I had to draw from it.

'FBI agent' patrols Facebook

Mike Sances

Four sergeants, two detectives, two members of the bike unit, an IT manager, and a lieutenant. That's how many members of the UMass Police Department have registered themselves on the popular social networking site, Facebook.com, as of two weeks ago.

While college students have been wasting time with Facebook for a few years now, the world beyond the campus has only recently caught on. Many companies now use Facebook to research potential employees, while the issue of campus police logging on is even more recent, and opens the door to a host of other privacy issues.

For example, as reporter Nicole Leete reported for the Collegian in January: "If there was a party at UMass with underage drinking or vandalism, and partygoers later on posted pictures and added a group about it on Facebook, police could potentially use that information to identify a student as one of the perpetrators."

It hasn't actually happened at this school yet. But in one famous case, at George Washington University, a group of students was able to lure campus police to a prank party after advertising a "beer blast" on Facebook. And at the University of California, Davis last month, a student was alarmed to find members of the UC Davis police force registered on Facebook, prompting him to alert his campus paper, the Aggie.

Is this kind of alarm justified? I decided to ask Barbara O'Connor, chief of the UMass Police Department. Not surprisingly, O'Connor saw no issue with any of her officers using the Facebook to check in on students, since they use it primarily to reach those living in residence halls and who aren't required to own a telephone.

"We have a huge problem on this campus reaching students now because they don't have to have phones in their room," she told me, arguing that the real story here was the University's failure to provide residents with phones.

Maybe, except for the fact that one of the two detectives registered happened to be the infamous "FBI agent," the UMPD's liaison with the Joint Terrorism Task Force. The pertinent facts, specifically surrounding events in November, 2002 have been well-documented by this paper and are readily accessible, so I won't go into them here. I'll simply say that if having an officer of the campus police browsing a site intended for 18-22 year-olds to "poke" one another and post pictures of themselves drunk was merely problematic, then the presence of an "FBI agent" would be a serious matter indeed.

Is it really necessary to protect the Pioneer Valley from annihilation? (Last time I checked, the closest thing to terrorism that's happened around here was Shay's Rebellion, and that was a while ago.)

The quotes and the conditional tense are both intentional. While the detective in question is undoubtedly the person repeatedly named, intermittently since 2002, as an agent of the FBI on this campus that characterization has yet to be definitively proved. O'Connor in particular took issue with this description, describing the Joint Terrorism Task Force (JTTF) as only one of several such task forces in which many in her station participate. Still, news reports from 2002 and 2003 put the "agent" as working anywhere between a few days a week to full-time for the Springfield branch of the FBI, something O'Connor says he still does.

Then again, it might not even matter. When I asked Facebook spokesman Chris Hughes about the officer in question, he told me that that account had been removed due to a violation of Facebook's terms of use —the user had been misrepresenting himself as an undergraduate. (It was probably an honest mistake, since about half of the UMPD on Facebook have done the same thing.)

When I pressed him on the privacy issues, Hughes gave me the same answer he's given to the press again and again in recent months. "Users have complete control over who can see what. Police do not have to have access to users' profiles unless they give them access themselves." I think we should all take the hint there.

Facebook or not, what's really going on with this so-called Joint Terrorism Task Force? Is it really necessary to protect the Pioneer Valley from annihilation? (Last time I checked, the closest thing to terrorism that's happened around here was Shay's Rebellion, and that was a while ago.) Or is security even the real motive here? What really happened back in 2002, when the JTTF inaugurated itself by questioning an innocent man, and not about any possible illegal activity, but about his political beliefs?

"Obviously, it's possible the police know something we don't — and it's also possible that they have ridiculous misinformation which they are convinced is true," said Dan Clawson, a professor of sociology who organized an emergency forum on academic freedom when the original incident occurred, via e-mail. "I think all of us, students and others, need to be very much concerned about the levels of spying and surveillance in our society. At the moment the key fact is how much we do not know. Perhaps your phone calls and email have already been intercepted, or mine have; perhaps yours will be as a result of this article. If that happens, how would we know?"

Paranoia? Or legitimate concerns about safety in an era of increasing surveillance?

Getting back into the flow

David B. Lawrence

After getting off to a rolling February start, the spring 2006 semester is finally in full swing. We're now four weeks in and things have really begun to heat up. Here's an overview of just how hot things have gotten at good old Mass Aggie:

What better source of heat through these cold winter days than a dorm fire? We had one Sunday night, at 7 p.m. The fire took place in room 1711 of Coolidge dorm in Southwest, a living area where near-constant false alarms have frustrated students to the point that many stayed behind in their rooms thinking it was just another fake. They got an unpleasant surprise when firefighters searching the dorm found them. The University will probably take disciplinary action against those poor students.

Despite the fire being contained to the room in which it started, the sprinkler system managed to flood most of the 17th floor. Its residents have been relocated to the Campus Center Hotel for the time being, until things are dried up and cleaned out. Personally, I wouldn't mind a free stay in the center of campus; it makes for a nice little vacation prior to spring break.

Apparently the fire was started by a 'candle' that the student (identified by the Collegian as Alex Fopiano) had in his room, a breach of code. According to at least one eye-witness report, Fopiano ran back into his room after the fire was underway, for "reasons unknown." Perhaps he was trying to hide the 'scented candle' that is being blamed as the cause of the fire, or perhaps we will never know.

With add-drop over, classes have finally begun to heat up. We now enjoy a full complement of assignments, tests, lectures, and discussions each week. Classes being in full swing also means that class skipping has started up again, and we once again enjoy plenty of seats in our lectures. It is good to be through with those annoying first few weeks of full classes and cramped aisles.

Classes being in full swing also means that class skipping has started up again, and we once again enjoy plenty of seats in our lectures. It is good to be through with those annoying first few weeks of full classes and cramped aisles.

Another sign that the semester is rolling is the rhetoric on this editorial page. For this columnist, we aren't truly "back to school" until writers start making things up to slander the administration.

Yesterday, one fiery columnist criticized Chancellor John Lombardi for talking about improving the stature of UMass as a research institution. The research being done here, he claimed, is "primarily for the Department of Defense." The columnist went on to ask, "Is the research on polymer technology going to be used...to murder our brothers and sisters overseas?"

I can answer that question... no. In fact the research being done here is not primarily for the Department of Defense, so file that away in your "made up facts" folder. When that folder starts getting packed, you know the semester is in full swing. I would have personally been hard pressed to connect Lombardi with the Iraq war, it was an impressive performance.

Things are finally heating up for the Maroon and White as well. This weekend was the strongest of the semester for the Minutemen and Minutewomen. UMass teams wowed their fans this weekend in a clean sweep of the table with wins by men's hockey, men's lacrosse, and both men's and women's hoops. These shining performances from UMass sports were a real delight to watch as a fan. It is my opinion that a strong athletics program is, along with strong research, a cornerstone of a great public University. The athletics programs at UMass have received good support over the last several years, and that may finally be starting to show. Hopefully we'll have the opportunity to enjoy watching our athletic programs to continue to grow in stature alongside UMass academics.

Despite the frigid weather, it is clear that in each aspect of campus life, the spring 2006 semester is really rolling. The politicos are politicking, the athletes are playing strong, classes are being taught, enjoyed and skipped and, of course, the dorms are burning. This one should be fun to watch.

It's time to rethink tactics

Matt Giancola

The situation in Iraq in the past few days has turned from bad to much, much worse. One of the holiest places for Shi'ite Muslims, the Askariyyain Shrine located in Samarra, was bombed by insurgent forces in their attempt to set off a civil war within the country. In retaliation, a number of Sunni mosques have been destroyed. Violence, something the country has become well acquainted to over the past decades, has reached incredible new heights.

The government has enacted a driving ban in Baghdad and the country is under a curfew. Iraqi bloggers have written of being forced to stay inside their homes while sectarian militias roam the streets.

Increasingly, the borders of Iraq, drawn up in the aftermath of the First World War, are being shown to have been a terrible mistake. The two Muslim groups, the Sunnis and the Shi'ites have historically lived separately, with their own governments. Only in this past century have they been forced together.

The President, and his administration, has been consistently ignoring sound advice from military and political leaders on how best to handle foreign affairs. After five years, the American people are finally getting tired of it.

Brutal dictators such as Saddam Hussein subdued the people by restricting violence only to his army. Now that he has been removed, and along with the tactical blunders of Rumsfeld and Bush, old hatreds have been rekindled and Iraq is now engaged in a bloody civil war.

And caught in between is America.

We are not innocent victims in this mess, however, as we have had ample warning about the risks. Congressman Jack Murtha, a Marine for over 30 years, has been saying that the country was teetering on the brink of civil war for months and that it was time to redeploy the troops to other, safer areas in the Persian Gulf. The right lambasted him, calling him a defeatist and a coward. It seems, though, that some conservatives are beginning to see the way things really are.

William F. Buckley, hailed as one of the founders of the modern conservative movement, wrote an essay this past week about the situation in Iraq entitled simply, "It Didn't Work." He states in no uncertain terms, that the mission in Iraq failed and America must be prepared to come to terms with that.

Francis Fukuyama came out this week as well and essentially apologized for the neo-conservative movement. He declares that "the United States needs to reconceptualize its foreign policy in several fundamental ways. In the first instance, we need to demilitarize what we have been calling the global war on terrorism... Meeting the jihadist challenge is more of a 'long, twilight struggle' whose core is not a military campaign but a political contest for the hearts and minds of ordinary Muslims around the world." This was John Kerry's argument for winning the war against terrorism in the presidential campaign two years ago. Imagine that.

It's one thing to truly be a defeatist, to root for the demise of the United States and entirely another thing to understand the situation on the ground, and adjust your strategy to remain strong. The President, and his administration, has been consistently ignoring sound advice from military and political leaders on how best to handle foreign affairs. After five years, the American people are finally getting tired of it.

A new Rasmussen poll reveals that more Americans trust the Democrats to handle national security issues than the Republicans. A full 64 percent of the public does not want American ports to be controlled by a United Arab Emirates company; a country which was one of only three that supported the Taliban.

Globalization is a force that cannot be ignored, and for the large part, it has been a positive force; bringing different peoples of the world together to work and interact. But some sectors of the economy which are highly sensitive and important to national security should be handled by American companies, with Homeland Security overseeing their safety measures. Should we outsource airport security to the highest bidder, even if that country harbors terrorists?

So what does a civil war in the Middle East have to do with American ports and globalization? Both problems have been made worse by the administration. The President refuses to back down on the port deal and he naively thinks that the sole reason for the violence in Iraq is the terrorists, attempting to start trouble, and hurt the United States. Because of his missteps, the violence in Iraq is much worse than it could have been.

We are now at a turning point; if we continue with our current policies, the U.S. will surely get weaker in the eyes of the world.

The military is stretched thin, and we will be at a disadvantage if a real threat arises. Instead, let's focus on making America safer and less porous to potential attacks.

I do not want to say that the cause in Iraq is completely lost, but a substantial change in tactics is necessary to breathe life into the dying nation. If we redeploy the troops, there may still be hope for the war-torn nation.

'EIGHT BELOW' WARMS HEARTS

By Jake Monte
Collegian Staff

If you've seen previews for "Eight Below," you already know the story is inherently sentimental. On top of that, it's a Walt Disney Pictures film, meaning someone can expect lively music for the first half-hour, a cast of smiling, simplistic characters and scenes of heroic glory as the band plays on like there's no tomorrow. These films aren't for everyone's taste, however.

There's a dichotomy among moviegoers. When the music swells and tears stream down the main character's face, some people reach for the tissue box and others turn to their friend and say, "Let's leave." For some, "Eight Below" will be too gooey for their sophisticated taste buds. But the majority will find this to be one of the most genuinely moving films in the Walt Disney Pictures filmography.

The film begins in Antarctica. Paul Walker plays Jerry Shepard who, in his words, is "down here six months of the year dragging scientists around." Cooper (Jason Biggs) is his cartographer friend who says, "Go any further south, you'll fall off the planet." The scientist whom Jerry is introduced to at the beginning of the film is an American geologist played by Bruce Greenwood.

He's searching for the first meteorite from Mercury, which he believes landed on Mt. Melbourne. The ice up that way is too thin for the snowmobile, so Jerry must take his team of eight dogs to lead the two of them there.

They have a few adventures involving the "thin-ice" and hear there are two low pressure systems moving in their direction. They make it home in time, board a plane and leave the dogs under the assumption that Kate, who plays Jerry's love interest, will rescue them as soon as possible. But Kate is told to wait until the weather gets better and Jerry is stranded in the United States with no way to get back and save the lives of his canine companions.

"We can't just leave them out there," he says. But that what happens. The film cuts back and forth between Jerry and the dogs. Jerry knows the dogs are most likely dead, and this weighs heavily on him. Someone finally says to him, "It's about finding the one thing that will put your heart at rest." So regardless of whether Jerry's dogs are alive or dead, he knows he must do something. As is evident, the love Jerry feels for the dogs drives the film. If that concept tugs at your heartstrings, you'll love "Eight Below." But if you think those are the makings of a corny or stupid film, you'll think the film corny and stupid.

It is also important to note, as well, that Jerry's dogs possess almost human intelligence. Jerry talks to them and they seem to understand him. When one of Jerry's dogs brings a rope to a man who has fallen through thin ice and places it around his neck, some people will go with it, while others won't. It's not at all improbable, however, that dogs can be trained this well.

Walt Disney Pictures has made plenty of films like this before. They usually cater to kids, while "Eight Below" will be loved by many people of all ages. A lot of the Disney films of this type didn't work. They traversed the corniness barrier so severely that they were laughable. "Angels in the Outfield" comes to mind as one example. But "Eight Below" works. While it might not work for everyone, the film isn't surpassingly corny or stupid. It is emotional, for sure, but genuinely so.

There's one great scare in "Eight Below" that is better than most horror movie scares. It works so well because when it happens we are completely engrossed in the story. This is an engaging, very well-done and touching movie. In this style of filmmaking, "Eight Below" is one of the best films to come out in quite sometime.

Dennis Weaver, 'Gunsmoke' sidekick, dies in Colorado at 81

By Bob Thomas
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Dennis Weaver, the diffident deputy Chester Goode in the TV classic western "Gunsmoke" and the canny New Mexico deputy solving New York City crime in "McCloud," has died. The actor was 81.

Weaver died of complications from cancer Friday at his home in Ridgway, in southwestern Colorado, his publicist, Julian Myers, announced Monday.

"He was a wonderful man and a fine actor and we will all miss him," Burt Reynolds, who played alongside Weaver in "Gunsmoke," said Monday.

Weaver was a struggling actor in Hollywood in 1955, earning $60 a week delivering flowers when he was offered $300 a week for a role in a new CBS television series, "Gunsmoke." After nine years as Chester, who he played with a stiff-legged gait, he was earning $9,000 a week.

When Weaver first auditioned for the series, he found the character of Chester "inane." He wrote in his 2001 autobiography, "All the World's a Stage," that he said to himself: "With all my Actors Studio training, I'll correct this character by using my own experiences and drawing from myself."

The result was a well-rounded character that appealed to audiences, especially with his drawling, "Mis-ter Dil-lon."

At the end of seven hit seasons, Weaver sought other horizons. He announced his departure, but the failures of pilots for his own series caused him to return to "Gunsmoke" on a limited basis for two more years. The role brought him an Emmy in the 1958-59 season.

In 1966, Weaver starred with a 600-pound black bear in "Gentle Ben," about a family that adopts a bear as a pet. The series was well-received, but after two seasons, CBS decided it needed more adult entertainment and canceled it.

Next came the character Sam McCloud, which Weaver called "the most satisfying role of my career."

The "McCloud" series, 1970-1977, put the no-nonsense lawman from Taos, N.M., onto the crime-ridden streets of New York City. His wild-west tactics, such as riding his horse through Manhattan traffic, drove local policemen crazy, but he always solved the case.

Weaver appeared in several movies, including "Touch of Evil," "Ten Wanted Men," "Gentle Giant," "Seven Angry Men," "Dragnet," "Way ... Way Out" and "The Bridges at Toko-Ri."

Weaver also was an activist for protecting the environment and combating world hunger.

He served as president of Love Is Feeding Everyone (LIFE), which fed 150,000 needy people a week in Los Angeles County. He founded the Institute of Ecolonomics, which sought solutions to economic and environmental problems. He spoke at the United Nations and Congress, as well as to college students and school children about fighting pollution and starvation.

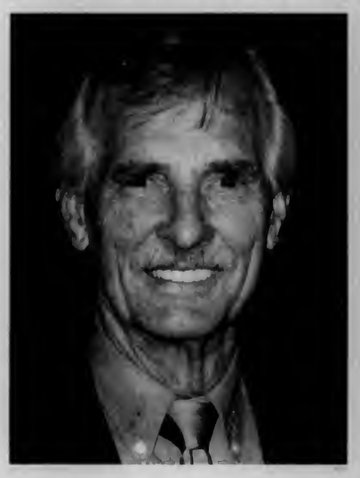
"Earthship" was the most visible of Weaver's crusades. He and his wife, Gerry, built a solar-powered Colorado home out of recycled tires and cans. The thick walls helped keep the inside temperature even year around.

"When the garbage man comes," Jay Leno once quipped, "how does he know where the garbage begins and the house ends?"

Weaver responded: "If we get into the mind-set of saving rather than wasting and utilizing other materials, we can save the Earth."

The tall, slender actor came by his Midwestern twang naturally. He was born June 4, 1924, in Joplin, Mo., where he excelled in high-school drama and athletics. After Navy service in World War II, he enrolled at the University of Oklahoma and nearly qualified for the Olympic decathlon.

He studied at the Actors Studio in New York and appeared in "A Streetcar Named Desire" opposite Shelley Winters and toured in "Come Back, Little Sheba" with Shirley Booth.



Universal Studios signed Weaver to a contract in 1952 but found little work for him. He freelanced in features and television until he landed "Gunsmoke."

Weaver appeared in dozens of TV movies, the most notable being the 1971 "Duel." It was a bravura performance for both fledgling director Steven Spielberg and Weaver, who played a driver menaced by a large truck that followed him down a mountain road. The film was released in theaters in 1983, after Spielberg had directed some box-office smashes.

Weaver's other TV series include "Kentucky Jones," "Emerald Point N.A.S.," "Stone" and "Buck James." From 1973 to 1975, he served as president of the Screen Actors Guild.

Most recently, Weaver starred last year in ABC Family's "Wildfire" as the eccentric owner of a thoroughbred racing ranch.

Weaver is survived by his wife, sons Rick, Robby and Rusty, and three grandchildren.

Actor and activist Dennis Weaver died on Friday in his Colorado home of complications from cancer.

"Say Anything... Is A Real Boy"
J Records

The record industry continues to bite its own hand with re-releasing independent label albums when the artist signs with a major label. Instead of just pushing for the already released material, they have the newer version include some B-sides or extra tracks that current fans will enjoy, which will then force them to find a way to buy another copy of the album.

This time the re-release is Say Anything's album, "Say Anything...Is A Real Boy." Yes, the band stole their name from Cameron Crowe's Lloyd meets girl love story, but that doesn't matter.

What really matters is the music that fills up this album. The band insists that the original songs on this album make up a rock 'n' roll opera, similar to the idea Green Day, Armor For Sleep and Coheed and Cambria took with all of their latest albums. But when it boils down to it, the 13 songs don't sound much different from a non-themed album.

Now, in the re-released version of the album there are an additional seven songs, making the album long enough to be considered an opera. But even with the additional songs, the theme isn't really there.

Regardless of theme, the 20 songs are catchy, sloppy pop-punk with emo influences. Each one is lined with front man Max Bemis's tongue-in-cheek lyrics. Bemis is by no means a poet with a guitar, but his lyrics are enjoyable. They make you laugh at one point and nod your head along during another.

The instrumentation of Say Anything follows the typical chord structure of the underground pop-punk genre — for non-listeners of the genre, this means that nothing is too difficult to play. Drummer Coby Linder is no Keith Moon; in fact, his drumming is rather boring. The songs, as a whole, sound as if they intertwine into one another due to the lack of variety, which is why they're sloppy pop-punk in the first place.

MTV will definitely take notice of this album this time around, and they just might have enough energy to make it on "Total Request Live." Say Anything has vast potential to take Fall Out Boy down and become your 14-year-old sister's new favorite band.

Slow Runner

"No Disassemble"
Red Distribution

Slow Runner is exactly what their name implies: slow. Not that being slow is a bad thing; the band Low made a career for itself by being slow, and now it is credited with a genre birth.

But Slow Runner is different from Low; they are more instrumental and more radio friendly with their album "No Disassemble."

"No Disassemble" is without a doubt a well put together album. Each song varies from the one before it. Although some of the songs have too much use of the synthesizer, the rest of the album without it makes up the much better parts.

The lyrics are simple and straightforward, which is not a bad thing by any means. They are definitely the main focus of the album; the instrumentation compliments the lyrics, coating them in a poppy, Beatles-esque background, although they sound more like David Gray than the Beatles.

Even Flynn's vocals at times appear to sound like Gray, especially during the song "Streamlined," which is the album's ballad. After "Streamlined," the album goes back to its pop feeling with a hint of country twang, which is a throwback to the fact Flynn grew up in South Carolina and moved back there after going to college in Boston.

The biggest fault of "No Disassemble" is the fact that the album starts to drag when the filler songs start to come on. Unfortunately, this hurts the album's rating, despite the first half being free of any filler and actually a fun listen.

Like so many others, Slow Runner got carried away with the idea of making an entire album of material when they should have made an EP. The EP would have been close to perfect modern pop-rock. One can only hope that when the band attempts to record new material, they will know their limits and record only songs that are really needed. Only then the band will have a shot of being noticed in the depth of the mainstream pop world with other bands like the Goo Goo Dolls and Maroon 5.

Brown sued in London

By David Stringer
Associated Press

LONDON — "The Da Vinci Code" author Dan Brown was accused in Britain's High Court on Monday of taking material for his blockbuster conspiracy thriller from a 1982 book about the Holy Grail.

The accusation was made in a breach of copyright lawsuit filed against "The Da Vinci Code" publisher Random House. If the lawsuit succeeds in getting an injunction barring use of the disputed material, the scheduled May 19 release of "The Da Vinci Code" film starring Tom Hanks and Ian McKellan could be threatened.

Michael Baigent and Richard Leigh, authors of "The Holy Blood and the Holy Grail," sued Random House, which also published their book. Random House denies the claim.

Baigent and Leigh claim Brown appropriated their ideas and themes in writing his book, which has sold more than 25 million copies worldwide since its 2003 publication.

Both books hinge on the theory that Jesus married Mary Magdalene and they had a child, and that blood line survives to this day. The earlier book set out the notion that Christ did not die on the cross but lived later in France.

Brown, who was expected to testify next week, told reporters outside court that this idea had no appeal for him.

"Suggesting a married Jesus is one thing, but questioning the Resurrection undermines the very heart of Christian belief," said Brown, who described himself as a committed Christian.

Jonathan Rayner James, a lawyer for Baigent and Leigh, said the case did not relate to the theft of specific parts of text but to the appropriation of themes and ideas.

"Brown copied from 'The Holy Blood and the Holy Grail' and therefore the publication of the resulting novel is an infringement of my clients' copyright," he told the court.

James said his case was not an attempt to "stultify creative endeavor" or claim a monopoly on ideas or historical debate.

But Jonathan Baldwin, representing Random House, said Baigent and Leigh were making "wild allegations."

He said they were suggesting that "Mr. Brown has appropriated not only the numerous parts of a jigsaw puzzle but the organizational way (Baigent and Leigh) put it together."

"In brief, the complaint appears to be that 'The Holy Blood and the Holy Grail' discloses the idea that Jesus was married to Mary Magdalene, that they had children which survived and married into a line of French kings, that the lineage continues today, and that there is a secret society based in France which has the objective of restoring this lineage to the thrones not only of France but to the thrones of other European nations as well, and that ('The Da Vinci Code') uses some of this idea," Baldwin said.

He said Brown referred to "The Holy Blood and the Holy Grail" in his novel, but the earlier book "did not have anything like the importance to Mr. Brown which the claimants contend it had."

The case is being heard in the Royal Courts of Justice on The Strand, a short walk from the Temple Church, which figures in Brown's book. The church, founded by the Knights Templars, has reported an increase in visitor traffic inspired by "The Da Vinci Code."

Brown's book also was the target of a previous U.S. lawsuit. In 2005, a U.S. judge in New York ruled that his book did not infringe on the copyrights of "Daughter of God," by Lewis Perdue. The judge also ruled out any copyright violations of Perdue's 1983 novel "The Da Vinci Legacy."

Edan

8/10

"Beauty and the Beat"
Lewis Records

Boston-based psychedelic rapper producer Edan has begun to make a name for himself based on the strength of "Beauty and the Beat," his second record. Even from the intro track, "Politie Meeting," it is clear that Edan has crafted a unique world, a mix of '60s psychedelia, late '80s-early '90s sunshine hip-hop and something that is purely 21st century. He clearly has a sense of hip-hop history, as well, intoning at the beginning of "I See Colours," "Prince Paul already used this loop ... But I'm gonna keep it moving and put you up on the scoop," the impressive "Tumbling Over Words That Rhyme" cites myriad rap pioneers as Edan forges ahead on his own.

In a world where it seems that everyone is trying to latch on to whatever the latest trend is, posturing themselves as the greatest thing on earth, Edan is refreshing. While he occasionally falls into some hip-hop trappings (i.e. bravado, homophobia as a means of being manly), Edan serves as an antidote to much of what is wrong with many modern rappers. "Torture Chamber" is nowhere as scary as the title indicates; in fact, it is one of the album's trippiest songs, with a ways beat and a dash of reverb on the vocals that makes the whole song float. "Rock and Roll" lives up to its title without even approaching the weary world of rap-rock; Edan uses a lot of guitars and rockist instrumentation while still keeping things distinctly hip-hop and completely fresh.

"Beauty and the Beat" is the type of cohesive, full album that seems very rare in the world of rap music. Not one note is a waste and not one song is filler. As a result, the album is brief, coming in at just over 30 minutes with 13 tracks. However, the album revels in its brevity, bouncing from song to song at a fervent pace, which matches Edan's rapping and production style to a tee.

What makes "Beauty and the Beat" even more exciting is the fact that is has an instant payoff as well as a sense of hidden subtleties. It is an album that sets out to impress immediately but has enough content that it simply just gets better and better on repeat listens, as any good album does. On a cursory listen the album can seem a bit overwhelming; it is so big, colorful, druggy and energetic that each song seems to transport into a world of its own. The more and more spins it gets, though, "Beauty and the Beat" reveals each part of each beat, and each line in each song, and proves itself to be the kind of grand, thought-out work that signals the arrival of a new, important artist. Edan doesn't need big name producers, hamfisted boasts or the latest trends. Edan just needs Edan, and that's exactly what makes him such a special, and astounding, talent.

Public Enemy

6/10

"New Whirl Odor"
Slam Jamz Records

As the intro track on "New Whirl Odor" proudly states, "Public Enemy made me realize that all rap is not the same... they changed the perception of what hip-hop could be." Almost 20 years since PE released their first album, unleashing their furious sound and message on the world, one of the best acts in rap is still alive and kicking, if not in full force.

"New Whirl Odor" is the group's first release since 2002's "Revolverlution," an album that combined new songs with live cuts and remixes, and, like that release, is a mixed bag. Fans and critics alike argue about how long it's been since the band released an above-average album; they haven't released a truly great album since 1990 or 1991, and while they have had flashes of brilliance to varying extents, the band has felt stale since at least 1999. Of course the reality of a "stale" Public Enemy is that the group is still more intelligent, interesting and vital than the majority of modern hip-hop and "New Whirl Odor" only emphasizes that, while not doing anything particularly excellent in the process.

Public Enemy gained fame and notoriety for being a unique, groundbreaking hip-hop group; they sounded like nothing else on earth and prided themselves on that. Perhaps it is a commentary on the state of the country that the band hasn't been able to change, evolve or move to the next level. No wonder Chuck D still rhymes about similar topics; the country has moved from one Bush to another while retaining almost all the same characteristics of the first administration. That being said, Chuck D is still one of the few MCs that speaks the truth, even if it's occasionally via clumsy metaphors, and is still one of the most commanding people to ever be recorded on tape.

On every track, from "New Whirl Odor" to "MKTVTKWR" to "Makes Ya Blind," Chuck D is filled with the type of righteous, vitriolic anger that inspires great artists of all forms. Chuck D might not be breaking new ground with his raps, and none of the verses on this album will probably rank among his best, but simply by being around and being himself he makes an important statement.

What damages "New Whirl Odor" more are the beats, or the lack thereof. Few songs are outright terrible, though the metal riffing of "What A Fool Believes" is simply bad, but there is nothing on here that even tries to compete with the legendary work of The Bomb Squad on the early PE records. Most of the beats are generic, 21st century hard-rap material. It certainly makes sense that it is harder for Chuck D, Flavor Flav and Professor Griff (who sounds generally sub par on the whole album, anyway) to excel when the music they are working with isn't as inspiring.

Regardless of the faults and there are faults – it is always good to hear from Public Enemy, especially given the generally sad state of hip-hop, music and society as a whole. Even when the songs fall short of the high bar set by early PE records, they still have the stamp of a great artist, even if they aren't at the top of their game.

Ray Davies

6/10

"Other People's Lives"
V2 Records

As singer, guitarist and principal songwriter of The Kinks, Ray Davies has been the man behind some of rock's greatest songs. Over 40 years after starting one of the most influential, important and wonderful bands in the history of the genre, Davies has released his first official full-length solo album. "Other People's Lives" bears many of Davies trademarks, including his knack for witty and often humorous lyrics, but it doesn't quite match up to his storied legacy with The Kinks.

Of course, not many 61-year-old musical legends live up to their past and "Other People's Lives" is in no way a disappointment. In fact, it far surpasses the expectations set by other middle-aged and older musicians, in that it doesn't feel like a grab for past glories, nor does it reek of being out of touch. Davies, as always, seems confident and relaxed and it shows in his music.

The individual songs on "Other People's Lives" all follow a similar pattern – a form of adult-alternative that is loaded with subtle lead guitar lines and friendly chord progressions. Davies' formula cuts both ways; nothing on the record really stands out as a truly amazing song but the whole proceedings are entirely pleasant. No songs have the big hooks or memorable riffs that The Kinks' best songs were built around, but nothing flops. Likewise, Davies' lyrics often fit the mold of storytelling singer-songwriter, which lends itself to the folky sounding album title, and while they are often hit-or-miss, they all circle around a satisfying, if vaguely mediocre, center.

And that, in a brief summary, is "Other People's Lives." It won't be revolutionizing the form, nor will it take people by storm. However, it is of somewhat remarkable quality for a man who already has 40 years of great music under his belt. Davies may not offer anything to compete with his greatest songs on "Other People's Lives," but he doesn't sound like he's out of tricks, either. The opening number, "Things Are Going To Change (The Morning After)," kicks things off nicely, insuring the listener that this album is no stale veteran-rocker retread. The title track, a sly, winking attack on media coverage of celebrities, is another highlight.

Davies has not crafted an album that will probably stand as a career milestone, but it does serve an important purpose in his career, proving that not only can he go it alone, but that he still has some spice left in him. "Other People's Lives" is, if anything, an indicator that Davies should not be counted out of the pop-rock game. While moments of pure, unbridled genius are few and far between on this album, there are countless signs that he might still have some brewing for the future.

Uncertain future for Clemens

Baltimore Orioles signed veteran free agent outfielder Richard Hidalgo to a minor league contract.

Hidalgo, 30, who is expected to report to the Orioles spring training facility Monday, batted .221 with 16 home runs and 43 RBIs in 88 games for Texas last season.

If he makes the 25-man roster, Hidalgo will earn a base salary of $1 million plus incentives.

Also at Orioles camp, All-Star Melvin Mora pulled out of the World Baseball Classic after being asked to play center field for Venezuela, rather than third base.

"I cannot go to that competition to try to play something I don't know how to play. I mean, I know how to play that, but it's a long time I don't play center field. I'm a third baseman. I cannot do that," Mora said.

"He's gone home for personal matters," Royals manager Buddy Bell said. "That's all I can say about it. He's just got permission to go home and take care of a few things. I hate to be so vague, but hopefully this will be taken care of sooner, if not later."

In Kissimmee, Fla., Brian Jordan fielded ground balls at first base as he attempted to improve his chances of making the Atlanta Braves' roster as a utility player.

"He's bouncing around out there," manager Bobby Cox said. "He plays first base pretty good. He catches the ball really nice. I was pleasantly surprised."

Jordan, one month away from his 39th birthday, was invited to the Braves' camp as a non-roster player. He hit .247 with three homers and 24 RBIs last season, when he couldn't hold a starting job.

"I just want to show them I can do it if they need me," he said. "It just gives Bobby more options."

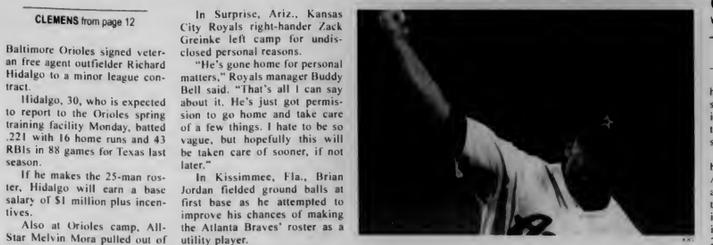
In Bradenton, Fla., the Pittsburgh Pirates are worried that a blood clot close to starter Kip Wells' right arm could jeopardize his season.

General manager Dave Littlefield described the clot as a "100 percent blockage" of the axillary artery under the clavicle, the primary vessel that carries blood from the chest to the arms.

Wells, 28, told the team he still must determine if he wants to get a second opinion before having surgery, a decision he was expected to make within two days. If Wells has surgery, he would likely miss five to eight months of playing time.

"There's always a concern in regard to aneurysms, clots and things like that," Littlefield said. "But we moved on it very, very quickly."

The Pirates were expecting Wells to be one of the top two starters in their rotation. The right-hander is coming off a disappointing season – he was 8-18, the most losses in the majors, with a 5.08 earned run average.



In Port St. Lucie, Fla., Mets reliever Jorge Julio threw from a mound during a practice cut short by rain.

Julio, signed from the Baltimore Orioles in the offseason, spent the first two weeks of spring training stuck in his native Venezuela, waiting for his visa to clear. Now that Julio has finally arrived, the Mets can begin to assess how he will fit into their bullpen.

Julio was up and down last season in Baltimore, where he lost the closer job to B.J. Ryan and went 3-5 with a 5.90 ERA in 67 appearances.

"This is my first time getting a chance to see him on my team," Mets manager Willie Randolph said.

Blue Devils, Huskies on top

By Jim O'Connell
Associated Press

It's back to a familiar pair at the top of The Associated Press' college basketball poll.

Duke was No. 1 for the second straight week Monday, and Connecticut moved up one spot to No. 2. The teams held those two spots for eight of the previous 11 polls, each on top for four weeks.

The Blue Devils (27-1) were a runaway No. 1 for a second straight week, receiving 65 first-place votes and 1,791 points from the 72-member national media panel. Duke beat Georgia Tech and Temple last week with senior guard J.J. Redick becoming the Atlantic Coast Conference's all-time scorer against Temple.

Connecticut (25-2) made the jump following Sunday's 89-75 victory over No. 2 Villanova, avenging the loss to the Wildcats two weeks ago that knocked the Huskies from No. 1.

Connecticut, which also beat Notre Dame in overtime last week, was No. 1 on six ballots and had 1,725 points.

Memphis (26-2) extended its winning streak to 15 games with victories over Texas-El Paso and Tulsa last week and moved up one spot to No. 3, matching its highest ranking this season. The Tigers received the other first-place vote.

Villanova (22-3) dropped from second to fourth after beating Cincinnati 74-72 and losing at Connecticut. The No. 2 ranking matched the highest in school history.

Gonzaga held fifth place in the next-to-last poll of the season, while Texas and George Washington, which has the nation's longest winning streak at 16 games, switched spots at sixth and seventh.

Pittsburgh moved up one place to No. 8, while Ohio State and Illinois were ninth and 10th.

The Top-10 ranking is the first for Ohio State since the Buckeyes were eighth in the final poll of 1999-2000.

Tennessee was 11th followed by Boston College, North Carolina, Washington, UCLA, West Virginia, Florida, Kansas, Oklahoma and Georgetown.

The last five ranked teams were LSU, North Carolina State, Iowa, Nevada and Michigan State.

North Carolina made the week's biggest jump from 21st to No. 13, the Tar Heels' highest ranking of the season. They lost the top seven scorers from last season's national championship team and few expected them to be so firmly entrenched in the Top 25.

"No one had ever gone through it. We lost 91 percent of our scoring, and I believe 89 percent of our rebounding," North Carolina coach Roy Williams said Monday. "I didn't have any coach I could call and ask, 'What did you do?' We've sort of been going by the seat of our pants."

And Williams credits the attitude of his players for the success.

"It's the most unusual group, and it's a group that I'm just enjoying the heck out of," he said. "They accept what I'm saying and not how I'm saying it, or how ugly a face I'm making when I say it to them. They're a fun, fun group to coach."

Northern Iowa (22-8) dropped out of the rankings after being tied for 25th last week. The Panthers have lost four of their last five games, including losses last week to Bradley and Southern Illinois.

North Carolina State, which lost to North Carolina and Boston College last week, and Michigan State, which lost to Ohio State and Indiana, had the week's biggest falls, each dropping seven places.

Duke coach Mike Krzyzewski leads the Blue Devils into March with a No. 1 ranking in the Associated Press Poll.

Connecticut coach Jim Calhoun, after losing to Villanova earlier in the season, returned the favor with a decisive victory over the Wildcats at home.

Beijing to host 2008 Summer Olympics

By John Roderick
Associated Press

Now that the winter Olympians have stolen away from Italy with their skis, skates and polished granite curling stones, the eyes of the sports world turn with rising excitement to the 2008 summer games in Beijing.

The excitement has been stirred by an irony of history. It follows the Athens games, site of both the ancient and modern Olympics, and comes for the first time to a vast and fast-growing Asian nation which got seriously involved in Olympic sports less than 25 years ago.

After the less than thrilling winter Olympics staged in a country familiar to millions of Americans, the Beijing games promise all the elements of an international thriller: mystery, money, controversy and pageantry. It will offer to the West a glimpse, through press and television, into a little-known country whose old civilization is colored by two very different philosophers, Confucius and Karl Marx.

Although it is regarded as one of the cradles of human civilization, its interest in organized sports during its Confucian era, which lasted until 1949, was minimal. Sports were the individual diversions of a highly born few.

When the Olympic Games were renewed in 1896, the empress dowager Tzu Hsi is said to have asked what they were all about. Told they involved running, she reportedly remarked she could send some of her eunuchs to take part since they were experts at running her court.

True or false, in any event she was much too busy egging on a murderous nationalist group of highly unsporting fanatics called the Boxers, who believed magic charms made them un-killable and unbeatable.

They laid siege in 1900 to the foreign legations of Beijing. Their defeat by an allied army of Americans, Japanese and Europeans paved the way for the 1911 fall of imperial rule and the beginning of the republican era.

Sports for the masses did not flourish in that period except for the foreign conquerors who settled down in the defeated country to squeeze what wealth they could find out of it. They built polo grounds, race tracks, tennis courts and swimming pools for their own diversion and put up signs saying "Chinese keep out."

I met one of these Chinese in 1947, a highly educated mandarin whose long fingernails and courtly manner proclaimed disdain for work or sport. After lunch at the highly colonial Peking club, I took him to watch two sweating Brits playing a vigorous game of tennis under the hot sun.

"What," I asked, "do you think of this game?"

He smiled apologetically and replied, "It is much too much for me. I would hire coolies to do that kind of work."

Mao Zedong's communists whom I met in a seven-month stay in Yanan, their cave capital, had a very different view of sports. They actively encouraged widespread athletic activity not only for its own sake but for its value in war and nation-building.

When they conquered China in 1949 they still believed in its virtues but had to put off its application as they fought among themselves, bringing the nation to the brink of destruction.

Mao, the center of these quarrels, was a sports lover himself, famous for his widely reported plunges into the Yangtze River in the 1950s where it was said, but not confirmed, that he broke the world's record for floating downstream on his back.

Mao's death in 1976 marked the end of nationwide bloodshed and the rise of the diminutive Deng Xiaoping, whose only passion was bridge. A man of great wit and modesty, he let others have the titles but ran the show. He opened up China to the outside world, introduced the free market and allowed limited democracy and controlled capitalism.

During the 1980s and 1990s, when Deng shook up China, mass sports had their golden age. The women's volleyball team made the breakthrough in 1981. It defeated Japan for the first time to win a world championship, then after grabbing five consecutive world titles won an Olympic gold.

Before that, during the nationalist republican era, China competed in three Olympic games but never won a medal. Since Deng's day, it has won hundreds. In the 2004 Athens Olympics it took 23 gold medals, only three behind the leader, the United States.

Bitterly disappointed to lose its bid for the 2000 games, the Chinese government publicly and stridently declared they were "a human right of the Chinese people."

It was an unfortunate phrase, one that recalled recent failures, despite remarkable progress since 1949, to grant freedom to protest by some of its citizens.

Human Rights Watch, which monitors denial of freedoms worldwide, has already given notice it will pay special attention to the 2008 Games.

China's present rulers have yet to fully carry out Deng's plan to grant wider political and personal freedoms to match the enormous economic breakthrough which put China on its present path to unparalleled economic prosperity.

An object of astonished admiration for achieving eight to 10 percent annual growth, China sees the Beijing games as a boost to that process. Hundreds of stores have already begun to stock their shelves with Olympic-related products. It similarly expects enormous returns in Olympic-inspired tourism, travel and trade.

But more than anything else, it yearns to collect what no money can buy: the goodwill and esteem of its neighbors and the prestige it enjoyed in ancient days as the illustrious Middle Kingdom.

Powerhouse rematch doesn't disappoint

The Villanova-Connecticut rematch lived up to its billing, a couple of Big East heavyweights slugging it out for the conference lead.

The third-ranked Huskies came out on top this time with an 89-75 home win Sunday, avenging a loss to the No. 2 Wildcats two weeks ago that knocked them from the top spot in the AP poll.

There is the possibility the teams could meet again, maybe in the Big East tournament or in the NCAAs.

"The only place down the road I want to see them is in Indianapolis at the Final Four," Connecticut coach Jim Calhoun said. "They come loaded and knock you down. That is a great team with heart."

Villanova coach Jay Wright agreed.

"I really don't want to see them again, but if we play them again it will be a big game," he said.

Denham Brown, Connecticut's senior swingman, had a career-high 23 points on 8-for-13 shooting. He had a total of 18 points in the Huskies' last three games, the first of which was the loss to Villanova (22-3, 12-2) that ended an 11-game winning streak.

Rashad Anderson, Hilton Armstrong and Jeff Adrien also came up big for Connecticut 13 days after Villanova beat the Huskies 69-64 in Philadelphia.

"This game was really a big game for us, a statement," Adrien said. "They got real happy after that first win and we had to shut their mouths. Today we had to go out there and show them we're not what they think we are. We are men out there."

In other Top 25 games, it was Alabama 82, No. 12 Florida 77; No. 17 Washington 73, California 62; Indiana 78, No. 18 Michigan State 71; No. 19 UCLA 70, Oregon 53; and No. 21 North Carolina 81, Maryland 57.

The Huskies (25-2, 12-2) took control of this game with an 18-3 run in the second half.

"We're tougher than a lot of people give us credit for," Brown said. "This was a game we had a bull's eye on for the last two weeks."

Anderson, the leading non-starting scorer in the country at 13.5 points per game, had 17 points and was 5-for-7 from 3-point range.

Armstrong, the senior center who anchors the best shot-blocking team in the nation, had nine points and eight of the Huskies' 11 blocked shots.

Then there was Adrien, the freshman forward, who had eight points and nine rebounds and came up with several big plays in the game-breaking run.

"All of a sudden, the game changed when Jeff Adrien got in it," Calhoun said. "That was something for a freshman to express his emotion the way he did."

Allan Ray had 19 points for Villanova, but the senior guard left with just under 3 minutes to play with an injury to his left knee. He was taken to the locker room and came back with his knee wrapped in ice.

Ray, who said he slipped on a wet spot, said he would have an MRI on Monday. But he walked out of Gampel Pavilion with a wrap on his knee and without a limp.

"They were on the top of every aspect of their game," Villanova coach Jay Wright said. "We will learn from this. You've got to beat the best team in their own house."

Alabama 82, No. 12 Florida 77

At Tuscaloosa, Ala., Ronald Steele scored 19 points and Alabama was 6-for-6 from the free-throw line in the final 31 seconds to beat Florida.

The Crimson Tide (16-10, 9-5 Southeastern Conference) survived a late 3-point barrage by snaring three straight offensive rebounds and sealing the win at the line.

Taurean Green scored 20 points to lead Florida (22-6, 8-6).

No. 17 Washington 73, California 62

At Seattle, Brandon Roy scored 19 of his 27 points in the second half to lead Washington into a second place tie in the Pac-10.

Playing in his final home game of an impressive career, Roy made 9 of 13 shots, 7 of 9 in the second half, as Washington (22-5, 11-5) avenged a January loss to the Bears by breaking open a rugged game midway through the final period.

The Huskies and Bears (17-8, 11-5) are tied for second, one game behind UCLA, with two regular-season games remaining.

Indiana 78, No. 18 Michigan State 71

At Bloomington, Ind., Robert Vaden scored 21 points and Errek Suhr stole the ball and hit two clinching free throws with a half-minute to go as the Hoosiers held off a second-half comeback in coach Mike Davis's final game at Assembly Hall.

Indiana (15-10, 7-7 Big Ten) will finish the regular season at Purdue and Michigan before the start of the conference tournament on March 9 in Indianapolis.

From Turin to Vancouver

By David Crary
Associated Press

TURIN, Italy – Arrivederci, eh?

Turin bid farewell to its Olympics and handed over custody of the Winter Games to Vancouver in a spectacular, circus-like closing ceremony Sunday night, with a legion of clowns, acrobats and daredevils echoing both the misadventures and magnificence of the past two weeks.

The Olympic flame was barely extinguished when fireworks and confetti – an Italian invention – filled the air. Any wistfulness was swiftly submerged in the din, some of it provided by Latin pop sensation Ricky Martin; athletes joined the cast in dancing on the stage.

The theme of the evening was Carnevale, the annual festival being celebrated across Italy over the weekend. Some athletes wore red clown noses as they marched across the huge stage of Olympic Stadium, and many of the 35,000 spectators donned devil and angel masks.

Italy had an extra reason to celebrate – a new national hero headlining the first-ever medal ceremony included in a Winter Games' closing festivities. Italy's Giorgio di Centa took gold in the 50km cross-country skiing race on the final day of the games.

The crowd exploded in cheers and waved a sea of tiny Italian flags as di Centa and his fellow medalists strode to the podium. Helping bestow the medals was di Centa's sister, Manuela, an International Olympic Committee member and former cross-country medalist herself.

KRT

Shani Davis became the first black athlete to make the U.S. Speedskating team and win a gold medal at the Winter Olympics.

Before declaring the games closed, IOC president Jacques Rogge described the Turin Olympics as "truly magnificent."

"You have succeeded brilliantly in meeting your challenge," he told organizers. "Grazie, Torino."

"We've done it," exulted Valentino Castellani, the organizing committee chief.

While Castellani spoke, an intruder who had obtained a staff ski-jacket approached the microphone and shouted, "Passion lives in Torino" before being whisked away by security officers. He was taken into custody for questioning.

The spotlight then shifted to Vancouver, host of the 2010 Games, with the raising of Canada's Maple Leaf flag and a resounding rendition of "O, Canada" by British Columbia-born opera star Ben Heppner.

An Olympic flag was handed by Turin Mayor Sergio Chiamparino to Rogge and then to Vancouver Mayor Sam Sullivan.

A quadriplegic since breaking his neck skiing at 19, Sullivan was unable to grasp the flag pole and wave it himself. Instead, Rogge placed the flag in a special cylinder on Sullivan's motorized wheelchair, and the elated mayor spun around several times to make the flag flutter, to the crowd's delight.

The lighthearted, often-lyrical pageantry opened with a white-and-black-clad clown on horseback entering from beneath the giant Olympic rings at one end of the stadium.

KRT

Bode Miller went home empty handed for the 2006 Winter Olympics after being picked to contend from five gold medals.

A dazzling array of circus acts, parades and carnival shenanigans followed – clowns on swings and swiveling in large hoops, ballerinas and tumblers, acrobats dangling high above the stage from ribbons and rings, a person on stilts jumping rope, dancers dressed as Tarot cards. One convoy of clowns was equipped with vintage Italian motor scooters and pint-sized Fiat 500s, one of the smallest cars ever mass-produced.

Throughout, bits of burlesque unfolded in the stadium's entryways and aisles as a vagabond flower seller – a traditional carnival figure – was chased by a squad of Swiss guards. Watching it all was the so-called carnival court, a buffoonish royal entourage seated in a center stage box intended to gently mock the VIP seating of various Olympic dignitaries.

Among the real-life VIPs attending were Italian Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi, who waited until the final day to make his first visit to the games, and a U.S. delegation including former New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani and car-racing great Mario Andretti. Berlusconi was greeted with a mix of cheers and jeers when he was introduced.

The athletes entered to the backdrop of "Volare," "That's Amore," and other classics. Among the flag-bearers were several gold medal winners, including U.S. speedskater Joey Cheek, Russian figure skater Evgeni Plushenko and Canadian speedskater Cindy Klassen, who won a games-high five medals.

Once seated in the stadium's lower deck, the athletes had a prime view of perhaps the ceremony's most magical moment.

Out of a ring in the center of the stage, a hidden, vertical wind tunnel was positioned to send up a blast of air powerful enough to lift winged, white-clad performers high in midair to hover like slow-gliding birds. One after another, to ethereal music, these flying humans rose gracefully and floated in the spotlight, then descended – one of them, incredibly, on a snowboard; another on skis.

Soon afterward, the Olympic flag, aloft since the start of the games, was lowered and carried out slowly by eight Italian sports greats, including boxer Nino Benvenuti and skier Gustavo Thoeni. A children's choir sang Verdi's beautiful chorus "Va, pensiero" from the opera "Nabucco."

Italian tenor Andrea Bocelli followed, and roughly 400 lamp-carrying women in white gowns drifted across the stage. Their lamps slowly extinguished and then, suddenly, the huge Olympic flame high above the stadium went out as well.

Baseball Hall of Fame recognizes Manley

By Travis Reed
Associated Press

TAMPA, Fla. – Effa Manley became the first woman elected to the baseball Hall of Fame when the former Newark Eagles executive was among 17 people from the Negro Leagues and pre-Negro Leagues chosen Monday by a special committee.

This year's Hall class – 18, including former reliever Bruce Sutter – is by far the biggest in history. The previous record was 11 in 1946.

Manley co-owned the New Jersey-based Eagles with her husband, Abe, and ran the business end of the team for more than a decade. The Eagles won the Negro Leagues World Series in 1946 – one year before Jackie Robinson broke the major league color barrier.

Manley was white, but married a black man and passed as a black woman, said Larry Lester, a baseball author and member of the voting committee.

"She campaigned to get as much money as possible for these ballplayers, and rightfully so," Lester said.

Manley used baseball to advance civil rights causes with events such as an Anti-Lynching Day at the ballpark. She died in 1981 at age 84.

Buck O'Neil and Minnie Minoso, the only living members among the 39 candidates on the ballot, were not elected by the 12-person panel.

Mule Suttles and Biz Mackey were among the 12 players selected, along with five executives.

Ray Brown, Willard Brown, Andy Cooper, Cristobal Torriente and Jud Wilson were the other former Negro League players elected. Five pre-Negro Leaguers – Frank Grant, Pete Hill, Jose Mendez, Louis Santop and Ben Taylor – were also chosen.

Alex Pompez, Cum Posey, J.L. Wilkinson and Sol White were the other executives elected.

The new inductees will be enshrined with Sutter – elected by the Baseball Writers' Association of America last month – on July 30 in Cooperstown, N.Y. The new group brought the Hall's membership to 278.

Only 18 Negro Leagues players had been chosen for the Hall prior to this election.

The election was the culmination of a Hall of Fame project to compile a complete history of blacks in the game from 1860 to 1960.

More than 50 historians, authors and researchers spent four years sifting through box scores in 128 newspapers of sanctioned league games from 1920-1954. The result was the most complete collection of Negro Leagues statistics ever compiled, according to the Hall, and a database that includes 3,000 day-by-day records and career leaders.

"What we're proudest of is the broadening of knowledge," Hall of Fame president Dale Petroskey said. "When we started five years ago, we had 20 percent of the stats. We've got 90 percent of the stats now."

Candidates needed nine of 12 votes – 75 percent – from the committee of researchers, professors and baseball historians for election.

Former baseball commissioner Fay Vincent chaired the committee, which voted by secret ballot. Vote totals were not released.

O'Neil, now 94, started his playing career in the 1930s and hit .288 lifetime. He became the first black coach in the majors in 1962 with the Chicago Cubs, and played a key role in the building of the Negro League museum in Kansas City.

Turnover is beast of burden

BY ROB GREENFIELD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

UMass Notebook

The Massachusetts men's basketball team (12-13, 7-7 Atlantic 10) has had its issues on the road, but so have the Richmond Spiders (11-16, 4-10 A-10). The Minutemen's only victories on the road were against sub-par teams like the Duquesne Dukes, St. Peters and St. Bonaventure. Both A-10 road wins came against teams buried at the bottom of the conference. The Spiders, like UMass, loses often on the road but makes up for it at home. Richmond has just one win on the road in 12 games, but has a 14-5 record at home.

A LOT OF TURNOVER

The Minutemen are ranked last in the A-10 in turnovers per game, averaging just over 17 per contest. With inexperience at the point and teams that exploit its weakness, the Minutemen have struggled to hang onto the basketball for the majority of the season; and it has yielded frustrating losses, like the three-point loss to No. 8 George Washington on the road. The Minutemen had 29 turnovers in that game and still managed to lose by just three. UMass had a season-low nine turnovers against the Flyers on Saturday. . . Junior captain Rashaun Freeman scored 19 points and tallied 12 boards against the Flyers Saturday, en route to becoming the A-10 Co-Player of the Week. Junior James Life scored 14 points in the second half of Saturday's game to tie his season-high of 25 points. Freshman point guard Chris Lowe dished out eight assists, bringing his average up to 4.8 per game, which leads the A-10. He is averaging 6.1 assists per game in conference games while playing an extreme amount of minutes due to the lack of depth on the UMass bench . . . Junior captain Stephane Lasme swatted four shots on Saturday, giving him 104 for the season. Lasme and Marcus Camby are the only players in UMass history to block over 100 shots in a season.

Junior captain Rashaun Freeman scored 15 of his 19 total points in the second half of Saturday's game against the Dayton Flyers.

Junior captain Stephane Lasme became the second player in UMass history to record more than 100 blocked shots in a season.

HAIRY SITUATION

Lasme added another couple of inches to his 6-foot-9 frame on Saturday when, instead of his usual dreadlocks, he let the fro go. It puffed out to a significant length and put Lasme to around Luke Bonner's height, though the wind resistance might have slowed him down a little bit.

MULLINS IMPROVEMENTS

The Mullins Center has added new technological additions in recent weeks to add to the fan experience during games. Two large video screens were added at the ends of the arena, and proved useful for Minuteman warm-ups, instead of the typical starting lineup introductions to music blaring overhead. UMass players and fans saw a highlight video featuring great plays from earlier in the season. When the players were introduced, it pictured a profile of information with the player turning and facing the camera. The video screens were tastefully done and they are not as visually imposing as one might think. The screens were also used to honor the late Jack Leaman at halftime on Saturday with a ceremonial video that featured UMass legends Julius Erving and Rick Pitino.

BATTLE OF YOUTH

UMass coach Travis Ford is just 36 years-old, one of the younger coaches in Division I college basketball. But on Wednesday he will face a coach two years younger in Richmond's Chris Mooney. The Richmond coach is the seventh-youngest in Division I. Ford has five years of head-coaching experience at Eastern Kentucky.

UMass comeback falls short against HC

BY BRENDAN HALL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Be it sluggishness, depth, or the 1.5 inches of snow blanketing the Astroturf on Saturday morning. The bottom line remains the same: too little, too late.

In its 2006 season opener, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team's second-half comeback came up empty, as they fell to the Holy Cross Crusaders, 11-8, in snowy conditions at the Hart Center Field.

The Minutewomen, who were missing two of their regular starters, have now lost four straight dating back to the end of last season, and start the season 0-1 for the first time since 2001. The loss also snaps a four-game win streak against the Crusaders, who beat UMass for the first time since 1998 and is currently coached by former UMass player Stephanie Pavlick. UMass is now 8-2 all-time against HC.

After taking the initial 1-0 lead on a goal by freshman midfield Kayt McCormick (game-high four goals, four points, four ground balls), the Minutewomen surrendered five straight goals to put themselves into a hole, trailing 5-1, at halftime. While the second half play of the Maroon and White was much improved, UMass coach Carrie Bolduc agreed that it was too much to overcome.

"If you look at the first half, having that kind of deficit, there's a lot to overcome," Bolduc said. "We did an alright job recovering, but it takes two halves. We took way too long to get started yesterday. We were too late ran and ran out of time."

After two more Crusader goals to start the second half, making it a 7-1 start, the Minutewomen finally got started. This time, McCormick got the ball rolling, and they continued the momentum. Kerry Connerty scored on a free shot, and McCormick scored for her third goal of the game, making it 8-4.

Later in the half, the Minutewomen ripped off three goals in a span of 65 seconds, closing the HC lead to 9-7. Lindsey Cassel scored first, followed by both of sophomore attack Kathleen Typadis' goals.

Crusader goals at the 56 and 57 minute marks, however, nullified the Minutewomen threat. Nikki Bolduc (no relation) scored first, followed by Patricia Sutton, to make it a four-point lead, effectively ending UMass' comeback hopes despite another goal to make it 11-8.

Lauren McCarthy made 10 saves in goal for the Minutewomen, while 2005 Patriot League Goalkeeper of the Year Meagan Orr had eight.

What the Minutewomen lacked depth in the defensive end, due to the absence of two of its starters, McCormick tried make up for. Listed at midfield, the two-time U.S. Lacrosse All-American played out of the back because of the depth, and proved effective in bringing the ball upfield and – as her stats show – doing something with it.

"I was both surprised and pleased with Kaytlin's performance, since I did have her on the defensive end," Bolduc said. "She has a real knack for the ball, more of a killer instinct level of confidence. She brings that to the defensive end, and brought us up to attack out. We couldn't really see the ball," Bolduc said. "Certainly, they [HC] adjusted to it faster than we did. I told them not to take risks, to see what we had to deal with. This was not a day to go out and do something different."

Junior goaltender Lauren McCarthy leads the Minutewomen in the 2006 campaign, which began with a loss to Holy Cross on Saturday.

Ogilvy wins Match Play Championship

BY DOUG FERGUSON
AP GOLF WRITER

CARLSBAD, Calif. – Geoff Ogilvy watched his 25-foot putt take one extra turn and tumble into the cup at No. 14 for an unlikely par and a commanding lead in the Match Play Championship.

He was 4-up with four holes to play against Davis Love III in the final match, and everyone figured it was over.

Ogilvy knew better.

He was on the other end of a situation even more dire two days earlier. Mike Weir was 4-up with four holes to play against Ogilvy and had a wedge in his hand in the 15th fairway. That's when Ogilvy pulled off the greatest escape in the eight-year history of his tournament, winning the next four holes and beating him in overtime.

"It can go the other way, very quick," Ogilvy said.

But during a wild and wacky week at La Costa Resort, all the great comebacks belonged to Ogilvy.

Love dribbled a 25-foot birdie putt on the 16th hole some 4 feet by the cup, started to mark the ball and instead removed his cap and conceded to Ogilvy, a most unlikely winner of the Accenture Match Play Championship.

The final score was 3 and 2.

The turning point for Love came on the ninth hole, when Ogilvy was in trouble and Love had a chance to square the match with a par. Instead, he sent his 6-iron into the gallery and made bogey.

The defining shot for Ogilvy was two holes later in their afternoon round Sunday, when he was 1-up and first to hit on the par-5 11th. He hit a 4-iron that dropped gently toward the flag and stopped 6 feet away for an eagle that was conceded when Love went long into a bunker.

But those are just details.

This week will long be remembered for a 28-year-old Australian who turned in the longest week, then made short work of Love to capture his first World Golf Championship.

"Something was on my side this week," Ogilvy said.

Wednesday afternoon, Michael Campbell had birdie putts of 30 feet and 12 feet on the final two holes to win the match, missed both, then lost when Ogilvy chipped in from 45 feet on the first extra hole.

The next day, Ogilvy thought it was over when Nick O'Hern made a 30-footer on the 18th to force overtime, then pumped his tee shot into 5 feet on the 20th hole.

"Nick doesn't miss putts like that," Ogilvy said. "I had my hat in my hand. I thought it was over. He missed."

Ogilvy won with a two-putt birdie on the next hole.

Then came the miracle rally against Weir, which Ogilvy won with a fairway metal into 4 feet for eagle on the 21st hole. And against David Howell of England in the quarterfinals, he twice watched Howell stand over 12-foot putts to win and miss them both.

Ten times, all he could was wait to see if he went home or kept playing.

"Every single time in those first four games, my opponent had a putt to knock me out of the tournament," Ogilvy said. "And no one made one, which is pretty fortunate."

He was the ultimate survivor at a tournament that requires nothing less.

Ogilvy could have easily been on his way home to Scottsdale, Ariz., after playing 17 holes Wednesday. He wound playing 128 holes over six matches, beating Jeff Maggert's record by one hole for most playing a week at the Match Play Championship.

"I unbelievable," Ogilvy said after his 3-and-2 victory. "It's such a hard tournament to believe you're going to keep going. I got lucky the first four days, and the last two games I played very well."

He joined Craig Parry as the only Australians to win a WGC event, and both required good fortune. Parry was only legible for the '02 NEC Invitational because he won a tournament in New Zealand that Tiger Woods played, making it a qualifier for the WGC.

Olympic Games: Who needs them?

Rob Greenfield

I don't know about you, but it was more fun for me watching E-Harmony commercials than sitting through snowboarding, skiing, figure skating, speed skating, or any of the other obscure sports that nobody in this country cares about.

The United States viewing public is inherently self-centered – so an event held halfway across the globe in a city that is spelled differently on different continents, that features countries like Kazakhstan and the U.S. Virgin Islands (Grandma Luge, anybody?) and has alcoholics for American competitors, probably won't draw that well here.

Every comedian in the history of stand-up comedy has taken a shot at the Winter Olympics. Jerry Seinfeld, in his stand-up performance on Broadway a few years back, said that an event where citizens competed in the Luge against their will would be just as competitive. The "Involuntary Luge", he called it.

Actually, that's not a bad idea. It would probably fit right in with Bode Miller drinking before runs (I think he took some pre-game advice from Kevin Millar), Lindsey Jacobellis falling on her face to claim the illustrious silver medal and speedskating foes Shani Davis and Chad Hedrick spouting meaningless rhetoric back and forth.

After all of that action, I had to take a nap.

Jerry Seinfeld's next suggestion: swimming pool strangulation, where swimmers strangle someone at the end of each lap and can only continue on after the man, or woman, is thoroughly strangled. He said it makes as much sense as the biathalon, which combines skiing up and down mountains with sniping ability – and I'm inclined to believe him because the biathalon makes no sense unless you live in northern Siberia.

(By the way, how do you know that you are destined to be a biathalon-er? Do you pack skiing and hunting in one vacation day, find out that you're outstanding at both, and go online to find a place where you can combine the two abilities? I'm sure there is the Lebron James of biathalons somewhere out there, training in the snow-capped mountains of Norway and preparing for his one shining moment, when he can claim the gold medal in the biathalon, the ultimate in Olympic obscurity.)

But I thought about the disgraceful show the Americans put on at this year's Olympic Games, and I came to the conclusion that maybe this was more fun.

Maybe we all missed out on something.

Bode Miller gets loaded before a race, misses one of the gates on the downhill slalom event, and skis off of the course to avoid reporters? (He probably was going to the lodge to get an early start at the bar.)

How funny is that? That's more entertainment than any outstanding athletic achievement at the games could have produced.

Miller joins the ranks of Pete Rose (gambling), Alex Rodriguez (slapping Arroyo's arm and crying innocence), Ricky Davis (throwing the ball off of his own backboard to give himself a triple-double), Roger Clemens (throwing a bat at Mike Piazza running up the first-base line – you were just giving it back to the bat-boy, right Roger?), Ron Artest (we all remember that) and Terrell Owens (the most selfish, egomaniacal athlete in the history of sports) in the Sports Hall of Shame.

And Jacobbellis, the women's snowboarder who had the gold medal all but locked going into her final jump, decided – in an all-too-American fashion – to give the audience a show on the way out. She, of course, blew the last jump, fell on her face (in oh so many ways) and won the silver medal, or as Seinfeld would say: "Congratulations, you almost won. Of the losers, you came in first of that group. You are the No. 1 loser. No one lost ahead of you."

Even is Jacobbellis landed that final jump and glided into the history books with her first gold medal, it still would have been a loss for American athletes all over the world. The perception of U.S. competitors, if it wasn't bad enough already, would have worsened, and citizens of every anti-American nation would point to Jacobbellis as an example of our bloated egos – not exactly a great ambassador for the stars and stripes.

But none of this Olympics stuff matters anyway, right? If the world championships aren't held in the United States and won by American athletes, then it's not the world championships. British comedian Eddie Izzard had this to say about the World Series: "It's funny how it's called the World Series, because Americans seem to win it every year." And we wouldn't have it any other way.

So forget the Olympics. It will be in Vancouver four years from now, which, for those who don't know, is in Canada. But I know all of us will be perfectly fine watching the NFL, MLB and March Madness on the couch at home, eating some McDonalds and chugging the drink of our choice. After all, ignorance is bliss.

Unsigned Clemens reports to Astros

Roger Clemens arrived at Houston's spring training camp, even though he's not on the Astros' staff.

Clemens, a free agent, planned to pitch to minor leaguers in a simulated game Monday afternoon, the team said.

The 43-year-old Clemens wasn't offered salary arbitration by the Astros and cannot resign with them until May 1. He could join another team before May, and Texas, Boston and the New York Yankees are reportedly interested.

Houston general manager Tim Purpura said the Astros got permission from major league baseball to allow the Rocket to pitch at their spring training complex. Clemens led the majors with a 1.87 ERA last year, but was plagued by back and hamstring problems late in the season.

Son Koby Clemens, a third baseman on the Astros' farm team, said Clemens wants to pitch in the World Baseball Classic, then decide whether to retire or play a 23rd season.

He said his dad was ready to retire in December, but his family talked him out of it.

"We were all like, 'You should wait and allow yourself to rest your body,'" Koby Clemens said. "He was still kind of hurting, kind of tired. He was like, 'I don't want to do this again.'"

In Scottsdale, Ariz., Giants manager Felipe Alou says Barry Bonds could play his first spring training game in two years Friday against the Milwaukee Brewers.

Bonds took batting practice for a fifth-straight day Sunday and took part in some fielding drills as he showed signs that he is healthier than he was last year after having three knee operations.

"He told me he feels very, very good," Alou said. "Bonds is having fun. Last year he didn't because he was hurt."

Alou said Bonds would likely play March 5 in an exhibition at Scottsdale Stadium against the U.S. team in the World Baseball Classic. The Giants will be allowed to use the designated hitter in that game.

Study: Poor memory may be attributed to moods, depression

By Susan King
Collegian Correspondent

A poor memory may not always be an effect of aging, but instead may be an effect of moods, particularly depression, according to researchers from the psychology department at the University of Massachusetts.

A study being conducted by Mark Weinberger, a graduate student, Rebecca Ready, assistant psychology professor and Susan Krauss Whitbourne, a psychology professor, is looking at the effects of mood and depression on cognition and memory. It is an important relationship to study because of the rise of individuals experiencing depressive symptoms and the importance that memory has in everyday life. Also, "it will be helpful for older adults to realize that mood can affect memory rather than always assuming it is dementia or a memory impairment," according to Weinberger.

"Depressive symptoms have effects on cognition that are not yet fully understood, so in part, this study will provide a better understanding about how mild to moderate depressive symptoms color how persons recall past experiences and how they think about ourselves," Ready said.

People worry about their memories at all ages, from as young as 20 years old to as old as 80 years old, and as individuals get older, a fading memory is quickly attributed to the aging process. This realization can then trigger depression which, in turn enhances memory-loss and cognitive inabilities and can then make the depression worse. By understanding the relationship between moods and cognition, advances may be made in the prevention and treatment of depression in all stages of adulthood.

"If we can help people from being panicky or despondent about their memory, it will be beneficial," said Professor Whitbourne.

This study is particularly important because it focuses on a population that may not meet the specified criterion for clinical depression. However, because mild to moderate depression affects approximately 8 to 15 percent of adults, studying this population will give researchers more information in order to learn and understand more about the connection between depression and cognitive abilities.

The results of the study may help people to understand the effects of depression at different stages in life. Emotion and cognition change dramatically during adult development and therefore it is likely that depression will affect cognition differently throughout a lifetime.

This study is also unique because it focuses on both younger and older adults. The results of this study will provide preliminary data into the effects of mood on memory processes across the lifespan, which has not received a great deal of focus in the literature up until this point, said Weinberger.

One benefit of this study will be to determine how mood, mostly depression, affects both an individual's memory and personal identity.

"Our thoughts and emotions are interconnected such that our moods can influence, for example, what kinds of information we attend to, how we process information and the types of events that we call," said Ready.

Participation involves a one to two-hour assessment, which involves testing of emotional experiences, cognitive abilities, how an individual responds to change and the feeling one has toward oneself. Adults 65 and older, and college-age students, experiencing mild to moderate depression, as well as people experiencing no depression, may be eligible to take part in the study which takes place in the Department of Psychology on the UMass Amherst campus.

Funding for the study is provided by a faculty grant from the UMass College of Social and Behavioral Sciences.

UMass student hit by truck, man placed under arrest

By Eric Athas and Matt Belliveau

A University of Massachusetts student was struck by a car yesterday afternoon, according the UMass police.

Olivia Simpson, a UMass freshman from Washington Heights, N.Y., was reportedly hit by a white truck while walking across Eastman lane near the Totman Gymnasium at approximately 5 p.m yesterday.

Simpson was transported by ambulance to Cooley Dickenson Hospital and was then transferred to Bay State Hospital, where she was listed in "fair" condition.

One unidentified man was handcuffed by UMass police and left the scene in a police cruiser.

Mikaela Newell, a UMass freshman from Medway, Mass., witnessed the accident.

"I was walking out of Totman and I heard a loud bang. That's what made me turn my head and see a girl lying on the ground with people running towards her," said Newell. "She looked like she was in pretty bad shape. I've never seen anything like that."

Witnesses said that the sun may have been a factor in the accident.

Simpson is the sixth person to be to be hit by a car on campus in the last two weeks, the fourth UMass student.

Three UMass students were hit by a car near Southwest Residential Area on Feb. 21.

Two contractors involved in the "information line" picketing at the construction site of the new residence halls next to Sylvan were reported to have been struck by motor vehicles Feb. 14, but neither of the contractors have filed any charges against the drivers.

The recent surge in pedestrian injuries comes during a semester-long pedestrian safety program designed by UMass officials to improve the attitudes and actions of pedestrians as well as drivers, to upgrade the physical landscape of campus roadways and to serve as a source of crucial data to be used in designing similar programs on campuses nationwide.

The program, called "Cross Safely, Drive Safely," was funded through a $75,000 grant from the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration. It is administered by UMass police, the Massachusetts Traffic Safety Research Program (Mass$AFE) and the department of civil and environmental engineering through the UMass Transportation Center.

Later in the semester, UMass police will concentrate on law enforcement for both drivers and pedestrians. In addition, the grant will fund efforts to draft new regulations for proper use of crosswalks and related issues such as the behavior of individuals who are under the influence of alcohol. UMass police say some pedestrian accidents are caused not by drunk drivers, but by individuals who are intoxicated and walk into traffic. Currently there are no statutes covering this behavior and a goal of the program is to begin to address the issue by drafting a regulation that can be presented to the Board of Trustees for approval.

A final part of the program is gathering data and a campus-wide review of roadways and engineering improvements, such as signs and bump-outs near crosswalks similar to those on University Drive. Researchers will also compile crash and citation data along with observations of driver and pedestrian behavior. The information will be used to develop pedestrian safety guidelines that can be used on other campuses in the state and nationwide.

Simpson's neighbors were shocked at the news of her injuries.

"It's really surprising," said Natalie Halloran, an UMass freshman who lives next to Simpson in the Dickenson dormitory. "This is the first I've heard of it."

Police study tape in student slaying

By Tom Hays
Associated Press

NEW YORK —Investigators seeking witnesses and suspects in the brutal slaying of a graduate honors student have been studying security videotape from the Manhattan neighborhood where she spent her last night out with friends, police said Tuesday.

One tape shows the victim, Imette St. Guillen, talking to a friend at about 3 a.m. Saturday outside Pioneer, a bar in the Bowery section. St. Guillen can be seen going back into the nightspot while the friend leaves by cab, police said.

Police officials said they had collected other video from security cameras in the area hoping they would offer more answers about St. Guillen's final hours. Investigators also were looking for clues at a Brooklyn diner where an anonymous 911 caller used a telephone to report that her body had been dumped on a desolate roadside.

Police discovered the body at about 8:30 p.m. Saturday in Brooklyn's East New York section. Someone had bound the 24-year-old victim's face, hands and feet with packaging tape before wrapping her in a flower-print bedspread; investigators believe she had been raped.

The bedspread — covered with pink, purple and red flowers and green leaves on a white background — was the type used by budget motels and hotels, police said. Detectives were canvassing local motels and hotels to see if anyone there had information on St. Guillen or her assailant.

In an unrelated case, police were investigating the death of an unidentified man whose body was found Tuesday in a plastic bag on an East Harlem street. Results of that autopsy were pending.

St. Guillen, who was from Boston, was scheduled to graduate this semester from John Jay College of Criminal Justice in Manhattan. She attended George Washington University as an undergraduate.

She was remembered by professors as an excellent student and who set an example for others.

"It's an ironic tragedy," said Joshua Freilich, her sociology professor at John Jay. "She had everything going for her."

"I remember that she was an outstanding student and that she was going to work in criminal justice," George Washington University Professor William Chambliss told the Daily News.

St. Guillen enrolled at John Jay in 2004, initially to pursue a master's degree in forensic psychology, and was on the dean's list for 2004-05. Last fall she changed her field of study to criminal justice, school officials said. She graduated magna cum laude from George Washington University.

Construction of new science building encounters conflict

By Hannah Lueng
Collegian Staff

Construction for an approximately 140,000-square-foot science and engineering building to facilitate Smith College's expanding engineering program will require the removal of four houses containing 26 college-owned apartments.

The demolition of these 26 Smith-owned units in the area of Belmont and Arnold avenues will be replaced with the construction of new apartments located at 36 Bedford Terrance, near downtown Northampton. Smith College sold its property at 36 Bedford Terrance to local developer, O'Connell Development Group of Holyoke.

The selection of O'Connell Development Group was approved by both the mayor of Northampton and Smith College. City, college and community members collaborated in establishing development criteria for the replacement housing. Affordability, especially with the increase of housing demand in the downtown Northampton area, was a key requirement.

Corey Eilhardt, freshman Architecture major at Smith College said, "There has been some buzz around campus about the conflicts between the township of Northampton and Smith College, but most people think that as long as the affordable housing is being replaced, then it's Ok."

The renovation of an existing apartment building will create 20 of the 26 units. The other six units will be located in a new building to be constructed in an adjacent parking lot.

Laurie Fenlason, Executive Director of Public Affairs at Smith College stated, "The apartments are primarily intended for Northampton residents, though it's possible, of course, that some tenants could also be Five College students."

The construction for the affordable apartments will begin in the summer of 2006 and will be ready for occupancy by spring 2007, before the construction of the engineering and science building.

Tenants in the affected buildings were notified of the college's expansion plans in January 2004. Efforts to alleviate the moving transition included the assistance of Smith College $2,500 in relocation assistance and the help of a local relocation expert was offered. Current residents will also have the opportunity to relocate to the new development while paying within five percent of their current rent rates for at least two years. Overall, Smith College has committed about $3.285 million to seeing the completion of affordable housing.

The O'Connell Development Group has its roots in O'Connell Companies, founded by Daniel O'Connell in 1879. O'Connell Development Group has been developing and managing development projects in Massachusetts for over 30 years. Past projects in Northampton include Michael's House, an elderly handicapped facility on State Street.

O'Connell Companies has been involved in the construction of Smith College Campus Center, Smith College Chase & Duckett House and Smith College Science Center. Around the five college area, O'Connell has also constructed for Amherst College and Mount Holyoke College.

Northampton is likely to see more changes over the next few years alongside the new science and engineering building, as Smith College is also seeking to increase housing in the West Street area.

Civil War looms in Baghdad

By Alexandra Zavis
Associated Press

A series of suicide attacks, car bombs and mortar barrages rocked Baghdad on Tuesday, killing at least 66 people and wounding scores as Iraq teetered on the brink of sectarian civil war. President Bush decried the violence and said Iraqis must choose between "chaos or unity."

Iraqis have suffered through days of reprisal killings and attacks on Sunni mosques since bombers blew apart the gold dome of the revered Shiite Askariya shrine in Samarra on Wednesday. The Iraqi Cabinet said at least 379 people had been killed and 458 wounded in reprisal attacks.

In the latest attacks, two explosions hit Shiite targets in northern Baghdad after sundown, killing at least 15 people and wounding 72.

Police officials said either a car bomb or a mortar hit the Abdel Hadi Chalabi mosque in the Hurriyah neighborhood, killing 23 people and wounding 55.

Mortar fire at the Shiite Imam Kadhim shrine in the Kazimiyah neighborhood on the opposite side of the Tigris River killed one and wounded 10.

A Sunni mosque in the Hurriyah neighborhood had been bombed before dawn Tuesday.

The Tuesday night attacks were clearly a continuation of sectarian violence that erupted in the country after a Shiite shrine was bombed in the predominantly Sunni city of Samarra on Wednesday.

Earlier, five bomb attacks rattled the capital, killing at least 41 and wounding scores.

In Washington, Bush sidestepped a question about whether the surge in sectarian violence would affect his administration's hopes to begin withdrawing U.S. troops.

"Obviously there are some who are trying to sow the seeds of sectarian violence," Bush said. "And now, the people of Iraq and their leaders must make a choice. The choice is chaos or unity, the choice is a free society, or a society dictated by evil people who would kill innocents."

Separately, Vice President Dick Cheney challenged administration critics during a speech at an American Legion convention.

"Here in Washington, if any believe Americans should suddenly withdraw from Iraq and stop fighting al-Qaida in the very place they have gathered, let them say so clearly," Cheney said. "If any believe that Americans should break our word and abandon our Iraqi allies, let them make it known."

President Bush speaks to the Asia Society Washington Center in Washington D.C. The president also called for an end to the violence in Pakistan.

Interior minister says Islamic Army in Iraq is holding Carroll

By Robert H. Reid
Associated Press

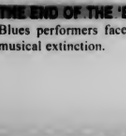
BAGHDAD, Iraq — American reporter Jill Carroll is being held by the Islamic Army in Iraq, the insurgent group that freed two French journalists in 2004 after four months in captivity, Iraq's Interior Minister said Tuesday.

Interior Minister Bayan Jabr, who is in charge of Iraq's police, also said he believed the 28-year-old freelance reporter for The Christian Science Monitor is still alive, although the deadline set by her captors for the U.S. to meet their demands expired Sunday.

Three videotapes provided by the kidnappers to Arab satellite television stations identified the group holding her as the previously unknown "Revenge Brigades." She was seized Jan. 7 in Baghdad and her translator was killed.

However, Jabr told Iraqi television that he believes Carroll is being held by the Islamic Army in Iraq, one of the country's principal insurgent groups.

Jabr said the same group was responsible for kidnapping his sister, who was seized about four days before Carroll and freed about two weeks later.



"The kidnapping of the American journalist, Jill Carroll, occurred about the same time as the abduction of my sister," he said. "I was equally keen to get both of them released. I recognized that the Islamic army was responsible for both plots."

Jabr said he sent a message to his sister's kidnappers and asked for help in winning Carroll's freedom. He said he also provided information on the case to the FBI.

The Islamic Army in Iraq has been involved in kidnappings before, including the Aug. 20, 2004 abduction of French journalists Christian Chesnot and Georges Malbrunot. They were freed the following December.

The group killed Italian journalist Enzo Baldoni, who also was abducted in 2004, and claimed it killed American contractor Ronald Schulz last December.

Woman arrested on assault and battery of police officer

Wednesday February 22

3:24 p.m.
Matlow D. Boivin, 20, of 16 Winter Street in Saugus, was arrested on charges of possession of a Class D drug. Prior to the arrest, a search warrant had been written and approved by the Hadley District Court, and was carried out in Brett Dorm, for the purpose of searching for narcotics. The normal team of an officer, detective and K-9 unit was present, and upon carrying out the warrant uncovered an amount of marijuana in the room and on one of the three individuals present in the room. The person in possession of marijuana, Boivin, was subsequently placed under arrest.

4:03 p.m.
Sara Wenona Richardsonlabonte, 29, of P.O. Box 175 in Williamsburg, was arrested for possession of a Class D drug. Police initially stopped Richardsonlabonte's vehicle on Campus Center Way for having a rejection sticker on her windshield. Upon approaching the vehicle, officers detected the odor of "recently-burned" marijuana, and upon further conversation the occupants of the vehicle admitted to possessing marijuana in the car. A K-9 unit was then requested. The K-9 unit, "Max," did not make any indication in the car, but marijuana was found to be located by "Max" in the pocket of Richardsonlabonte, who was then placed under arrest.

Thursday February 23

1:25 a.m.
Jacqueline Hall, 18, of 11 Jericho Lane in Scituate, was arrested on charges of assault and battery on a police officer. Officers in Cashin Hall were conducting a dormitory check in the building, when they noticed an unknown female exit the elevator and step into the lobby. One of the officers noticed her step up behind him and slap him on the buttocks harshly. The female was identified as Hall, who was observed to be under the influence, and subsequently arrested her.

Friday February 24

1:54 p.m.
Follow-up investigation in DuBois Library on a report of a patron of the building reviewing pornography on a University library computer. Police completed the investigation, but no suspect was made. The incident could be various violations, but is not a concern of the UMass Police at the time, because it is a non-criminal offense.

Saturday February 25

12:50 a.m.
William W. Bonnet, 18, of 75 Oak Street in Dalton, was arrested for possession of a Class D drug. After a report was made of an odor of marijuana coming from Bonnet's room in Dickinson Hall, an officer stood by the door of the room and would not let anyone in or out of the room, effectively securing the room, while a search warrant was obtained. Marijuana was then found in the room. "Max" also picked up on the odor. Several items were also confiscated from the room, including a small glass jar with residue, purple glass pipe with residue, marijuana grinder, small amount of residue believed to have been in a pipe, prescription bottle with residue, burnt roaches and a stem, and a green glass pipe with residue.

Monday February 27

3:04 p.m.
Timothy J. Henderson, 19, of 305 Birchback Road in Hanson, was arrested on charges of possession of a Class D drug with intent to distribute, possession of a Class D drug, and possession of a Class E drug. The arrest was based on an ongoing investigation. Police carried out a search warrant on Henderson's room in Baker dormitory using an officer, detective and K-9 unit. Police confiscated marijuana in plastic bags estimated at $100 in value, 10 pills of the drug Oxybutynin and $150 in cash. Henderson was bailed for a court appearance yesterday.

Supreme Court backs abortion protesters

By Toni Locy
Associated Press

The Supreme Court dealt a setback Tuesday to abortion clinics in a two-decade-old legal fight over anti-abortion protests, ruling that federal extortion and racketeering laws cannot be used to ban demonstrations.

The 8-0 decision ends a case that the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals had kept alive despite a 2003 ruling by the high court that lifted a nationwide injunction on anti-abortion groups led by Joseph Scheidler and others.

Anti-abortion groups brought the appeal after the appellate court sought to determine whether the injunction could be supported by charges that protesters had made threats of violence.

In Tuesday's ruling, Justice Stephen Breyer said Congress did not intend to create "a freestanding physical violence offense" in the federal extortion law known as the Hobbs Act.

Instead, Breyer wrote, Congress chose to address violence outside abortion clinics in 1994 by passing the Freedom of Access to Clinic Entrances Act, which set parameters for such protests.

Social activists and the AFL-CIO had sided with abortion demonstrators in arguing that lawsuits and injunctions based on the federal extortion law could be used to thwart their efforts to change public policy or agitate for better wages and working conditions.

The legal battle began in 1986, when the National Organization for Women filed a class-action suit challenging tactics used by the Pro-Life Action Network to block women from entering abortion clinics.

NOW's legal strategy was novel at the time, relying on civil provisions of the 1970 Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, which was used predominantly in criminal cases against organized crime. The lawsuit also relied on the Hobbs Act, a 55-year-old law banning extortion.

A federal judge issued a nationwide injunction against the anti-abortion protesters after a Chicago jury found in 1998 that demonstrators had engaged in a pattern of racketeering by interfering with clinic operations, menacing doctors, assaulting patients and damaging clinic property.

But the Supreme Court voided the injunction in 2003, ruling that the extortion law could not be used against the protesters because they had not illegally "obtained property" from women seeking to enter clinics to receive abortions.

Supreme Court Justice Stephen Breyer said yesterday that Congress did not intend to support the 'Hobbs Act.'

'Myspace' spurns film career

Amateur filmmaker David Lehre first screened his short film "MySpace: The Movie" about a month ago at his 21st birthday party.

Since then, the spoof of the popular networking site has been viewed more than 6 million times through various online sites and has prompted a development deal offer from MTVU, contact from Hollywood managers and a complimentary e-mail from MySpace co-founder Tom Anderson.

"I've never had stuff go as fast as it is now," Lehre, who still lives at home with his parents in Washington, Mich., told the Los Angeles Times.

Lehre started making films with the same cast and crew in 10th grade, after he and his friends where denied parts in the high school theater production of "Little Women."

"I thought, 'Let's make a movie.' They're like, 'Do you know how to make a movie?' I was like, 'I don't know. I'll figure it out.'" Lehre said. "I was sick of other people deciding if I could entertain or not. I thought, if they won't give me a chance, then I'll make my own movie."

Lehre's 11-minute short parodies the habits of the popular social networking site. It is told in five scenes, beginning with an underwear-clad teen who vainly takes pictures of himself in the bathroom until his mother barges in. Another scene features a showdown between a boy and his girlfriend who demands his password to view incriminating photos on his page. The final scene shows a partygoer — an actor portraying MySpace's Anderson — vomiting while his friends capture it on camera.

The film was written by Lehre and his best friend, Jeremy Kerr, and the skits were improvised by them and their friends. It took Lehre two months to film, edit and score the movie.

Lehre said he and his friends have 50 films to their credit and receive the support of local businesses, including a theater that screens their latest projects.

"MySpace: The Movie" was posted Jan. 28 to Lehre's personal Web site, DavidLehre.com, and three days later it was placed on YouTube.com by a user named "eggdea," who downloaded it from Lehre's site and uploaded it to the popular video sharing site.

About 20,000 videos are uploaded to YouTube each day and more than 15 million are watched. With 3.4 million viewings, "MySpace: The Movie" ranks as the site's most viewed video.

The film also has been on rotation on Current TV, a new network aimed at the 18-to-34-year-old audience that reaches 20 million U.S. homes.

Lehre was recently offered a development deal by MTVU, which is MTV's on-air, online and on-campus network.

"The whole point here is to incubate and develop (Lehre's) talent even further as we showcase it," said MTVU's head of programming, Ross Martin.

Patriot Act renewal sent to White House

By Laurie Kellman
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Months overdue in a midterm election year, the USA Patriot Act renewal cleared a final hurdle in the Senate Tuesday on its way to President Bush's desk. But the bill's sponsor said he is unsatisfied with the measure's privacy protections and far from done tinkering with the centerpiece of Bush's war on terrorism.

"The issue is not concluded," said Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa. He said he plans more legislation and hearings on restoring House-rejected curbs on government power.

The Senate voted 69-30 Tuesday — 60 votes were needed — to limit debate and bring the bill to a final vote that could occur as early as Wednesday. The House then would vote and send the legislation to the White House. Sixteen major provisions would expire March 10 if President Bush doesn't sign the bill by then.

First passed in the weeks after the 2001 terrorist attacks, the law has been extended twice for lack of congressional accord over the balance between civil liberties protections and law enforcement tools in terrorism investigations.

Several Democrats voted "no" on the test vote Tuesday to protest the GOP majority's refusal to allow amendments, but said they would vote for the bill on final passage. These lawmakers included Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., and Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., the Judiciary Committee's senior Democrat.

Others still plan to vote against the bill as a whole, but they stand little chance of blocking it. Led by Sens. Russell Feingold, D-Wis. and Robert C. Byrd, D-W.Va., they contend that the months of haggling produced few meaningful curbs on government power.

Specter agreed on that point. Even as he urged his colleagues to vote this week for the bill, he introduced a separate bill to make the government satisfy a higher threshold for warrantless wiretaps and to set a four-year expiration date for the use of National Security Letters in terrorism investigations.

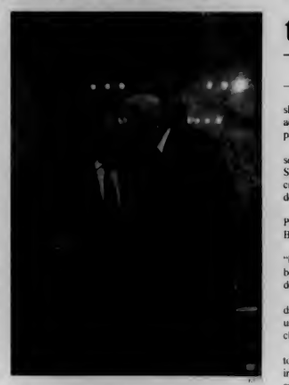
However appetizing to Specter's colleagues in the Senate, the new bill represents items House Republicans flatly rejected during talks last year.

House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., has insisted that once the House approves the renewal and sends it to Bush, his chamber is done with the issue for the year.

That will be none too soon for some lawmakers. The standoff pushed renewing the law into this mid-term election year. Senate leaders were forced to find a procedural way of getting the bill to a vote without losing the support of Sensenbrenner, the Bush administration and libertarian-leaning lawmakers — all before March 10.

The solution is a convoluted procedural dance that illustrates the razor-thin zone of agreement when it comes to Bush's terror-fighting law.

Congress will extend the Patriot Act by passing two pieces of legislation. The first is the same accord passed last year by the House and filibustered in the Senate by members who said it contained too few privacy protections. The second is, in effect, an amendment to the first that adds enough privacy protections to win over those same libertarian-leaning Republicans.



Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist is permitting no other amendments, allowing the measure to slide through both houses without extended debate.

Feingold, who has opposed the act since his lone "no" vote against the 2001 law, complained that the lack of amendments had turned the Senate into an arm of the Bush administration.

"No one has the right to turn this body into a rubber stamp," he said just before Tuesday's vote. "The White House played hardball and the decision was made by some to capitulate."

Sen. Jim Bunning, R-Ky. countered that the war on terrorism couldn't wait for more debate.

"Civil liberties do not mean much when you are dead," Bunning told the Senate.

New patch to treat depression

By Andrew Bridges
Associated Press

Federal regulators approved the first [illegible] skin patch on Tuesday, providing a different [illegible] administer a drug already used by Parkinson's [illegible] patients.

The Food and Drug Administration approved selegiline transdermal patch, agency spokeswoman Susan Cruzan said. The drug belongs to a class of medicines that is rarely a first or even second choice to treat depression.

It will be marketed as Emsam, said [illegible] Pharmaceuticals Inc., which developed the drug with Bristol-Myers Squib Co., which will market it.

The FDA will require the drug to bear a "black-box" warning of the risks of suicidal [illegible] behaviors in children and adolescents treated with depressants. The drug is meant for use only by adults.

The drug's label also will carry a long list of drinks and other drugs that patients must avoid using the Emsam patch. The warnings are typical for a class of drugs to which it belongs.

Selegiline, approved in pill form by the FDA to help treat Parkinson's disease, is a monoamine oxidase inhibitor, or MAOI. Typically, doctors prescribe it only if patients don't respond to other antidepressants, including selective serotonin reuptake inhibitors like Prozac, Zoloft and Paxil.

Although health officials say MAOIs are safe when used correctly, the drugs can cause dangerous reactions, including sudden and severe rises in blood pressure that can lead to a stroke, when patients eat certain food or drinks that contain a substance called tyramine — found in draft beer, red wine, fava beans, aged cheeses, soy sauce and other products.

High school standards discussed

MALDEN — State education officials Tuesday discussed new standards for high school coursework that could create more consistency across school districts and better prepare students for college.

The state Board of Education at its monthly meeting Tuesday began what will be a two-year study to explore establishing guidelines that would reflect the admissions requirements for state colleges.

The $2 million review, funded by a grant from the Republican Governor's Association, aims to find ways to ready more students for college and improve graduation rates.

"I'm alarmed by the fact that we're not preparing our kids for the world that they are facing," state education Commissioner David P. Driscoll told The Boston Globe. "We're coddling our kids now way too much, and they're the ones that are going to suffer the consequences."

The Board took no formal action at its meeting Tuesday, according to state Education Department spokeswoman Melanie Winklosky. The next step in the process is to establish a committee to examine uniform standards.

Guidelines could set uniform expectations in a state obsessed only with getting high school students to pass the math and English portions of the Massachusetts Comprehensive Assessment System exam, a graduation requirement, Driscoll said.

A statewide survey has found that requirements vary widely across the state and are not always in line with the requirements of the University of Massachusetts system.

Ninety-eight percent of schools required four years of English, but one-quarter required two years of math or less in 2001, the most recent year for which data are available.

Two-thirds of schools required at least three years of science, while just over a third required a foreign language.

The University of Massachusetts system, however, requires four years of English, three years of math, three years of science and two years each of history and a foreign language for admission.

Driscoll said he would form a committee to draft the guidelines, which he would like to see match if not exceed the UMass standards. The new guidelines would be implemented over the next two years he said.

In public school systems with high rates of college admission, most students are already meeting the requirements.

"I would say 90 percent or better are already taking that," said Thomas Hughart, director of guidance at Wellesley High School.

Court wowed by Playboy case

By Gina Holland
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court appeared ready Tuesday to bless Playboy Playmate Anna Nicole Smith's pursuit of a piece of her late husband's oil fortune.

The court wadded into an 11-year family feud over the estate of J. Howard Marshall II, who died at age 90 after a brief marriage to Smith. The case is dominated by themes of sex, greed and deception.

"It's quite a story," Justice Stephen Breyer marveled.

Marshall's youngest son, E. Pierce Marshall, claims that he is the sole heir and that Smith's legal fight is dead, because she lost in a Texas probate court.

Justices appeared unwilling to buy that.

Smith, a former stripper known for her flashy, cleavage-revealing outfits, watched from near the back of the court, dressed in black. Her lawyers said she was in tears during part of the argument when justices discussed her late husband.

Justices treaded delicately on the subject matter.

Chief Justice John Roberts said the case involved "a substantial amount of assets," referring to the fortune of Smith's husband of 14 months. The estate was estimated at as much as $1.6 billion.

The court's other new member, Samuel Alito, remained silent, as did Justice Clarence Thomas.

Otherwise, however, it was a lively debate that included many references to Smith and her plight, although justices referred to her by her given name, Vickie Lynn.

Breyer said there was evidence that the will was forged and that the son hired private detectives to [illegible] away from her elderly husband's bed. She was a 26-year-old dancer, divorced with a son, and Marshall were married. The husband's nurses testified that she bared her breasts to the [illegible] as part of her effort to get [illegible] tance.

In addition, she contended [illegible] promised her half his estate.

Temporary solutions won't work

Sanam Hakim

We are a country full of people who love Band-Aids. It's true. If our children are bleeding, we give them Band-Aids. I will be the first to admit that I pretty much carry an entire first aid kit in my purse, at all times, complete with Band-Aids ranging from extra small to extra large. On top of that, I have done this since I was a little girl. If someone got cut, I had an appropriate sized Band-Aid out and ready to stick before the blood even began to drip out of the wound. However, anyone who has ever watched a wound heal knows that the function of the Band-Aid is only to stop the bleeding, not heal the wound.

This same concept of putting a Band-Aid over a wound is pretty much what our society has adopted as the logic behind solving major world issues. We've put Band-Aids on every thing. If there's poverty, put a Band-Aid on it. If disease is spreading, put a Band-Aid on it, but at the end of the day, temporary solutions will only prove to be temporary solutions.

The issue of poverty is a rapidly growing one in this society. Middle class is slowly shrinking, while the gap between wealth and poverty grows larger and larger. I think it's fair to say that most of us have given money or clothes to a charity of some sort, volunteered at a food shelter or, if we were feeling extra generous, tossed our leftover money into the cup of a man living on the side of the street, but at the end of the day, what have we really done?

We've gotten so caught up in our man-eat-man society that the idea of just loving other people not only sounds like a marijuana-induced saying, it sounds loony and lame, but if we all took the time to think of others as much as we think about our own personal gains and desires, we would see a drastic change in the foundation of this society, including leadership positions.

We bought a man a dinner. We bought a kid some vitamins. We bought an old woman a hat. While these actions are a genuine effort to help, they are only temporary solutions to a much larger issue. They are essentially as effective as Band-Aids placed on severed limbs. Some of the bleeding will stop, but the limbs are still broken at the end of the day.

The only way the problem will be solved is at the root of the problem, through education and love. When I say love, I am not talking about excessive hugging, gentle kisses and cooing. The definition of love that I am using is the ability of human beings to sacrifice for other human beings. We've gotten so caught up in our man-eat-man society that the idea of just loving other people not only sounds like a marijuana-induced saying, it sounds loony and lame, but if we all took the time to think of others as much as we think about our own personal gains and desires, we would see a drastic change in the foundation of this society, including leadership positions.

As far as education goes, I believe the old Chinese proverb says, "Give a man a fish and you feed him for a day. Teach a man to fish and you feed him for a lifetime." This is undeniable. What we are doing to handle the issue of poverty is handing out fish to the poor, without offering them the help and support that they need to learn how to fish, to become educated and to learn how to become self-sufficient. Without that, all we'll have in the end is a lot of hungry people splitting a very insignificant amount of fish.

The spread of diseases is another rapidly growing issue in this country, particularly sexually transmitted diseases. The sad part about these diseases is that we know exactly how to stop them (or at least significantly decrease the numbers). We just don't want to, because that would involve a huge culture change that just isn't as much fun. We've made it acceptable for college students to have sex with anyone, anywhere, any number of times, and we've made it a part of our totally awesome college experience to do so. We even made fun names for it, like "casual sex" or "drunken hookup." We cry about the spread of disease, then continue to become brainwashed by the media by thinking sex ain't nothin' but a candy shop, do it more and do it often.

So, looking at this from a logical point of view, we have a problem in this country, which spreads sexually, and we all know it spreads sexually. Instead of accepting the fact that we are addicted to the idea of open and frequent sexuality and accepting it as the root of the problem of sexually transmitted diseases in our society, we have made it the norm instead.

We sing about it on the radio, encourage our friends to have more sex with more people, and sometimes, we wake up next to people we don't know – but that's OK. Solution? Contraception.

Condoms and birth control are extremely accessible on this campus. As a Resident Assistant, I was given a bucket of condoms to keep in my room and make available to my residents for free, 24/7. However, while contraception may be an effective way to decrease the spread of disease, it can never solve the problem because the problem is rooted in our culture.

On top of that, people forget to use contraception all the time, or it fails. We're trying to solve the problem of spreading disease with small pieces of rubber instead of attempting to make the necessary culture changes by taking that first step and saying, "Maybe I should have asked you your name first." We're, once again, using a Band-Aid on a large wound.

These are just two examples among several, and if I could make my column any longer, I would go on for hours. I think it's time that we realize most of the issues in the world can only be solved with major culture changes, which take sacrifice, love and patience to cure.

I'm not saying we should dismantle all our temporary solutions and start from scratch. I'm saying we should understand that, at the end of the day, Band-Aids don't heal wounds. Maybe it's time we start viewing our world's problems at the root instead of the surface. I think as far as the surface goes, we're doing OK.

A swipe and a smile to go

Chris Reardon

It's time to give credit to one of the most unheralded groups of UMass employees on campus. Anyone who has ever eaten at a Dining Commons knows to whom I'm referring: the swiper. Part greeter and part bouncer, the DC swipers have, at first glance, perhaps the most mundane job on campus. After all, they sit for hours repeating the same task – swiping hundreds of students' UCards and allowing them into the DC – over and over again.

If you normally eat at Berkshire (or Hampden, while Berkshire undergoes renovations for the semester), then you might not even think of it as a bad job. That's because you've had the pleasure of being swiped by the greatest DC swiper of our time. Indeed, the sweetest dish in Southwest-South is not the chocolate torte; it's Yen, and no set of rotting teeth will convince me of the contrary.

Sure, you Northeast residents can boast that Worcester is the most glamorous eatery on campus, and maybe Hampshire does have the best pizza your meal plan can buy. No student will ever say that the food at Berkshire is great – nor indeed at Hampden – but you won't catch me at any other DC unless I absolutely have to go to one.

Besides the fact that I'm too lazy to walk to any other DC, being swiped by Yen makes all the mysterious smells and sub-par food completely worthwhile. I'm not the only one that thinks so, either, as evidenced by the Facebook group, "Yen Is The Reason I Eat At Berkshire."

The group is currently 11 members strong, but I expect that number to increase in the coming months, especially as students realize that the fact that Yen is working in Hampden is about the only thing the make-shift Dining Commons has going for it.

Rebecca Gray, a junior and card carrying member of the Facebook group, told me that one of the reasons she likes Yen so much is that "she pays attention to groups of friends and who eats together, and when one person's missing she'll always ask where they are."

Jason Poulin, a junior with a thing for candy hearts, said that after Valentine's Day, Yen saved a cup of the hearts just for him when she saw that the DC was running low. That kind of dedication is hard to come by, but it's just one aspect of Yen's personality that makes her so lovable.

Besides the fact that I'm too lazy to walk to any other DC, being swiped by Yen makes all the mysterious smells and sub-par food completely worthwhile. I'm not the only one that thinks so either, as evidenced by the Facebook group "Yen Is The Reason I Eat At Berkshire."

There's something about her smile that's just infectious, says sophomore George Papadopoulos: "Her cheery attitude sheds light upon my otherwise gloomy New England days."

You might be having the worst day of your life, and Hampden might be serving questionable shepherd's pie and stale French fries, but somehow it's OK when Yen is on duty.

Some people in her position would be miserable, and therefore negatively affect your dining experience. Not Yen. Not in five plus semesters have I seen one of the reasons she likes Yen so much is that "she pays attention to groups of friends and who eats together, and when one person's missing she'll always ask where they are."

The first meal back from break is always a treat because it means I get to chat with Yen about how our time away from each other was. No matter how boring and long that time seemed to me, somehow I can't wait to talk to her about it. Actually, I'll be frank; for the most part I can't wait to talk to Yen about anything, anytime. In fact, if we ever meet in a bar, Yen, the drinks are on me.

My point here isn't just to gush over how great my swiper is (though she is pretty great, isn't she?). My point is that there are whole groups of people in our lives that we tend to take for granted, and it's time for us to give some recognition to them.

When was the last time you said "thank you" to the maintenance staff in your dorm? Have you ever considered how much hard work being an RA is, instead of just vilifying them because they have the power to write you up? Or did you ever think of doing something nice for the TA that helped you with your homework three times last week?

The very least you can do is not overlook these people because somehow you think you're better than them. Face it: you're not, and if it weren't for them your life would be a lot tougher than it is now.

Insight is so very essential

Michael Toomey

Watch out for your shirt. The section of the paper you've just opened to is dripping with cynicism. I warn you that it doesn't wash out, so keep it away from your clothes, but more importantly, guard your mind with the utmost vigilance, because if this caustic skepticism deeply stains your thinking, I can guarantee long-term woe and regret.

The Editorial Department allows its writers to enjoy the unimaginable privilege of talking trash and getting some level of recognition for it, as opposed to an uppercut or drink to the face. I'd imagine that considering this, everyone with a pen or Microsoft Word would write opinion pieces, and the mailbags of any journalistic establishment would be bursting with sarcastic submissions.

Without contention, it is one of the most generally accessible divisions of most publications, but yet each paper usually has a relatively small number of regular contributors. It would be easy to assume a lot about these people.

For instance, they always have something to say about how something most of us are doing is dreadfully wrong. So we could assume they're in the minority, which could easily be translated into isolation. So they're alone.

Logically connected to isolation is egocentrism, as it seems most editorialists presume their views on an issue to be more logical and more sensible than usual, which may or may not be true, but the egotism is still there.

A dichotomy also exists, contrasting the isolation with a sense of social obligation, which goes to say that most editorials follow magnanimous current affairs, usually controversial policy changes or perhaps another executive branch faux pas. This could show that these people have hope. Hope that by being topically common someone might care about what they have to say. They haven't yet given up. What's curiously omitted from the assumed self-perceptions of the editorialist if s/he actually has anything unique to offer readers?

Personally, I find there are good editorials, and there are almost unreadable editorials; I've rarely encountered one that doesn't fall into either of these categories. The divergence is quite extreme because there are basically two types of printed opinion, where one is unconventional and fresh, the other is in its essence vomit (something else coming from inside of you).

I'd imagine it's not too hard to put a finger on which type I consider to be good and which I flush. I like this guy who writes for Esquire, whose articles are the saving grace of a very pompous and pretentious magazine. Chuck Klosterman tends to write exceedingly wry observational pieces using a very informal, unorthodox format, usually opening your eyes to something you'd never think to look twice at, but the best part of what he does is providing one-of-a-kind insights that can't be taught nor faked. Insight, in my estimation, is central to writing something interesting. Insight is also a rare quality, which I find peculiarly absent in most Ed/Op columns.

The most common type of piece I'll notice in what should be a very thought provoking section, has the most blasé, unimaginative writing, but worse, contains ideas so pointlessly banal I imagine the writer to have a dangerously low pulse rate. These tend to be the articles that mimic the recent political dilemma covered on the front page, only with boring sprinkles of neutrality.

Usually we get fed all the facts, stats, names and places, but instead of merely reporting, which was already done to better effect by a legitimate journalist, the writer suggests the complication of the situation. For example, maybe a hypocritical split in public opinion.

OK, that's great. So what might be behind the split? No answer, because this guy or girl is too busy relaying us more information about how twisted and maze-like something is. Instead of using the kind of presumption that's important to writing opinion, where you figure your readers will take your word for something, boring editorialists who keep feeding us what, when, how and why are much tastier. I'm not alone in being able to pickup on the precariousness of a situation, but maybe we're actually in the minority.

The most common type of piece I'll notice in what should be a very thought provoking section, has the most blasé, unimaginative writing, but worse, contains ideas so pointlessly banal I imagine the writer to have a dangerously low pulse rate.

There's a good possibility that the majority of readers can't understand that most of the world news is a multivariable equation, and the editorial provides for them what amounts to the study guide of a textbook. Should it be an ancillary device to supplement basic understanding of the big news?

I like to look to the Ed/Op columns for an escape from the mundane nature of newspaper, a place where my interest can be piqued or even broadened. As I mentioned earlier, I like insights to take me somewhere new, but there is a strong likelihood that most folks haven't yet arrived, and what I perceive to be stagnant editorials may actually help them get to a new place.

The whole thing might be reduced to "different strokes for different folks" but the sheer amount of mediocrity in Ed/Op suggests to me that it's perhaps more than that. It wouldn't come as a surprise if a study of editorial journalists, both professional and novice, revealed the assumptions way up top to be pretty accurate. There's nothing wrong with that, it's just a dull affair when the hope for acceptance amounts to articles that really don't say anything at all.

It's almost as if the old mask of acceptable outrage is donned to get someone to pay attention but not run away in terror. It's been seen way too many times to even bat an eye when it makes another appearance, but I might be the only one who has grown sick of it.

An Argentinian ferry ride

World Perspectives
Asif Khan

Before I came down to Argentina, a lot of people warned me to be careful and to watch out. I always hear that before I go to a new place, so I am pretty much immune to it. I heard it when I was going to Turkey, Lebanon, even when I go back home to Pakistan.

I can honestly say that my two months in Buenos Aires, Argentina have been very safe without any bad incidents. I lost my camera here, which I was pretty upset about, but that was all my fault, and no one else is to blame. There are some areas in this city which are not as safe as others, and should be avoided by tourists in the night, but what city does not have areas like that?

My past two months here have been amazing. The city is beautiful, the people are full of life and there is so much to do and see. Since it is Carnaval weekend here in South America, some friends and I tried to plan a trip to Brazil, but since the whole world is trying to do the same thing it was impossible to find transportation and accomadation.

So we settled for Montevideo, Uruguay, another hot spot for Carnaval festivities, but slightly more low key than Rio de Janeiro. We got ferry tickets for 9 a.m. and made the mistake of going out the night before, which made it quite hard to get up at 7 a.m., but Buenos Aires night life goes on well past 7 a.m. so we didn't really get much sleep, and we made it to the station just in time. It would have been better if we did not, because little did we know we were about to start the scariest ferry ride of our lives.

It started out fine. The ferry was pretty big and luxurious and it was packed with a lot of people, a lot of them young and going to Montevideo for Carnaval like us. It had been raining a lot all morning and the previous night, and the water was a little choppy, but nothing serious.

An hour later it got a little scarce, and the ferry started to sway a bit, but still nothing too serious. We were having some breakfast around 10:30 when things got bad, and a big wave made the ferry rock so hard that chairs and tables started to slide. You could hear cups and plates falling to the floor.

From then on, the ferry kept getting rocked side to side by the waves and was tilting at all sorts of angles while the people watched helplessly. We were in a big lounge-like room with big windows and a lot of couches and tables. An hour later, it became so bad that people started to fall off their chairs and thus began to lay on the floor instead, us included.

The climax happened when a big, glass door shattered into a million pieces, and the windows of the duty free store downstairs followed. Video games had fallen on each other creating a domino effect, and shelves filled with bottles and boxes started to come down.

Corny as it may sound, it was a lot like being in "Titanic." Especially when a group of Brazilians started to play the guitar and sing, much like the three men in "Titanic" who were playing violin as the ship was about to sink. We were only half an hour away from Colonia (the Uruguayan port) when an announcement came on saying that the port was closed and we would have to wait a while for it to open.

Corny as it may sound, it was a lot like being in "Titanic." Especially when a group of Brazilians started to play the guitar and sing, much like the three men in "Titanic" who were playing violin as the ship was about to sink.

The engines switched off and the ferry continued to swing side to side at the mercy of the waves. After an hour and a half of waiting with life jackets on, we were informed that the port would be closed the whole day and we will be heading back to Buenos Aires. A couple hours later, at 9 p.m., we were back to where we had started.

After spending 12 hours on a ferry, and being rocked from side to side for the majority of it, we headed home and later treated ourselves to a decadent dinner. According to my friend Lani, who was with me on this ride, her mother always says that such experiences build character if nothing else.

We surely built a lot of character, even though I would have preferred being in Montevideo for Carnaval, but hey, life is full of experiences, and not all of them can be good. If they were, then you would never appreciate them as much.

Fight the culture of terror

Andrew Freeman

In dark moments, I imagine being blown up in a terrorist attack, or watching one happen before me. Such thoughts are, of course, deeply irrational, as the Pioneer Valley is not a major terrorist target, and the likelihood of any such attack is basically nonexistent. After the horror of Sep. 11, I expected more attacks.

Sometimes I still check the news, thinking that I'll learn the Golden Gate Bridge has been bombed or Paris Hilton has been abducted by terrorists, but the Islamic terrorist front seems largely focused on the countries of Afghanistan and Iraq.

From a superficial perspective, our country does not appear much altered from its state on Sep. 10, 2001, from the unequal economy to the intense partisanship to the culture of self-indulgence, but beyond the surface of appearances, we have changed.

We are made sensitive to the threat of danger, whether it is at an airport or on a bus, by announcements warning us to be vigilant and to report "suspicious behavior." We acknowledge claims that would at any other time sound ridiculous – that duct tape will protect us from a chemical attack, for example. We feel vulnerable.

There is a culture of terror at the heart of our society that informs our thoughts and molds our behavior. We see it in political rhetoric that paints party rivals as cowards, colluding with the enemy. We see it in our increasing competitiveness, where cheating is rife in schools and business and "reality television" encourages us to betray our coworkers. We trample each other out of fear that we will end up in poverty and degradation, and we fear those who have fallen to those depths and refuse to aid them.

At the level of national politics, fear is an omnipresent force. Any election is going to center on "national security," and which party or person can best paint the other as weak, inept or traitorous. Fear has been cultivated by the present administration to defeat political enemies and ensure popular support.

The very name of the conflict we are in is revealing. It is called the War on Terrorism, as if one can wage war on a tactic, and its rhetoric is based in large part on fear. Fear of a nuclear Iraq — and not some benevolent vision of democratization — dominated by the drive to war and fears of appeasement or appearing weak are used to keep our forces there. Moreover, from "Shock and Awe" to "Dead or Alive" to Abu Ghraib and Guantanamo Bay, terror is as much a part of our arsenal as it is of Al Qaida's. Fear threatens to engulf our society, and we absorb it willingly.

Fear is so effective at mobilizing people that it is interwoven into our economy. Fear of social rejection motivates us to purchase unnecessary products. Fear of obesity drives us to spend billions on weight reduction. By playing to popular fears, advertisers, as much as politicians, manipulate us.

The recent fervor over port security is an excellent illustration of the culture of terror. An Arab company – Dubai Ports World, of the United Arab Emirates – is in the process of buying six major American ports, and this has created fears that the company will be lax with security.

Congressional Democrats and Republicans have both criticized the deal, saying we should not hand over an industry crucial to national security without further review.

Like so many other scares, this is likely unfounded. Any foul play by Dubai Ports would probably force the government to take control of the ports, which would cost the company the $6.85 billion it is paying to buy out the current owners. Nothing about the current operation of the ports is slated to change – security would still be handled by the Coast Guard and Customs, and the workforce would remain American.

All that would change is the ownership of the ports. The overreaction to the port deal is unreasonable and unfair, but in the context of the president's own terror campaigns it is completely understandable.

Fear is so effective at mobilizing people that it is interwoven into our economy. Fear of social rejection motivates us to purchase unnecessary products. Fear of obesity drives us to spend billions on weight reduction. By playing to popular fears, advertisers, as much as politicians, manipulate us.

The alternative to terror that is most prolific is escapism. Life appears frightening, so we drown ourselves in the stories of other people, whether in the fantasy world of film or the fantasy world of celebrity.

We flee our lives through addictive substances, but escapism, whether through drugs or media, does nothing to confront our fears.

The real alternative to terror is reason. By thinking critically rather than reacting emotionally, you can avoid being manipulated by fear-mongers. There are real dangers in this world, but we must confront them with both resolution and clear thinking, not through the blinders of passion and ideology.

Our culture of terror is not winning the War on Terrorism, and it is not making us better citizens. Until we learn to face and reason with our fears, we will continue to be manipulated, and we will continue to suffer.

Six pedestrians have been hit by vehicles in Amherst over the last two weeks.
How safe do you feel crossing the street?

A Very, I step in front of moving vehicles all the time.

B Mildly, I always use a crosswalk.

C Not at all, I never cross the street without hitting the button or with out making sure it is completely clear.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

PROFESSOR FALSELY ACCUSED

Facts matter, and Mike Sances' column about the 2002 incident involving the FBI can be seen in a very different light when the actual facts are discussed.

Then (as now), Amherst town politics made the SGA look civil by comparison. There was some sort of dispute involving the public access cable station, and in the course of this, someone told the FBI that the man then running the station was telling everyone else that he was a terrorist.

Well, the FBI kind of had to go check this out as much as the fire department has to show up when you pull the fire alarm. The fire department doesn't honestly expect to find a fire anymore than the FBI actually expected to find a terrorist, but they still have to go.

It is like when a woman is shrieking in a parking lot after midnight. Even if it is likely because her boyfriend just dropped a handful of snow down her back, the cops still have to check it out, and that is essentially what happened here. When the police are told that a crime is about to be committed, what else exactly do we expect them to do but to go check it out?

What is being missed in all of this is that the real criminal is the town political wannabe who started all of this with the false allegation. The racial aspect of this lies not in the investigation, but in the false allegation. Had the professor been from Dublin rather than Baghdad, he might well have instead been falsely accused of harboring Whitey Bulger.

Martha Stewart went to jail for lying to federal investigators, and it truly is a pity that the person who made the false allegation couldn't have shared a similar fate. Justice would have been served, but when the FBI is told that a specific individual is telling everyone that he is a terrorist, intent on murder and mayhem, they aren't supposed to go check it out anyway?

Likewise, when a woman dials 9-1-1 and tells the cops her boyfriend is intent on killing her, they aren't supposed to go check that out, even if the dispatcher really doesn't believe her?

Facts matter, and while the UMPD makes no pretense of always observing the Massachusetts Constitution, they really did nothing wrong here.

SHOW SOME COMPASSION, CONSIDER MEDICAL MARIJUANA

As a Massachusetts resident and medical professional, I am appalled at the fact that some of our state legislators still refuse to consider the bill that would protect seriously ill people, who use medical marijuana with a doctor's recommendation, from the threat of prosecution.

As our current law stands, any and all marijuana users are subject to criminal penalties, even those seriously ill individuals who have been advised by their doctors to use marijuana. Medical professionals worldwide continue to recommend marijuana to patients who suffer from a variety of conditions, including muscle spasticity and neuropathic pain associated with multiple sclerosis (MS), and severe nausea and wasting due to chemotherapy treatment. If these seriously ill individuals can be prescribed morphine, OxyContin and other powerful, highly addictive narcotics by their doctors, why not allow them to use relatively safe, all-natural marijuana?

According to the Drug Policy Forum, over 1,300 doctors in Massachusetts have signed a pledge supporting medical marijuana. In all, in seven Massachusetts districts, where medical marijuana has appeared on the ballot, voters have consistently been in favor of the measure by an average of 69 percent.

Despite overwhelming support from the community, many legislators still oppose the bill. They continue to hide behind the same old objections, even though these complaints have been discredited time and time again.

They claim, for example, that medical marijuana legislation sends the wrong message to teens and encourages teen drug use. In fact, every other state that has had a medical marijuana law in effect long enough to produce data has seen a decrease in teen marijuana use since implementing the law.

Some claim that the THC pill Marinol is a sufficient substitute for marijuana, but I know first hand that cancer patients undergoing chemotherapy can often be too nauseated to even swallow a pill. In fact, research has shown that oral administration is the least effective way to administer THC or the other therapeutic components of marijuana.

The Joint Committee on Public Health is considering the bill this week, and I call on the committee to recognize the plight of these seriously ill people and pass this bill. I also urge all concerned constituents to contact their senators and representatives, and let them know how important medical marijuana is to Massachusetts's residents.

Prosecuting medical marijuana patients, besides being cruel and inhumane, wastes taxpayer dollars and preoccupies law enforcement officials when they could be arresting violent criminals. Individuals who are seeking relief from the debilitating symptoms associated with their diseases should not be branded as criminals. They deserve our compassion and understanding, and it's time to allow them a wider range of options for relief.

DON'T USE FACEBOOK AS A SOURCE FOR YOUR NEWS

In the recent fire on the 17th floor of Coolidge Hall, the Daily Collegian reported that it was not able to obtain the information of the alleged culprit from officials. The Collegian was, however, able to obtain his information from, "Several sources, including facebook.com."

This is a sick, demented and wrong thing to do. There is a damn good reason why the officials probably did not give the Collegian the resident's name, but the Collegian's desire for gossip brought them to sink so low as to look him up on facebook.com.

I am not angry that eyewitnesses were available to provide information, but I'm going to assume that the average facebook.com member, after reading that the resident's name had been obtained from the Web site, immediately looked him up.

I want the names of every Collegian journalist and staff member, just so that I can block them now. The facebook.com was created as a means for college students to keep in touch with distant friends and possibly learn more about their peers at their respective schools, not for some tabloid to print their name and completely disregard official's orders.

How can I sleep knowing that the Daily Collegian, which holds a biased and unfair monopoly in UMass news, is looking people up on facebook.com for their gossip (I mean stories)?

Shame on the Daily Collegian. Keep the student's personal information out of the news unless confirmed by officials. What's next? You'll listen to our favorite myspace.com songs?

Blues Performers face and fear Musical Extinction

By Gromer Jeffers Jr.
The Dallas Morning News

GRAPEVINE, Texas — David "Honeyboy" Edwards sits in a chair atop the modest stage at a restored theater in downtown Grapevine, working his slide guitar like few can and singing, almost shouting, the blues standard "Going Down Slow."

The song is about a bumpkin who leaves country life for an urban metropolis. He blows all of his money before landing on skid row.

Edwards is from rural Mississippi, but he's no fool. The Chicago guitarist with the pronounced Delta style has been playing his brand of blues for more than 70 years, spending most of that time in juke joints, dance halls and corner taverns. These are places where artists can get hurt or killed, as was the case with Robert Johnson, whom a jealous husband presumably poisoned 68 years ago.

Edwards was one of the last people to see Johnson alive and today is one of the few remaining purveyors of the mysterious bluesman's sound.

"I like to do it," Edwards says. "I'll either get bored or get to the point where I don't want to just do nothing. So I play the blues."

On Feb. 10, pianist Joe Willie "Pinetop" Perkins, guitarist Robert Lockwood, guitarist-pianist Henry Townsend and Edwards gave a rare blues concert at the Palace Arts Center theater in Grapevine. Each artist is more than 90 years old; the show could be the last time the quartet performs together.

The men carry with them a once popular style of blues that has given way to the more polished, perhaps less soulful sounds of modern rhythm and blues and rock. When they fade from the scene, it's unclear whether the music that defined their careers will survive — at least in the way they play it.

What's more, many so-called successors are white performers with rock influences who are far removed from the harsh Delta life that spawned American post-World War II blues.

"There are a lot of young people, young white boys playing the blues," Edwards says. "They can't sing, but they can play."

Perkins, who replaced the great Otis Spann in the Muddy Waters blues band, says he thinks about the future of his music.

"I don't know, but I would like to know what will happen to it all," Perkins says. "It's changed. They done named it rock 'n' roll. But I'm still trying to do the best I can, old as I am. I'm still trying to make a dollar or two."

Talented, slick and hard men from Mississippi used their craft to make money and secure a better life. At the same time, they created music that eventually migrated north to Chicago and St. Louis and west to Dallas.

Robert Johnson is widely regarded as a father of Delta blues, though Muddy Waters took the sound to Chicago and electrified it. According to legend, Johnson, once a below-average performer, sold his soul at a crossroads to achieve musical success. It was short-lived. He died in 1938 in Greenwood, Miss., days after taking a swig from an open whiskey bottle that police later determined was laced with strychnine. Historians debate whether Johnson died from the poison or from pneumonia.

Edwards, who says a jealous husband did in the blues pioneer, performed a show with him that fateful day.

"He was a nice fellow," Edwards says. "He liked whiskey and women, that's all."

Johnson influenced all four bluesmen. For most of their careers, they toiled in obscurity until their mentor's music was rediscovered and the blues revived.

"Robert Johnson was my teacher," says Lockwood, who was the son of one of Johnson's girlfriends. "He caused me to be much better than I would have been."

'Ultraviolet' emits new fight styles

By Hanh Nguyen
Knight Ridder Newspapers

LOS ANGELES — "Fighting movies are (one of) two things: They're either real, or they're cool," says "Ultraviolet" stunt coordinator and fight choreographer Mike Smith.

Falling firmly into the latter category, "Ultraviolet" is a futuristic vampire tale starring Milla Jovovich as Violet, a victim of a disease called hemophagia. The sufferers gain superhuman speed, agility and senses but are left with an abbreviated life span.

Director Kurt Wimmer, whose film "Equilibrium" wowed audiences with its "gun kata" style of gun fighting and martial arts, added much more to the mix this time around. He enlisted Smith to combine multiple martial arts disciplines, such as jujitsu and aikido, to create a new action form they jokingly refer to as "Hollywood Do."

"One thing you typically see in martial arts movies ... it's very much of an Asian influence,'" says Smith. "(Then) there's the very hard-hitting, impactual movie that's more American style. What we were trying to do here is blend all styles and make something a little different."

At a gymnasium in Van Nuys, Calif., Smith and his stunt team members — J.J. Perry, Mitch Gould, Robert Alonzo, Ming Liu and Youlia Galenko — demonstrate this colorful mix of global movement styles. The most surprising specialty isn't a self-defense form at all, but dance-inspired rhythmic gymnastics. It's usually performed with swirling ribbons, bouncing balls or small clubs, but for "Ultraviolet," these were replaced with swords.

"I taught Milla how to work with the swords ... because rhythmic gymnastics is all about working with apparatus, tossing it, and different elements," says Galenko who demonstrates a movement known as "illusion." With one foot firmly planted, she swings the other leg back and up, inverts herself and then completes the circle to catch a sword she had tossed into the air.

"There's a move in the chapel fight where Violet whips the sword around her hand, wrapping it horizontally," adds Smith. "In a real swordfight, that would never take place, but in this movie, it's a very unique move that's derived from rhythmic gymnastics."

Jovovich also worked closely with Alonzo on eskrima, a Filipino stick fighting style, and with Liu on wushu, a Chinese discipline of martial arts that emphasizes speed, force and an aesthetically fluid style. Liu, China's seven-time wushu national champion, trained the actress for more than six months, starting with wide-legged stances to build up her strength for the film's rooftop sequence.

"When she's surrounded ... the concept behind the fight is that she's so in tune to what's going on around her, she's able to anticipate the movement," explains Smith, "and through the beautiful wushu or rhythmic movements, she avoids the bullets."

Jovovich's enthusiasm for training impressed the stunt performers, who occasionally found themselves nursing injuries she inflicted.

"I've never, in all the time I've been doing films, seen an actress work this hard," says Smith. "She probably hits harder than most of these stunt girls. In the sequence where she rips the gun in half ... we used these (padded sticks) because Milla was killing us."

"Ultraviolet" opens nationwide on Friday.

Reaching for a relationship friend: too much?

Lovers Only
Hannah Drake

She's cute and you love the way she smiles. The only problem is, a buddy of yours met her first. Now they're over, and you want to go for it. Is it wrong?

He's got that laid-back style that's loaded with sex appeal — but you know him because he was with a friend of a friend. But they're not together anymore. Do you go for him?

The answer to both of these questions: It depends. Some people say, absolutely not. Others disagree. If it's lust, the easiest thing to do is find someone else who makes you horny. If there are feelings that you tried fighting and you can't, and you're sure it's not just physical, then it's worth trying out.

One of the ways we meet people in life is through people's friends, and unfortunately, all is fair in love and war. I'm pretty sure there is no International Court of Relationships, and if you decide to play with people's emotions for your entire life, you don't have to worry about being thrown in jail. But, dating a friend's ex too soon after the first relationship ended is a kick in the stomach to your friend, and it's best to wait until your friend has moved on.

If it's a really good or best friend, it's definitely not a good idea to date their ex. But if you're not that close — whose happiness are you more concerned about?

A few suggestions: In girl world, any kind of involvement with a friend's ex absolutely must be talked about with said friend before any steps are taken, or said friend will turn into archrival — this includes innocent hanging out all the way up to future-boyfriend status.

That being said, it's a must that you consider how important the friend is. If you've known the person whose ex you want to get involved with for a while, and are close, then you do need to consider that dating the ex isn't exactly loyalty to your friend. But don't have a heart attack trying to figure out if a friend of a friend will cry mutiny over you dating their ex. Stuff like this happens all the time, because the heart wants what it wants, and it doesn't follow any rules. If you don't listen, your heart will make you pay, no matter how you try to ignore it — I speak from experience on this.

Yes, there will probably be some weirdness among those who know, because it's not the ideal situation. It'll be the gossip of the week among friends and acquaintances, but sooner or later something else more interesting will happen, or they'll run out of things to say about it. And real friends don't let guys or girls come between their friendships — at least for too long.

Guy world is slightly different, because it depends on the level of the friendship and the level of involvement with the girl — on both sides. The general consensus is, if it's a friend you're not that close to, and you just want to get to know the girl to see how it goes, then, as my best guy friend said, "Just because someone is someone's ex doesn't mean that socially they are off limits."

But if the girl is someone the guy has been in love with for a long time, and they broke up, the rules change.

"The other day when [my best friend] was up he asked me, 'So, if I dated [your ex that you aren't getting back with but will always love], is our friendship over?' And I was like, 'Absolutely, especially if you didn't ask me, but if you did ask me, I'd tell you that you couldn't, and if you still did, then the friendship would be over, and I'd wanna fight you.'"

And if the guy is just a drinking buddy?

"Depends, if I don't hang out with him then there is no protocol. She's fair game."

There are so many variables in the situation that I finally had to ask my friend to give me a general guy's opinion on the matter, assuming everything is in the neutral range (no best friends or serious heartbreaks, etc.)

"If things start to head in a direction where you can obviously see what's happening, you are now obligated to ask [the friend], but that obligation really depends on the relationship between you and the friend in question," he said.

The bottom line? Don't waste a friendship for something that's a maybe, but if the friendship's not a close one and you want to see how it turns out with the new guy or girl, go for it.

Need advice? E-mail me: LoversOnly@gmail.com. Next week: Is he really just not that into you?

Chirino earns praise

By Jordan Levin
Knight Ridder Newspapers

MIAMI — Willy Chirino wasn't expecting anything when he won his first Grammy this month. "I didn't have any illusions, and I didn't want to get worked up and then let down," he said. He is 58, a grandfather, and though he has been making music for more than 40 years and records for more than three decades, he essentially is a local artist whose heart, audience and hits have always been in Miami.

"I had sort of given up," on even being nominated, he said. His friends and family all assured him that just the fact that his album "Son del Alma" was nominated for Best Salsa/Merengue Album was enough.

And so, as he sat Feb. 8 with wife, singer Lissette, and singer-songwriter daughter Nicole at the Grammys in Los Angeles, he almost missed his big moment: "When they said 'Son del Alma,' I thought I'd lost, because I was waiting for them to say Willy Chirino.

"It was an explosion of happiness. The Grammys are the most prestigious award an artist can get. Wherever you go, it precedes your name. I think at this stage in my career it's more rewarding than getting it at the beginning."

But in a way Chirino already had his reward.

Three days before the Grammys, he was playing for more than 4,000 people at a sold-out James L. Knight Center where he had his audience entranced. Elderly couples and ardent young ones, grandmothers and grandchildren, power brokers in suits and slick young salsa dancers were singing along, dancing — all with eyes alight to be there with Willy Chirino, the voice of Cuban Miami.

His best known song may be "Nuestra dia ya viene llegando" ("Our Day is Coming"), an anthem of hope for the day when a post-Castro Cuba arrives that's sung on both sides of the Florida straits. But in Miami, Willy Chirino's day is already here.

"I couldn't leave (Miami) and I wouldn't have," says Chirino, sitting in the living room of his spacious two-story home. "It has brought me good things — the feeling that my music has been positive for the Cuban people."

The Knight Center is only 20-some blocks from the former site of the motel at Biscayne Boulevard and 21st Street where a 14-year-old Chirino lived with 87 other children, all brought from Cuba by the Pedro Pan program soon after the revolution.

His parents and siblings arrived a year later, and the family struggled with poverty and assimilation. His parents picked tomatoes and waited tables; he and his sister had a newspaper route.

But Chirino was soon using music as an entry into this new culture.

His parents, like most immigrants, were skeptical. "My father was like, 'Are you crazy? You have to get a real job.'"

But Chirino had stars in his eyes. Growing up in a small country town in the Cuban province of Pinar del Rio, he fell in love with the big bands he saw in American movies, then with the Beatles and the Rolling Stones.

He talked a teacher at Miami's La Salle High School into buying him a drum set so he could start a rock 'n' roll band. Soon a promoter offered him a job playing clubs for $70 a week.

"I was like, 'Wow, who do I have to kill?'" Chirino says. "$70 was a lot of money then." He would wake up at 7 a.m., go to school, come home, eat, sleep, then wake up at 8 p.m. and head out to play till dawn.

His struggle to success is part of what makes him an idol to so much of Cuban Miami, and even to Cubans still on the island. He lives in a sprawling, luxurious home not far north of that Pedro Pan motel, with Lissette, a popular singer in her own right.

The couple has five daughters (one is Chirino's from a previous marriage) and one son, and all but the boy play music. Angie, the oldest, is a successful songwriter who won a Latin Grammy as a co-author of Marc Anthony's "Dimelo," and Olgui is touring with Shakira.

"I am living dreams I had when I was 8," Chirino says. "I am the perfect example of a person who accomplished what I wanted to."

Cable, Deadpool duo back to drawing board

By Casey Freeman
Colorado Daily (U. Colorado)

BOULDER, Colo. — Team-up books have been a successful venture for comic book companies for years. "World's Finest" starring Batman and Superman may be the most well known, but the adventures of Green Arrow and Green Lantern, Wolverine and Punisher as well as Spiderman and friends have all been popular renditions of odd couples.

But putting two superheroes together doesn't always make a dynamic duo, and such is the case with "Cable & Deadpool."

Who and who?

Cable and Deadpool are the only major surviving characters remaining from the early '90s Marvel Comics' book "X-Force" about mutants with no affiliation with the X-Men.

Time wasn't kind to most members of X-Force. The team's lineup changed almost monthly, and the entire team eventually was kicked out for a cast of celebrity superheroes.

Cable is a soldier from the future who reads thoughts, moves objects with his mind, has robot arms and carries really big guns. His history is long, confusing and boring. Continuous new additions make his past even more convoluted. Cable has fought everything from cosmic threats to alien invasions to genocide.

Deadpool looks like Spiderman, but he's really a wisecracking assassin. His body can heal from all types of damage. Even though he's a cold-blooded killer, his charm has always been his dry wit and goofy humor.

When you put a straight-edge warrior and a psychotic slacker in the same comic — what do you get?

Utter failure.

In the past, these two superpowered guys have never been friends, let alone teammates. In recent issues, Cable and Deadpool have battled each other, a crazy religious cult and the governments of the world. The denouement of these epic battles has been as drab as Cable's dialogue or as confusing as one of Deadpool's pop-culture references.

Why they joined forces is puzzling, as are following plotlines. The plots are either too weird for comprehension, or so see-through that most third graders can predict the next page.

Nothing has been done to advance either character, and even the characters themselves are written shabbily. This comic doesn't know when to be serious or funny, but it generally fails at both.

Most of the blame can be placed on series writer Fabian Nicieza's shoulders — he originally created the two superdudes more than ten years ago. While the characters and readers have grown up a little, Nicieza's writing offers nothing new or exciting. Most often his scripts are as engaging as late-night Weather Channel and as comedic as the Home Shopping Network.

On the other hand, Patrick Zircher manages to create colorful and entertaining art in every issue. While Zircher doesn't stray from big arms, big guns or big boobs, he definitely has the skill and drive to produce 22 pages of eye-catching art a month. The drawing is certainly better than the original renditions of the characters, and it's truly unfortunate that the writing is not as fantastic as the art.

Neither Cable nor Deadpool will ever win popularity contests, but putting these two opposites together with a new writer and the currently outstanding art could make this book successful.

In contrast, "Heroes For Hire" — which was produced by Marvel Comics but is now discontinued — starring Power Man and Iron Fist proves that books can work without well-known stars and a high caliber of writing.

While both Cable and Deadpool have cult followings, one can only think that the only reason people buy this book is because there is no other outlet where people can find their favorite characters. Fans of their individual series can hope that the book will be cancelled — so both characters can return to their own happy places.

Ford keeps offense ready

sively, as the star center is coming off his best week of the season, being named Co-Atlantic 10 Player of the Week. It was the first time this season that Freeman has received the award, and it came on the heels of a three-game stretch in which he averaged 18.7 points and 13.0 rebounds.

"I liked the aggressiveness he played with in the second half against Dayton," Ford said. "It's all in the mentality of Rashaun – it's up to him. What mentality he brings to that particular game is going to decide how well he plays."

Another key for the Maroon and White will be jumping out to an early lead, as the ball control system that the Spiders play makes it difficult for them to score points in bunches if they fall behind.

You don't want to get down," Ford said. "If you get down double-digits against a team like that, it's tough because then they really control the game with their offense. You try to keep the game as close as you can so you can have a chance to come back. I've seen as well, if you can get a good lead on a team like that, it's tough for them to come back and score quickly because it's not in their nature."

Richmond enters tonight's game on an eight-game losing streak, but have been a far better team at home this season, posting a 9-5 record at the Robins Center, compared to just 2-11 away from campus.

"They've struggled on the road, but they've been pretty good at home," Ford said "We've broken down their percentages at home and away, and their percentages at home are so much better. They shoot much better at home."

KAREN WINEGRAD/COLLEGIAN

Jeff Viggiano has averaged 8.9 points and 3.5 rebounds in 25 games this season for the Minutemen, who are looking for their first A-10 road win tonight.

Small catches old friend on slopes

Rouleau also commented on Small's talents, claiming he was a "natural" skier.

"He has some innate abilities as a skier. Jason carries an incredibly low center of gravity, so he's able to get pretty low," Rouleau said.

Small put those skills to work quickly in his freshman year, he earned Second Team Eastern Collegiate Ski Conference All-Conference and All-American honors, finishing in the top 10 in 10 of his 14 events.

Small is a year behind Hawkins, who is now a junior, so he is on the same pace Hawkins was a year ago. However, to see Small finish the regular season as the team's No. 1 skier was a pleasant surprise to the team.

Small finished less than 10 total points out of the top individual ranking in the Eastern Collegiate Ski Conference regular season rankings, nearly matching Hawkins, who won the award outright the year before. Hawkins was fifth overall this year.

Hawkins may have had more victories on the slopes, but Small was by far the most consistent skier for the Maroon and White. He racked up six second-place finishes, as well as two wins, and failed to finish a race just twice.

His best performance came in the season's second carnival, where he excelled in the slalom. At the Plymouth State Carnival at Waterville Valley, N.H., Hawkins fell in his second run and did not finish. Small picked up the slack and easily took first.

His second run was the best on the day, finishing 2.29 seconds faster than anyone else on the slopes, and over three full seconds faster overall, a huge margin of victory for a ski race. He led the Minutemen to a third-place finish as a team in the slalom, and fourth overall at the Carnival.

"Jason proved to the rest of the league that day that he means business," Rouleau said.

Small's other victory came at the UConn Carnival slalom, where he led the team – which was again missing Hawkins, this time to injury– to a third-place finish.

Five of Small's six second-place finishes came to Hawkins, including the Brown Carnival slalom and the giant slaloms at the UConn, Plymouth State and Boston College Carnivals, as well as this year's EOSC Regionals giant slalom, where the UMass men won their third consecutive regional title.

The sixth and final time Jason finished second was at the St. Anslem's Carnival giant slalom, where Hawkins finished third, marking the first time all season Small finished ahead of Hawkins in a race.

With the regular season and Regionals over, Small and the rest of the Minutemen are looking ahead to the 2006 USCSA Nationals, where he expects to improve on last year's performance.

"Last year was completely different because it was the first time I had even been to regional [competition], never mind Nationals," Small said.

The team had traveled out to Idaho for the week-long event after racing their entire regular season within driving distance at mountains here in New England.

"The fact that my trip out west was paid for by the school for me to go out and ski was a bit overwhelming," he said.

"I definitely didn't do as well as I could have, but just as an experience, it was great for me," Small said of his performance at the Nationals. "I think this year I'll be more settled down and hopefully I can put a few more good runs together."

With so much already behind him, and more than two years of college still ahead, Small is glad he followed his friends to UMass.

"It's been a lot of fun," Small said. "The people I've met through this team have been incredible. I couldn't have asked for a better core of friends than I've gotten out of the ski team."

As they head to the Nationals next week at Sugarloaf in Maine, that core of friends is fast becoming one of the great success stories in UMass athletics.

was fourth on the team in points (20 on 16 goals and four assists), allowing her more scoring opportunities.

Sophomores Julie Papaleo and Jeanette Villapiano had solid rookie seasons, with Papaleo starting 13 games and Villapiano coming on strong late in 2005, and should help anchor the midfield along with sophomore Melynda Zwick – who scored 11 goals in 10 games before her season was cut short by injury – and senior Lauren Reid.

Freshmen Holly Drown, sister of assistant coach Tracy Drown and a high school All-America selection, along with Meghan Reddy, Caitlyn Glowacki and Julie Pasquantonio, will compete for playing time as well.

UMass sophomore attacker Kathleen Typadis led the Minutewomen with 36 goals last year. She picked up a pair in the loss at Holy Cross on Saturday.

DEFENSE

Losing 2005 A-10 Defender of the Year Kristin St. Hilaire and playing without two of its starters for the first two games of this season, it's a pretty vulnerable time for this part of the team. Still, Bolduc says her defense "actually played alright" in Saturday's loss to the Crusaders.

Depending on what your definition of "alright" is, that could be a good or bad thing, but Bolduc assures that the team will be much better on the defensive end once they are at full strength again this weekend.

Erica Shapiro is back after starting all 17 games as a sophomore last season. With her work ethic and superb footwork, she figures to work well in space around the net. She'll be joined by senior Jackie Nesbitt, another bright spot on D, along with Alana Jakas – who also had her season cut short by injury – Whitney Keller and Jackie Rosenzweig.

GOALKEEPERS

Last year wasn't the prettiest of times for the incumbent Lauren McCarthy, who surrendered an average of nearly 13 goals per game in 16 starts last season. But the redshirt junior will benefit from having former Minutewoman standout Jen Nardi, arguably one of the best goalies to have come through the program, as an assistant coach.

While the team is a lot more confident in her this year, freshman and high school All-American Jamie Whiteway and sophomore Krissy Anderson will surely be hot on her tail if goalkeeping becomes a struggle.

senior James Godinho took ninth in the 4x400 relay with a time of 3:19.36. Junior Wesley Jones, senior Matt Clark, sophomore Kevin Murphy and junior Zach Przysiecki produced a sixth-place finish in the 2x800 relay with a time of 7:46.60. In the distance medley, Lopes, Clark, freshman Peter Fortunato and sophomore Ryan Durkin ran 10:08.90, which was good enough for sixth place.

Each relay team turned in a season-best performance.

O'Brien commented that his team has improved throughout the season, and now they must focus on preparing the 17 athletes that will be representing the Maroon and White at the ECAC Championships.

The Minutewomen had four representatives competing in Boston.

"I thought that the athletes we brought down competed very well," UMass women's coach Julie LaFreniere said.

Those athletes were freshman Jordan Veney, senior Elisabeth Budd and sophomores Christina DeRosa and Kristen Bakanowski, all of whom have had outstanding seasons for Massachusetts.

Veney, a usually dominant shot-putter, finished in eighth with a throw of 42 feet.

It was a mere shadow of the Jordan Veney that LaFreniere is used to seeing – a Jordan Veney who has set the school indoor shot put record three times this season.

"I know she didn't throw as far as she had thrown in a couple of earlier meets, but she competed well," LaFreniere said. "I know she's disappointed [with her last performance of the season], but she's young and I'm sure she'll have a great outdoor season."

Also discouraged was Budd in the 500-meter, who ran a time of 1:16.50 to come in sixth.

"She was disappointed [also]. It was not what she wanted to run," LaFreniere said, mentioning that the competition in the 500-meters is tremendous this year.

The two sophomores placed a little higher.

DeRosa was forced to settle for fourth place in her 3,000-meter race after she was beaten to the finish line by Niamh Cunningham of UConn by .03 seconds, and Bakanowski placed third overall in the pole-vault behind Laura Chmielewski and Olivia Kalinowski from Northeastern.

DeRosa and Bakanowski will be the only ambassadors for the girls next weekend. However, LaFreniere is very enthusiastic about her sophomore duo.

"It's going to be a great competition, and I think both of them are ready to step up to that," LaFreniere added.

Lowe has new vision on 2006

By John Nadel
Associated Press

VERO BEACH, Fla. – Derek Lowe was having a difficult time focusing upon arrival at the Los Angeles Dodgers' clubhouse.

New contact lenses will do that.

"I tried them last year – for one day," Lowe said between blinks. "They feel weird. I've always known I've needed them; I could just never put them in and out.

"That's what spring training is about – that's my adventure for the day."

Focus might have been a temporary problem Tuesday morning for Lowe. He's convinced it won't be an issue this season – his second with the Dodgers following his postseason heroics for the Boston Red Sox in 2004.

The 32-year-old right-hander acknowledged his concentration wasn't where it should have been at times last year, when his marriage broke up and his wife made public his relationship with former Los Angeles television sports anchor Carolyn Hughes.

Lowe claims Hughes didn't cause the demise of his marriage. The two are still together.

"We didn't leave our spouses for each other, which people believe we did," he said. "She was going through a divorce. It wasn't a fling. There's no guarantee, but it wasn't just a fling.

"The main people in my life, they knew what was going on for months upon months upon months. They knew we were having a hard time for a long time. That was the 100 percent thing. It wasn't anyone else that led to the breakup – absolutely not."

With all that was going on, the 6-foot-6 Lowe said he went from 235 pounds to 216 in a span of 2 1/2 months during the season.

"You're not eating, you're not sleeping – the stress of the whole thing," he said. "It was a tough situation. To add even more toughness to it is the way it was handled, the amount of people who knew about it.

"You learn about people – the players on the team last year were great, the way they were such good friends."

Teammate Jayson Werth said it was a matter of trying to understand.

"Being a baseball player that is married and has a family is really tough, no matter what," Werth said. "You're traveling. You're away from your family. If you're in a situation where you're not happy, I can't imagine the strain that would put you under.

"Now it seems that he's happy with himself and his personal life, so he can put it behind him and do what he loves to do, and that's to be a Major League pitcher."

Werth said he wasn't aware of Lowe's circumstances until what he called "the media frenzy."

Lowe said former Dodgers manager Jim Tracy was especially helpful.

"I have so much respect for him, the way he handled my situation," Lowe said. "He handled it like a dad, not like a coach or a manager. He was being a friend. He wanted to help me out as much as he could. He knew it affected me.

"When you're having a hard time in life, it affects the way you perform. You're struggling. Your mind wasn't in the right place. I think the reason I can say that now is you can look back and say, 'I thought I was more focused on the game.'"

With that in mind, Lowe recalled a game against Arizona on July 2, when he allowed a career-high four homers in three innings before being yanked.

"I can honestly say it was the first time in my life I didn't care," he said. "That was the day I knew I had to do something. That was the breaking point for me. I knew I had to make a decision, one way or another."

Lowe went 4-2 with a 1.80 ERA in his last eight starts to finish 12-15 with a 3.61 ERA. Much was made about his moving from one side of the rubber to the other. He begs to differ, saying it was more a matter of getting his life together. He said he plans to carry that into this season.

"I'm refocused. I gained all the weight back," he said. "It's going to be a really good year for me and the team."

Minutemen look to trap Spiders

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

While Massachusetts men's basketball coach Travis Ford has not been able to institute an up-tempo style of play with his team this year, the Minutemen will look like a veritable run-and-gun squad compared to tonight's opponent, the Richmond Spiders.

UMass (12-13, 7-7 Atlantic 10) travels to Virginia to face the Spiders (11-16, 4-10 A-10) tonight at 7:30, and it's safe to say that the matchup will not resemble a track meet.

The Spiders are coached by Chris Mooney, a Princeton alum, who employs the style of play his alma mater made famous. While the Spiders have not had a great deal of success in the win-loss column, they certainly have been effective in slowing down the pace of the game.

Richmond leads the A-10 in scoring defense, allowing just 57.8 points per game, but is also by far the worst scoring team in the conference at 51.1 points per game, an average of 10.1 points lower than the next closest team.

All of this leaves Ford with the dilemma of whether to make adjustments to combat this slower style of play, or to prepare for the Spiders like every other opponent and hope to escape Richmond with a victory.

"It is so hard, especially this late in the year, to have to change your whole look on defense, which is what you have to do against Richmond," Ford said. "They go against everything that we try to do.

"It's a very tough scouting report for this late in the year. I don't even know how to run their offense [because] it's so complicated. We don't want to get overly worked up with how they play; we need to really concentrate on us."

Ford does concede that Richmond will force his team to make some adjustments, but says with the game coming at the end of the season it is too late to change very much.

"We'll make adjustments like always, but we don't want to change that much at this time of the year," Ford said. "If this was one of the earlier games in the conference [schedule], it would have been easier, but this late in the conference we're really set in our way of how we want to do things. I'm concerned if we change too much, then we have to turn around and play Xavier [Saturday] and go back to the way we play."

One area that Ford has emphasized in every game is taking care of the ball, and while the Minutemen's 16.8 turnovers per game are the worst in the A-10, they committed a season-low nine in a 66-47 win over Dayton on Saturday. Cutting down on turnovers will be even more important against a Richmond team that limits opponents' possessions.

"Rebounding and turning the ball over are going to be big keys in the basketball game," Ford said.

"Every time you touch the ball you have to make sure you get something good because possessions are few and far between. You're going to go down and defend for 20-25 seconds easily, usually 30 seconds, so you can't come down and let them off the hook defensively."

UMass will look to keep junior Rashaun Freeman involved offen-

See HOOPS on page 8

KAREN WINOKUR/COLLEGIAN

UMass junior Rashaun Freeman is averaging 14 points and 9.4 rebounds per game this season for the Minutemen, who stand at 12-13. UMass will look to even its record tonight with its date against Richmond.

Small puts in tall work to control slopes

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

Last year, Rush Hawkins broke onto the collegiate skiing scene with win after win on the slopes as a sophomore. This year, he has returned as the Minutemen's top skier, but he was no longer alone at the top.

Jason Small, a sophomore himself, has joined Hawkins as a top-tier skier, and the two have combined for five 1-2 finishes this season. Small surpassed Hawkins, last year's top skier at the nationals, in the regular season rankings.

The funny thing about both skiers winning big is that they've known each other since grade school.

"We went to high school together, elementary school, the whole thing. We grew up knowing each other," Small said.

Both athletes are from nearby Shelburne, Mass. and have had a lot of experience skiing together.

"We've always skied together at Berkshire East," Hawkins said. "We're just a couple of locals."

Small began skiing at a very young age. At about a year-and-a-half old, his parents, Jim and Janet, brought their son out to learn to ski.

"My parents put me on a pair of plastic skis and pushed me down the hill," Small said, who credits much of his development as an athlete to his parents.

"You can't do this sport without a decent amount of money for equipment, race fees, membership fees, hotels and travel," Small said. "So they basically supported [my skiing career] financially for the last decade or so."

Eventually, Small made it out of the backyard and onto the slopes, where he began racing at a very early age.

"I skied at Berkshire East my whole life, and when I was about nine, I [began to] notice the skiers going down [during races], and it looked like a fun thing to do so I hopped on [the slopes]," Small said.

Hawkins and Small both ended up choosing to attend UMass to continue their skiing careers, and it paid off nicely. In 2005 they were an integral part in the Minutemen finishing third out 19 teams competing at the United States Collegiate Ski and Snowboard Association Nationals.

The pair is also training partners during the season, skiing together at the UMass training facility, Berkshire East, where they skied during high school. Though they've known each other nearly their whole lives, they are very competitive.

"They're best friends all week until race day, then they're out to get each other," UMass coach Justin Rouleau said.

That competition is what drives the two athletes to get better and improve with each race.

"It's great [training with Hawkins]. He's an excellent skier. It's always good to ski with someone who is at your level or better than you because you can always pick up things just from watching them, and I've picked up a lot from just watching him ski," Small said.

Hawkins had similar things to say about his teammate.

"I had to really focus this year to try to beat him," Hawkins said. "He's really come into his own."

Hawkins also said that Jason's skiing style was very unique, and it's helped him become successful this year as a sophomore.

"He gets some extreme angles [on his turns]," Hawkins said, explaining that Small leans so far into the turn that he nearly touches the snow.

"If you look at any picture of him, his lower legs are bent that much more [than most skiers] into the hill to give him that much more of an edge. Sometimes it helps him; sometimes it doesn't. But when people take a look at him on the slopes, they try to add that to their style."

Minutewomen back in action

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

One of the best feel-good sports stories of 2005 had to have been that of the Northwestern University women's lacrosse team.

Until four years ago, the Wildcats didn't even have a team, largely because the sport is not played at an organized level in America outside of the east coast. So when the prestigious academic institution in Chicago finally got itself a program, it had to take to the streets – literally, pulling kids over on the side of the road to ask if they were interested in playing.

But somehow and some way the Wildcats, led by All-American and Stoneham native Kristin Kjellman, took the powerhouses of the sport and slapped them around to become the Goliath of college women's lacrosse. The 'Cats went undefeated last season to win the national championship, marking the first time since 1948 that Northwestern has won a national title in anything. NU continues to roll in 2006. They are currently ranked No. 1, and last weekend pounded Rutgers, a team receiving votes in the preseason polls, 18-3.

When you read about something like that, you can't help but think that anything can happen, and that's something Massachusetts women's lacrosse coach Carrie Bolduc has talked to her team about. The Minutewomen won the national title in 1982, followed by a string of successful years throughout the 1980's, but since then – save a few good seasons – have been struggling to regain top-notch form.

"We certainly have the athleticism and life to be that team," said Bolduc, who was part of Syracuse's inaugural women's lacrosse team in 1998. "But it takes experience, too. We're pretty young. That's not an excuse. But with time, things will come."

She hits it perfectly on the nose. After coming in last place in the Atlantic 10 conference in 2005 and signing a recruiting class that features three All-Americans, there is no place to go but up for the Minutewomen. Yet at the same time, they are a youth-laden team, featuring only seven juniors and seniors.

And their schedule certainly doesn't work to their favor, either. Generally taking on some of the best programs in the nation, UM has a its work cut out this year. Four of the Minutewomen's non-conference opponents (Dartmouth, Boston University, Syracuse, Hofstra) are ranked in the InsideLacrosse Preseason Top 20, and three A-10 schools (Richmond, Temple, George Washington) have been receiving votes in various polls (to wit, Richmond is ranked No. 18 in the InsideLacrosse poll). Two other programs, Albany and New Hampshire, are always tough in any given year.

To borrow from a certain college basketball coach, the scheduling is downright Calipari-like. Predicted to finish sixth out of eight teams in the A-10, the kids are going to have to grow up fast, and the upper class is going to have a little extra pressure helping them with this. But if Northwestern's story has taught us something, it's that anything is possible.

Attack

Returning its top four scorers, the Minutewomen will be playing a more structured, organized offense in 2006 than they did last season, manipulating certain players in certain spots in the offensive zone to try to create some opportunities, but Bolduc points out it's to no avail if the attack cannot penetrate and create movement.

"We've got to capitalize off of our attacking drive," Bolduc said. "It all starts with that. If you don't get any drive, you can't really create anything off of that."

UMass features several weapons on the attack, including last season's top two scorers in senior Kerri Connerty and sophomore Kathleen Typadis. Connerty figures to have another brilliant season, needing just 22 goals to crack the Top 10 in all-time scoring, while Typadis set all sorts of team rookie records as a freshman.

Combined, the two accounted for 70 of the team's 170 goals in 2005 (Typadis led with 36, while Connerty had 34), and while the role of Connerty is obvious, being a senior and all, Typadis has taken on a bit of a change.

"She's becoming more of vocal leader out there," Bolduc said. "She's starting to recognize her role in that she can be such a threat not only with the scoring but with the things she can create off-ball for other people. So, she's becoming more of a thinker this year.

"People at this level are starting to know her and figuring out how to shut her down, so she's been thinking a little bit more, which is new to her."

The attack capabilities of this year's Minutewomen were put on display last Saturday, when UM rolled off three goals in 65 seconds in a loss to Holy Cross, but as the loss would imply, they'll have to be able to string together 60 minutes of that kind of play.

Also returning to help achieve this will be Lindsey Cassell, another senior, and Katie Bottini, who as a sophomore is considered one of the fastest on the team. Claire Mancini and Kristina Twichell figure into the mix as well.

KAREN WINOKUR/COLLEGIAN

UMass senior Kerri Connerty scored 34 goals last year and led the Minutewomen with 17 assists and 51 total points. UM looks to build on its 5-12 season of a year ago.

Midfield

After just one game, in which she led all scorers with four goals, freshman Kayt McCormick is already a player you can speak volumes about. One of three high school All-Americans in the freshman class, Bolduc already concedes that she is one of the best at bringing the ball up in transition.

Boasting a very feisty competitive edge and a terrific knack for the ball, she draws comparisons in playing style to Typadis. There is one major difference, however. Typadis stands at 5-foot-2, while McCormick is 5-foot-7, meaning her size will make her that much more difficult to defend against.

She will most likely be placed in the attack at some point this year, but against Holy Cross she played in the back due to lack of depth on defense. Even out of the back, she managed to ring off four goals, which says something not only about her talent but her versatility.

That said, don't be surprised if her presence diverts attention away from Sam Sepulveda, who started every game last season at midfield and

UM opens home season

By Danny Picard

The weather looks to be a whole lot better when the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team faces off against No. 8 Boston University at 3 p.m. today at Garber Field. It will be the home opener for UMass (0-1), which is coming off of an 11-8 season opening loss to Holy Cross under heavy winter conditions on Saturday in Worcester.

UMass coach Carrie Bolduc knows that she has the talent to put a successful product on the field this season, but no matter who they are playing, the main goal is always the same, and that's putting the ball in the net.

"Our game plan is to pretty much run the show," Bolduc said. "I think we're prepared. We were prepared for Holy Cross; unfortunately we had some inclement weather that didn't help out. But we're certainly an athletic team. We're a fast team with a lot of heart, drive and passion. We can compete at a very high level, but tomorrow, the bottom line is we have to finish."

The Minutewomen were able to score eight times on Saturday, but that proved to not be enough to hold off the Crusaders on their home turf. Four of those goals came from freshman Kaytlin McCormick, who was named the Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Week on Monday.

McCormick started the game on defense, but with her scoring ability, Bolduc moved her to midfield, where she will remain for the near future. The two-time U.S. Lacrosse All-American also collected four ground balls and caused three turnovers in her collegiate debut.

"We were pretty pumped," Bolduc said. "She has worked really hard, and came off of an injury a couple weeks ago. Since then, she has really come back strong. She's feisty and competitive, and she has some great energy that she brings to the field which people really feed off of."

UMass will certainly need her presence to be felt once again this afternoon as it looks to grab the first win of its 2006 campaign.

The Minutewomen will look to get that victory against a strong Boston University team that is coming off of an impressive season in 2005. The Terriers won their fourth America East Conference title last year and made it all the way to the NCAA Quarterfinals, losing to Virginia by a score of 13-9.

After posting a solid 18-2 record a season ago, Boston University has been predicted to repeat as the America East champion, as it received all seven first-place votes from the league's head coaches.

This will mark the 2006 season opener for the Terriers. They are returning nine starters from last year, including seven all-conference selections and six players who recorded at least 34 points in 2005.

Boston University is led by one of the best players in the country in sophomore attacker Jenny Hauser, who is coming off of an outstanding freshman season, in which she led her team in points and goals scored. She tallied 70 points on 54 goals and 16 assists, and was a first-team all-region selection last year. Her point total was the fourth highest in Boston University history, while her 54 goals ranked second all-time.

The Minutewomen will have their work cut out for them in their first game at Garber Field this season. And whether or not they come out with a win will all depend on how they execute.

"There's only so much that you can prepare for," Bolduc said. "We haven't seen them play. All we can do is predict and look at last year's film. So it's really going to be about us, and we have to do what we do best."

UMass runs to the top

The Massachusetts men's track and field team had a solid showing at the New England Championships in Boston over the weekend, finishing in sixth place out of the 32 competing teams, while the Minutewomen staked claim to a 16th-place finish.

"We had a real aggressive and competitive performance by the team as a whole," UMass men's coach Ken O'Brien said.

Junior Eric Hoagland was the only first-place finisher for the Maroon and White, winning the long jump with a mark of 23 feet, 3.25 inches. The jump won 10 points for the Minutemen.

Hoagland is coming off a performance at the Atlantic 10 Championships on Feb. 18 that won him UMass/Dinn Brothers Co-Athlete of the Week. He won the long jump with a distance of 23 feet, 4 inches and the triple jump with 49-3, marking the second time he set the UMass record.

Sophomore Sean Calicchio, in what was only his third competition of the year after suffering from a nagging injury, tied for fourth in the shot-put with Alex Kamperal of Springfield College. His toss of 52 feet, 8.75 inches helped rack up 4.5 points for the Minutemen.

An offensive lineman for the UMass football team, Calicchio recently posted the fourth-longest heave in school indoor track history. His chuck of 52 feet, 11.5 inches marked the first time a UMass thrower has cracked the all-time top-five since Massachusetts alum Vic Morency set the school record with 56-11.5.

The Minutemen also had some stellar performances in the relays.

SGA begins to prepare for coming elections

By Matt Bellivieau
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association of the University of Massachusetts yesterday appointed nine students, including former Chancellor of Elections Ambreen Rafiq, to act as election commissioners for the March elections.

The SGA plans to appoint the final three commissioners sometime this week.

Former SGA senator and Commission Chancellor Priyanka Pant will lead this group of new commissioners.

SGA President Pavel Payano asked all senators running for office to maintain a level of civility throughout the campaign.

"Hopefully everything will be on-point, civilized and done with respect for your opponent," said Payano. "Sean Bliss and myself ran against each other last year, and at the end we were still friends."

Nominations for the elections close on March 8.

The period of campaigning will run for five days from March 9 to March 13 and elections will be held on March 14 and March 15.

SGA Speaker Sean Bliss, who was sung "Happy Birthday" by senators during the meeting, expressed his concern over the way in which some senators are filing campaign complaints, specifically when the complaints are incorrectly being brought to Vice Chancellor Michael Gargano.

"I'm concerned that some of the recent complaints are harmful to the undergraduate representation of UMass," said Bliss. "If you're going to file a complaint, read the bylaws first; make sure it's not a problem you've made up in your head. Do not address complaints to Gargano. You go and cry to Gargano and you're only undermining our authority that Gargano is trying to take away from us."

The SGA also announced that Gargano will be in Van Meter dormitory to talk about the controversial HOUCH Program, which promotes all-freshman housing, on March 14 from 7 p.m. to 8 p.m.

The program, which has been criticized by Payano, aims to help freshman in their transition from high school to college, in part by putting its members in all-freshman dorms.

The University currently has four all-freshman dormitories: Pierpont, Moore, Butterfield and Melville. In fall of 2006, Van Meter dormitory will become all-freshman as well.

In 2007, five more dorms will join the program: Dickinson, Webster, Emerson, James and Kennedy.

UMass student still in hospital after accident

The driver who struck a University of Massachusetts student earlier this week was driving illegally with a suspended license, according to police.

Garry Paul, 25, of Springfield was arrested by the UMass Police Department following the accident. He has since been charged with a crosswalk violation and unsafe operation of a motor vehicle.

Witnesses to the accident said Paul's truck hit freshman Olivia Simpson, 18, as she was crossing the street on Eastman Lane near the Totman Gymnasium.

Simpson remains in fair condition at Bay State Hospital, where she was transferred after being transported by ambulance to Cooley Dickinson Hospital immediately following the accident.

I've at least the next day or so, Simpson says she will stay at Bay State Hospital while more tests are run to determine the extent of her injuries.

According to Simpson, both her right knee and pelvis were injured in the accident and she is having difficulty walking. Simpson said it is unlikely that she will return to school right away and that she will return home to Washington Heights, N.Y. after she is released from the hospital.

"I don't really remember what happened at all," said Simpson, commenting that she lost consciousness very quickly.

Residence halls compete to conserve energy

By Catherine Scott
Collegian Staff

A rally was held yesterday on the Student Union steps to kick off MASSPIRG's campus-wide competition to see which residence hall can save the most energy in the next three weeks. The winning dorm will receive a prize after Spring Break.

Students braved the cold to hear experts speak about global warming, its effects and what can be done about it, while passers-by signed petitions in support of reducing UMass's global warming pollution.

Distinguished Geosciences Professor Ray Bradley explained with graphs the evidence that atmospheric carbon dioxide, a product of fossil fuels, has in the past 100 years gone off the charts to unnatural levels. Data has shown that this unnaturally increases temperature, thus forcing ecosystems and agricultural systems to try to adapt.

Though the impact is global, it is felt locally, said John Kochendorfer of the Environmental Institute at UMass. He explained how global warming is hurting New England's vibrant ski industries, how sea levels are rising, eroding our coasts and crops are growing earlier, meaning that more water will be needed to compensate for a longer growing season. Storms are also becoming more severe, endangering our dams, and heat waves are more intense, causing more "bad air days" to urban areas.

Although much of the effects of global warming are uncertain, what is certain, according to Engineering Professor Erin Baker, is that humans are changing the global climate and that long-term effects have the potential to be catastrophic. She focused on the importance of technological change such as advanced solar and wind energy, hydrogen batteries, nuclear fission and fusion and bioenergy, such as growing grains and grasses to burn them for fuel. All of these energy sources would reduce the greenhouse gases that pollute our atmosphere.

Contradicting the notion that alternative fuel sources would be harmful to our economy, expert economist Peter Scott spoke of the economic benefits of such technological change. He provided the example of the windmill industry in Denmark that began in the 1960s from a grassroots initiative and is now a billion-dollar industry that makes up 51 percent of the global market.

He also stated that although the United States makes up less than five percent of the world population, it has more than 25 percent of the world's carbon industries. One could argue that this is because the country is so wealthy; however, Western Europe's wealth is comparable to that of the United States, yet it has half as many carbon industries. Scott explained that this discrepancy may be attributed to the fact that Europe taxes energy much higher than the United States does, providing an incentive for businesses and individuals to conserve energy. If the United States had a higher energy tax, he said, perhaps its energy use would decrease and the tax breaks could be redistributed for energy research.

Campus energy educator Jason Burbank emphasized that we have options when it comes to energy conservation and that global change starts locally at UMass. That is where MASSPIRG comes in. As part of the Campus Climate Challenge to become as climate neutral as pos-

Massachusetts gubernatorial candidates meet

Lieutenant Governor Kerry Healey

Attorney General Tom Reilly

Former Clinton administration official, Deval Patrick

Businessman Christy Mihos

By Glen Johnson
Associated Press

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. — The four candidates running for governor held their first face-to-face meeting Wednesday, and their appearances before a biotechnology forum highlighted both their political strengths and weaknesses heading into the fall campaign.

Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey, Attorney General Tom Reilly, former Clinton administration official Deval Patrick and businessman Christy Mihos all pledged support for the members of the Massachusetts Biotechnology Council, but in their remarks and comments to reporters afterward, their differences were apparent.

Healey, a Republican running to succeed Gov. Mitt Romney, found herself busily trying to separate herself from the conservative administration of which she has been a part the past three years.

She agreed when a reporter asked her if the governor's recent support for a near virtual abortion ban in South Dakota was "disturbing," labeling herself "extremely pro-choice." She also told the audience of several hundred that she supported embryonic-stem cell research, even though Romney vetoed a bill last year that expanded it in Massachusetts.

"I am a part of the Romney administration, and as lieutenant governor or any member of the administration would, I needed to promote the administration's policy," Healey said later. "Now, as a candidate for governor, I can speak my own mind and, I think, the people are getting to know me better."

Reilly, once the Democratic front-runner in public opinion polls, resisted calls from Patrick, a fellow Democrat, for more and broader debates — despite advocating for them during his first race for attorney general. Instead, Reilly tried to cast the campaign as a two-person battle between him and Healey, accusing her and Romney of abandoning voters to pursue their own ideological or political agendas.

"What this state needs right now is a governor who is engaged," said Reilly. "I've been a hands-on attorney general, and I've been a hands-on district attorney. You're important and the growth of this industry is important enough. I'll be my own point person."

Like Reilly, Patrick highlighted his up-by-the-bootstraps life story. He also cast himself as a fresh-faced truth teller, saying "We need to face the plain facts that the same old thing from the same old players is not enough to move us forward tomorrow."

At the same time, he underscored his liberal credentials by supporting an array of social spending — as well as his opposition to tax rollbacks. Patrick said he favored spending on such initiatives as increasing commuter rail service to Worcester. He also said he supported the imposition of local meals taxes, while opposing Healey and Reilly's call for a reduction in the state income tax from 5.3 percent to five percent.

"If we are serious about sustaining this kind of investment and stimulating our economy, it is fiscally irresponsible today to roll back the income tax any further," he declared. "It does not add up."

Mihos, speaking a day before he planned to formally announce his candidacy, presented himself as a political outsider. The convenience store magnate commiserated with the businessmen about the challenges in building his Christy's Market chain, and he highlighted his efforts on behalf of the taxpayer when he was fired from the Massachusetts Turnpike Authority for opposing a doubling of tolls.

He displayed traits of a political newcomer, making off-color jokes, stopping his speech after his throat became parched and acknowledging his lack of understanding of some state issues.

Nonetheless, he pledged total support for the political agenda of the Massachusetts Biotechnology Council, which advocates on behalf of life sciences companies. Former House Speaker Thomas Finneran serves as the council's president and moderated the discussion.

Iraq grows closer to possibility of civil war

By Bushra Juhi
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — The sectarian cleansing that drove 68-year-old Abbas al-Saedi from his home may be as alarming a sign of a country on the brink of civil war as the killings that have swept Iraq in the past week.

Masked gunmen carrying rocket-propelled grenade launchers and automatic rifles kicked down the gate at his house, fired into the air and told the Shiite he had 48 hours to get his family out of the predominantly Sunni neighborhood in west Baghdad.

Al-Saedi's story, a tale of fear and desperation told to The Associated Press on Wednesday, represents a growing phenomenon of religious cleansing in which members of each Muslim sect are driving the others from neighborhoods where they have long lived side by side.

The practice, which has been going on for some time in neighborhoods south of Baghdad, is a barometer of the degree to which the Shiites and Sunnis have moved on the path to civil war. The number of incidents cannot be fully gauged, but is not yet at the level of mass expulsions of the kind that took place in the Balkans during the civil war there in the 1990s.

I've their part, Sunnis have long-standing claims of attacks by Shiite-dominated and, some say, government-linked death squads and eviction from homes in the very neighborhoods now being occupied by Shiites displaced from Sunni areas.

Abdul-Salam al-Kubaisi, a spokesman for the powerful Sunni clerical Association of Muslim Scholars, urged both communities to stop reprisal attacks and end evictions.

"The association calls on Shiites who left their houses out of fear ... to return to their homes," he said Wednesday. "Likewise, we implore our Shiite brothers to stop pushing

Policeman sustains leg wound

BILLERICA, Mass. (AP) — A Tewksbury police officer was shot Wednesday during a struggle with a man accused of robbing a convenience store.

The officer sustained what was described as a "superficial wound" to his leg, said Tewksbury police Chief Al Donovan. He was taken to an area hospital, where he was being treated.

Two other officers also suffered minor injuries during the arrest of Joseph Croteau, who led police on a chase in two towns after allegedly robbing a Mobil station store.

The incident began in Lowell shortly before 11 a.m. when police say Croteau stole a van that someone had left running outside a gas station.

Croteau then drove to Tewksbury, police said, and walked into a gas station, jumped over the counter and grabbed money out of the cash register, Donovan said.

At 11:23 a.m. police received a 911 call about a robbery. Croteau drove off in a blue van and was pursued by police from the Tewksbury, then Billerica police departments.

Bush makes surprise visit to Afghanistan

U.S. President George Bush and Afghani President Hamid Karzai speak during a press conference at the Presidential Palace in Kabul, Afghanistan. Yesterday marked the first time Bush has visited Afghanistan since the fall of the Taliban.

BY TERENCE HUNT
ASSOCIATED PRESS

KABUL, Afghanistan — In a surprise visit under extraordinary security, President Bush expressed unwavering confidence Wednesday that Osama bin Laden will be captured despite years of fruitless manhunts for the elusive terrorist leader who ran training camps in Afghanistan and plotted the deadly attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Bush ordered Air Force One, on a flight to India, to make a secret detour to this war-scarred country to show U.S. support for the fledgling democracy led by President Hamid Karzai, whose authority has been weakened by suicide bombings and rising violence by insurgents.

There are more than 18,000 U.S. forces in Afghanistan, and Bush said their mission was "to help this new democracy not only survive but to flourish."

The president, who once boasted bin Laden would be taken "dead or alive," said the fugitive terrorist would not elude the United States forever. Bin Laden and Taliban leader Mullah Omar were driven into hiding by the U.S.-led invasion of Afghanistan after 9/11. They are believed to be in the rugged Pakistan-Afghan border region.

"It's not a matter of if they're captured and brought to justice," Bush said at a news conference with Karzai at the war-battered presidential palace. "It's when they're brought to justice."

Eight weeks in the planning, Bush's visit to Afghanistan was not announced in advance to reduce chances of an assassination attempt. Heavily armed combat assault teams shadowed Bush's moves. Door-gunners on at least two helicopters fired brief bursts of bullets down at the dusty flatlands not far from Bagram Air Base as they ferried the president's entourage into town.

A U.S. military spokesman, Lt. Col. Paul Fitzpatrick, said the gunners on the choppers were test-firing their weapons.

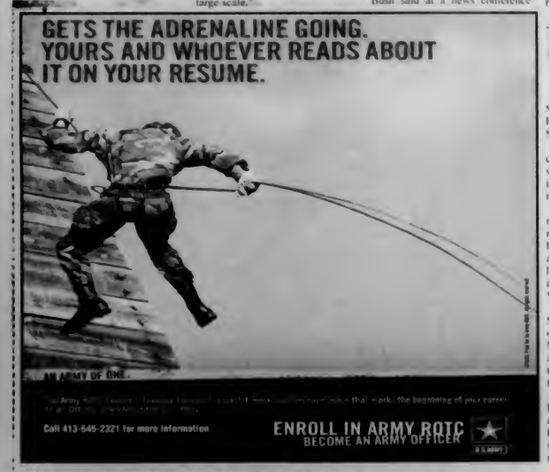
"It is standard operating procedure for the MH-47 helicopter to test-fire their mini-guns over East River Range every time they fly in mission," he said. "Neither President Bush nor any of the aircraft in the flight were ever in any danger."

Streets were locked down and there was a heavy show of security along Bush's brief motorcade route. There was no other traffic. At one intersection, pedestrians gawked from behind military and security forces.

It was Bush's second visit to a war front, after his secret 2003 trip to Iraq to visit with U.S. troops at Thanksgiving.

Karzai said Afghanistan owes the United States "a great, great deal in this country's rebuilding — peace, democracy, the strong steps toward the future."

Bush said Karzai's government, which has allowed young girls to attend school, is one that believes in hope — "which is the exact opposite of the ideology of the bin Ladens of the world and the Taliban."



Bush said he also would remind Musharraf about the need to capture bin Laden and Omar. "It's important that we bring these people to justice," Bush said. "He (Musharraf) understands that. After all, they've tried to kill him four times."

As Bush arrived in South Asia, Pakistani security forces struck a militant training camp near the Afghan border, killing three dozen fighters, including a Chechen commander linked to al-Qaida, an army official said. Pakistan, a key U.S. ally in the war against terror that has deployed thousands of troops to fight militants, has denied in the past that arrests of militants are timed to coincide with events.

Violence in Afghanistan increased 20 percent last year, the Defense Intelligence Agency said this week. About 1,600 people were killed in violence last year, including 91 U.S. troops. There have been 25 suicide bombings in the past four months.

It was Bush's first visit to Afghanistan although his wife, Laura, and Vice President Dick Cheney both have visited before. The first lady joined her husband Musharraf about it when he sees him in Islamabad.

"I absolutely will bring up the cross-border infiltrations with President Musharraf," Bush said. "These infiltrations are causing harm to friend, allies and cause harm to U.S. troops."

Sunnis out of their homes, which has been going on for two years" in some Shiite neighborhoods in Baghdad.

But al-Kubaisi's words offered no comfort to the newly evicted al-Saiedi, who — along with a big extended family — was threatened with death Friday night.

"They told me that we have from now till tomorrow to leave, and if they returned tomorrow and found us still here they would slaughter everyone," al-Saiedi said, the sun glistening off his white beard as he stood in front of a house the family was moving into Wednesday.

That home in the predominantly Shiite north Baghdad neighborhood of Shula was provided by the Sadrist Movement of radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr and may once have belonged to Sunnis, although it was impossible to find out.

Now it's in the hands of al-Saiedi, his four sons and their families who had all lived together in the Risala neighborhood in Baghdad's Abu Ghraib suburb, which gives its name to the notorious prison there.

"We don't know why this is happening to us," al-Saiedi said. "There is no point. There is no difference between Sunnis and Shiites. The politicians have created these divisions. Let them take Iraq's wealth, that's what they want. But let the people live in peace."

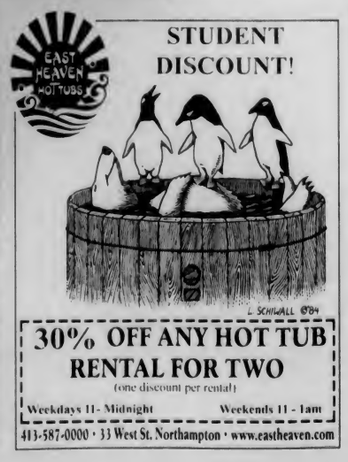
Other Shiite families ousted from homes in predominantly Sunni areas were less fortunate and found lodgings in partially built homes, mosques and a government youth club.

The Sadrists claimed they knew of 300 Shiite families now in Baghdad looking for places to live after fleeing their old neighborhoods. Many had received a flier that read:

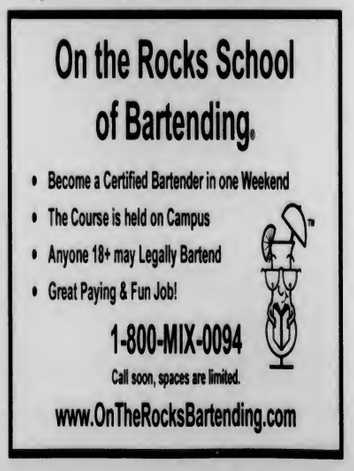
"To you traitors and the spies who live in this area we give you 48 hours to leave or to be killed." The notes were signed by a previously unknown group that called itself the Brigade for Cleansing the Land of the Two Rivers.

Sunni radicals view Shiites as collaborators with American forces because the majority sect has taken power from the minority Sunnis who held favored status under the ousted Saddam Hussein, himself a Sunni.

Some believe Iraq began a final slide toward civil war after the Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra, 60 miles north of Baghdad. The attack spawned days of reprisals that damaged or destroyed dozens of mosques and killed about 400 people.



Many of the Shiites who fled their homes in the meantime have ended up in the Shula neighborhood with the al-Saiedi family. Seven other newly arrived families were taking shelter in the weight training and wrestling halls in the Shula youth club.



Donated sacks of sugar, rice and flour were piled at the door of the club under a banner welcoming the refugees. Crowding inside one hall were four families all from the same tribe, each occupying a corner fitted out with new beds. There was no luggage because the families fled Tarmiya, about 20 miles north of Baghdad, leaving behind all they owned.

For two decades they had lived in that town, where 80 percent of the residents were Sunni. The men worked at a brick factory, and all the families lived in the factory residential compound.

Their troubles began at 6 p.m. Friday when two Opel sedans drove into the factory grounds and three masked gunmen stepped out holding RPGs and automatic rifles.

Employers say felonies hurt opportunities

BY ELIZABETH COOK
MINNESOTA DAILY (U. MINNESOTA)

MINNEAPOLIS — Flashing lights illuminate the side of the house, police file out of their cars and some students are given minor consumption citations. It's a common weekend scene in Dinkytown that some might think can hurt their chances of employment.

First-year University of Minnesota student Melissa Ritter discovered an option to clear her record when she was ticketed with minor consumption in the third week of September. Along with the citation was information about the restorative justice program, a chance to erase the incident from her record.

Having a criminal record could affect future employment, depending on the severity of the crime. But most employers interviewed said they aren't as concerned about misdemeanor crimes as they are about felonies.

Nonetheless, Ritter decided to go through the restorative justice program in November to erase the charge from her record and to save money by not paying the fine. Instead, she did eight hours of community service.

This way, future employers will see an unblemished record.

Daniel Haas, the assistant manager of Noodles and Company, said the company does background checks — on which a misdemeanor would show up — on all employees for safety purposes.

Haas said during the checks they look for more serious offenses, like theft or any type of behavioral issues. But if someone has many misdemeanors, it could affect their hiring.

In some jobs, every misdemeanor counts. The Army does an extensive background check, said Capt. Valent Bernat III. If anything comes up, it must be cleared through a waiver.

Every offense — even juvenile ones — show up, Bernat said. If it's something like minor consumption, the waiver can be issued in the recruiting office through an interview, Bernat said.

But if it's something like theft, the waiver process is more extensive and not automatic.

Eighty-five percent of Army jobs require security clearance; if a person has a felony conviction, they will not get cleared, Bernat said. But they could still find other employment with the Army.

Besides waivers for military jobs and the restorative justice program for livability crimes, there are other ways to get a conviction erased, said University Student Legal Service Director Mark Karon.

One way is through expungement, Karon said, which seals the record through a court order.

This is easier to do when it's a lesser offense, but in some cases it can be done in more serious offenses, like assault, Karon said.

Certain employers won't hire a person if he or she has been convicted of certain offenses, he said.

For example, drug charges would impact a job in nursing or the medical field and theft, swindle or fraud would affect the law field.

Dishonesty crimes also can affect banking jobs, said Richele Messick, a Wells Fargo representative.

Footage shows Bush was warned of disaster

One of the broken levees that allowed the flooding of the ninth ward of New Orleans. New video footage has shown that the Bush administration was warned about the potential for the levees to break during the storm.

WASHINGTON — In dramatic and sometimes agonizing terms, federal disaster officials warned President Bush and his homeland security chief before Hurricane Katrina struck that the storm could breach levees, put lives at risk in New Orleans' Superdome and overwhelm rescuers, according to confidential video footage.

Bush didn't ask a single question during the final briefing before Katrina struck on Aug. 29, but he assured soon-to-be-battered state officials: "We are fully prepared."

The footage — along with seven days of transcripts of briefings obtained by The Associated Press — show in excruciating detail that while federal officials anticipated the tragedy that unfolded in New Orleans and elsewhere along the Gulf Coast, they were fatally slow to realize they had not mustered enough resources to deal with the unprecedented disaster.

Linked by secure video, Bush's confidence on Aug. 28 starkly contrasts with the dire warnings his disaster chief and a cacophony of federal, state and local officials provided during the four days before the storm.

A top hurricane expert voiced "grave concerns" about the levees and then-Federal Emergency Management Agency chief Michael Brown told the president and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff that he feared there weren't enough disaster teams to help evacuees at the Superdome.

"I'm concerned about ... their ability to respond to a catastrophe within a catastrophe," Brown told his bosses the afternoon before Katrina made landfall.

Some of the footage and transcripts from briefings Aug. 25-31 conflicts with the defenses that federal, state and local officials have made in trying to deflect blame and minimize the political fallout from the failed Katrina response:

—Homeland Security officials have said the "fog of war" blinded them early on to the magnitude of the disaster. But the video and transcripts show federal and local officials discussed threats clearly, reviewed long-made plans and understood Katrina would wreak devastation of historic proportions. "I'm sure it will be the top 10 or 15 when all is said and done," National Hurricane Center's Max Mayfield warned the day Katrina lashed the Gulf Coast.

"I don't buy the 'fog of war' defense," Brown told the AP in an interview Wednesday. "It was a fog of bureaucracy."

—Bush declared four days after the storm, "I don't think anybody anticipated the breach of the levees" that gushed deadly flood waters into New Orleans. But the transcripts and video show there was plenty of talk about that possibility — and Bush was worried too.

White House deputy chief of staff Joe Hagin, Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Blanco and Brown discussed fears of a levee breach the day the storm hit.

"I talked to the president twice today, once in Crawford and then again on Air Force One," Brown said. "He's obviously watching the television a lot, and he had some questions about the Dome, he's asking questions about reports of breaches."

Louisiana officials angrily blamed the federal government for not being prepared but the transcripts shows they were still praising FEMA as the storm roared toward the Gulf Coast and even two days afterward. "I think a lot of the planning FEMA has done with us the past year has really paid off," Col. Jeff Smith, Louisiana's emergency preparedness deputy director, said during the Aug. 28 briefing.

It wasn't long before Smith and other state officials sounded overwhelmed.

"We appreciate everything that you all are doing for us, and all I would ask is that you realize that what's going on and the sense of urgency needs to be ratcheted up," Smith said Aug. 30.

Mississippi begged for more attention in that same briefing.

"We know that there are tens or hundreds of thousands of people in Louisiana that need to be rescued, but we would just ask you, we desperately need to get our share of assets because we'll have people dying — not because of water coming up, but because we can't get them medical treatment in our affected counties," said a Mississippi state official whose name was not mentioned on the tape.

Video footage of the Aug. 28 briefing, the final one before Katrina struck, showed an intense Brown voicing concerns from the government's disaster operation center and imploring colleagues to do whatever was necessary to help victims.

"We're going to need everything that we can possibly muster, not only in this state and in the region, but the nation, to respond to this event," Brown warned. He called the storm "a bad one, a big one" and implored federal agencies to cut through red tape to help people, bending rules if necessary.

"Go ahead and do it," Brown said. "I'll figure out some way to justify it. ... Just let them yell at me."

Bush appeared from a narrow, windowless room at his vacation ranch in Texas, with his elbows on a table. Hagin was sitting alongside him. Neither asked questions in the Aug. 28 briefing.

"I want to assure the folks at the state level that we are fully prepared to not only help you during the storm, but we will move in whatever resources and assets we have at our disposal after the storm," the president said.

A relaxed Chertoff, sporting a polo shirt, weighed in from Washington at Homeland Security's operations center. He would later fly to Atlanta, outside of Katrina's reach, for a bird flu event.

One snippet captures a missed opportunity on Aug. 28 for the government to have dispatched active-duty military troops to the region to augment the National Guard.

Chertoff: "Are there any DOD assets that might be available? Have we reached out to them?"

Brown: "We have DOD assets over here at FOC (emergency operations center). They are fully engaged. And we are having those discussions with them now."

Chertoff: "Good job."

In fact, active duty troops weren't dispatched until days after the storm. And many states' National Guards had yet to be deployed to the region despite offers of assistance, and it took days before the Pentagon deployed active-duty personnel to help overwhelmed Guardsmen.

The National Hurricane Center's Mayfield told the final briefing before Katrina struck that storm models predicted minimal flooding inside New Orleans during the hurricane but he expressed concerns that counterclockwise winds and storm surges afterward could cause the levees at Lake Pontchartrain to be overrun.

"I don't think any model can tell you with any confidence right now whether the levees will be topped or not but that is obviously a very, very grave concern," Mayfield told the briefing.

Student and soldier life

Jennifer Lane

Sweat is beading off of your face; it is 103 degrees outside. It's February. You've just gone through another training session. You accidentally killed a civilian and you're wounded. The big red blotches on your camis represent real blood. The grenade launcher you're carrying is your weapon, and you're part of an amazing team.

Finally, you and the boys take orders and walk back to the PX for a drink before bed. Although the boys are great and this is what you've always wanted, you cannot wait to go home. There are only two weeks left before you leave and you're excited to see your family, girlfriend and buddies.

Finally, you get to leave. Your family, girl and your best friend are waiting for you at the gate. You haven't seen them in a month, but it seems like so much longer. You have a very long nap when you get home and a few short talks with the folks when you wake up in the morning.

Your grandfather and friends have prepared a coming home/leaving for Iraq party for you the next day. There is prime rib, potatoes and more good food than you have seen in a month on the table in front of you. That night, you get to party in the pits like old times and say goodbye to a few friends, because you're not entirely sure when, or if, you'll be coming home.

The life of a solider is a double life. One part of you is part of a team. You cry in blood and wake in sweat. The other part has an amazing girlfriend at home who writes you letters everyday. You also have a mom who sends food, and a friend and his girl who send letters and cigarettes. These are the people and packages that keep you going.

With the earth spinning at 1,038 mph, how can you slow down?

It's February, and you're freezing cold. You're working hard to get straight A's. You've been in your room all night studying and haven't seen much of anyone in the last week, or maybe month; you can't remember. You talk to your mom and tell her everything is OK, which isn't the whole truth. You tell your boyfriend you miss him and send him to bed only to start working again. You're lonely. You miss your friends, in so many ways.

Spring break — you get to go home. You're excited because you haven't seen your family in a few weeks. You get to eat some home-cooked meals, shop with mom and see your boyfriend. Your best friend calls and you go out. You talk about your weeks since winter break. You've missed her, and when she leaves you're lonely again.

With so many people around us, how can we be so alone?

You're too young for this; you're working about 60-hour weeks. You just got home from work. You're exhausted. You have to go to the gym in about half an hour. You need to check your e-mail and weed through all of the junk to find the important pictures your best friend sent you. You have an extra meeting after the gym so you need a shower, and you need to find time for dinner.

Another day of work drains you. It's almost time for your monthly visit home. You hate it and love it at the same time. It's a time to revamp, but sometimes it can get hectic at home. You want to check in on everyone and watch at least two television shows with your little brother. Maybe a home-cooked meal or a meal that isn't a Ziploc bag of carrots will be good for once.

Another day of work drains you. It's almost time for your monthly visit home. You hate it and love it at the same time. It's a time to revamp, but sometimes it can get hectic at home. You want to check in on everyone and watch at least two television shows with your little brother.

With so much routine, when is there time for spontaneity?

No matter how you look at it, our society has gotten out of control. No one knows who they are anymore, and there are a lot of pessimistic attitudes walking around.

During the 1940s and 1950s, everything was carefree and wonderful. The war was over, and the baby boom began. Every theatrical production had huge dresses and bright, beautiful colors to represent the love and optimistic point of view everyone had. What has happened to that world? It was a time where people didn't have to step lightly around politically correct issues, when America was the greatest thing since sliced bread and divorce rates were only 2.6 per 1,000 people (versus today, 4.0/1,000 people) according to census data.

The world spins so quickly. We only have so much time, and we need to spend it wisely. The soldier needs to do his duty and come home as safely and quickly as possible. The loner needs to branch out and find a way to network and enjoy life again. The workaholic needs to find the spice of life. The clouds look like they're spinning so slowly.

It looks and seems like you have the time of your life, but you never know. You could be on autopilot and take for granted the idea that there's always tomorrow, when, in fact, you don't actually know. Hold on to what you have, and try to find your own meaning to life, because you never know how much time you have left.

College dream not for everyone

Just as the high school diploma alone amounts to the difference between fry cook and greeter at Burger King, I fear that, in five years or so, an undergraduate degree will have shed more pounds than Lindsay Lohan and the Olsen twins combined.

Michael Toomey

Continuing one's education beyond that pimply, "cliquey" nightmare that is secondary school has become a fixture in the everyman's prescription for success, despite their general aversion to cerebral thought. Infesting institutions of higher learning, students with absolutely no propensity for anything academic or intellectual stare blankfaced at the walls, repeating the affirmation, "I can't wait 'til the weekend."

These rather hapless young people waste millions of dollars each year, out of the pockets of parents in denial and often begrudging taxpayers, when they could and probably should be doing something vastly different. From the perspective of a relatively focused, driven young man I find the omnipresent flock of disengaged, disinterested kids to be severely irritating.

I've always experienced frustrated obligation as being palpable, which becomes burdensome when the closing words of a professor are trampled under the din of rustling backpacks and putting on of jackets, and intelligent contributions elicit a small scattering of groans. Completing high school is virtually a legal requirement and so the resentful behavior is par for the course and understandable, but technically no one binds you to attend a college or university. As academia is slowly, but surely, being jettisoned, the college experience is becoming a continuation of high school, where learning is trivially incidental to the reason you showed up.

I'd guess up to 75 percent of students trudged through high school and are continuing to drag themselves through four more years (if they make it that far). MTV's Spring Break and other documentations of college partying don't bode well for critics of my theory of diluted higher learning, as only in an alternate universe would bright young people join in a mass exodus to stumble foreign streets with their linguistic capabilities reduced to "Wooooo." There's probably unfortunate but overwhelming validity to the idea that college is a chance to engage in reckless, stupid behavior on your parents' dime. Further schooling seems suited to combat this level of irresponsibility.

However, reasonable decisions are more often than not correlated to a certain level of maturity the average college student apparently has yet to reach. Note that most students become prickly when the virtue of their attendance is questioned. They will insist they have concrete goals to achieve, although their goals loiter somewhere behind checking their Myspace and obtaining illegal booze.

This perhaps suggests our educational system isn't set up appropriately; it's very linear and it seems that development is not, but what I'd identify as the monkey wrench in having schools of learners is this strange emphasis we have on being intellectual. Our operative assumption as humans is that life is something to be "figured" and the more potential you have for figuring, the higher your chances are for success.

There's certainly plenty of evidence to support that there are certain benefits to being intellectually well-off, but there's also a whole lot of proof that falling in the average range isn't so horrible. A simple life of acceptance and assimilation works fine for most of us, but this phrase usually rings offensive because of our allegiance to being brainy.

Simplicity is inadequate; everyone should address the complexities of our chaotic planet, coming up with helpful and profound contributions to our understanding of it. The truth of the matter is that most people are not thinkers. Again, this reads as very politically incorrect, but it's the honest truth. There's nothing wrong with having primary concerns of good home, good food and good loving, but we like to tell ourselves otherwise.

We crown intellectualism as being a desirable trait because it's a rare one. Americans love to be unique and one-of-a-kind, and we want everyone to appreciate us for how special we are. This is by all means a relatable desire, but we go a tad overboard in trying to ensure our slice of uniqueness.

The college dream simply isn't for everyone. Very few of us are inclined towards academic learning, but the external pressure to harness coveted intellect is too strong. Many simple folk resist, resulting in a lot of placid-minded young adults creating an ironically bothersome stir in too many of our classrooms.

When a person is out of his element, he can be direfully bored, he can be frustrated, he can be resentful, all because he's not on the dominant wavelength. I've experienced all these feelings at a jazz show, and although some connoisseurs of improv music may disagree, I'm not at fault for not getting jazz, nor are the musicians, nor is the audience.

It just doesn't fit in with the person I am. Maybe if everyone was giving me their two cents ("Mike, jazz is incredible, buddy; it's the real deal, man"), I might give a second listen. I might even convince myself jazz is great stuff, but I would have been conditioned into holding that opinion; it didn't originate from my own personal leanings.

So, in this way, conditioning has eventuated in the thinning numbers of real students in colleges and universities around the country. Excellent potential farmhands are wasting away in literature classes, talented bricklayers are toiling in statistic courses and I have a feeling this guy in my social psychology class probably makes the best Whopper the world has yet to taste.

Our fruitless stress on being the soaring eagle in all respects is keeping these kids away from their true callings, and deteriorating the quality of my classes as well. A no win situation, really. So my request, however unfeasible it may seem, is for all of us to get to know ourselves a little better, and own exactly what we find. Save your families thousands, pack up and head out towards your destiny and away from those pesky books.

Is military source for gaming?

Jon Brandt

Years from now, our kids and grandkids will play video games so realistic they won't be able to tell the difference between the game and the world outside their rooms. How sad it will be when games like "Tetris," "Pacman" and "Sonic" are forgotten.

As more and more people buy the new Xbox 360, fewer and fewer remember the classics from Sega Genesis, Nintendo and Game Boy. Almost every guy on campus has some sort of video game system in their dorm. Whether it's Playstation 2, Xbox or some computer game, everyone can enjoy a break from work. Despite the fact that our parents might have warned us not to play too much, our generation showed them all by sticking it out, and now here we are in college. We made it, Mom.

Never mind the fact that old games like "Tetris" and "Pacman" could be tedious and redundant. They were fun. You could play them for hours, and even though your eyesight might have suffered, you had a good time.

Today's games are as complex as they are graphic. I'm not complaining. I love shooter games as much as any other guy, but when you take a step back and look around, you realize some things. "Tetris" and "Pacman" helped us in problem solving. They were simple but they got us thinking.

"Sonic," "NBA Jam" and any other sports game created an atmosphere that made sleepovers fun and got all the friends involved. Today, many video games are one player and involve blowing the crap out of people. Desensitization is a part of our society. A five-year-old has probably already seen a million ads for beer and Viagra just from watching a season of football with his dad.

You really need to wonder who's behind it all. It might be some master plan the military has been working on for years. Get to the kids young, and by the time they're old enough to enlist they're expert shooters and have no problem with killing people; they've already killed hundreds in a game. If flight simulators can teach you the basics of flying, why wouldn't the shooter games teach you the basics of killing?

Get to the kids young, and by the time they're old enough to enlist they're expert shooters and have no problem with killing people; they've already killed hundreds in a game. If flight simulators can teach you the basics of flying, why wouldn't the shooter games teach you the basics of killing?

I know what you're thinking. There were plenty of games that had violence and killing when we were kids. "Mortal Kombat," "Street Fighter" and many more taught kids that fighting was acceptable as long as there was a good finishing move.

At the risk of sounding hypocritical, those games were different. You might have been fighting and impaling someone, but those games are not realistic. They are classics, and even today they generate attention whenever someone has them.

If you have a Sega Genesis or Nintendo in your room, everyone wants to play. Whole floors would cram into a tiny corner room if they could. It's a social event that everyone enjoys. No one wants to sit around and watch someone play a one-person shooter game. It might be realistic and have great graphics, but the only person that cares is the kid playing all alone in his room.

The classics are dying off. It's getting harder and harder to find the old game consoles and games that we grew up with. As they get older, they break, and unfortunately they will not be produced anymore. If you look on eBay you might be able to find a good deal including a system and some games for around $20.

However, one day they will all be gone, and all we'll have left are the memories of those games we grew up with. Imagine the look on our kids' faces when we try to explain why "Pacman" was awesome. The era of the arcade is already gone, and soon the era of 16-bit graphics will be as well. When you get the new Xbox 360 and play the game with explosions and killing, try to remember that you used to have fun playing "Mario Brothers."

NBC's tragedy in Turin

The Olympics are supposed to be athletics in their purest form — the stainless steel of human competition, glory for country over glory for self, sport instead of Sport, but the camaraderie, the reverence and the national anthem-singing purity have merely become an illusion. That illusion was the reason we were glued to NBC and its affiliates for two weeks. It's the reason we stood and cheered for athletes whose names we didn't even know. It's the reason United States curler Pete Fenson had the ability to give us goose bumps, even though he's just a pizza shop owner with an interesting hobby, or so I thought.

Matt Brochu

Apparently, I was the only one watching. While American skiers and skaters were competing head-to-head and losing, so was NBC. In previous Olympics, NBC had surrendered a total of four half-hours to competing networks, but Nielsen Media Research recently revealed that the nightly Olympic ratings had dropped 30 percent since the last non-American Winter Games. In the end, the games were just another tiny Japanese village for "American Idol," Fox's media Godzilla, to slash and burn.

That's right, a collection of the world's greatest winter athletes lost out to Simon, Paula and Randy. Then again, a live sex tape starring Jake Gyllenhaal and Jessica Alba could be simultaneously broadcast on NBC with the birth of Angelina Jolie's baby, and "Idol's" ratings still wouldn't suffer.

In all its ridiculousness, "American Idol" has almost attained religious status in our backward society, to the point where I wouldn't be surprised if 50 years from now, Americans end up burning down the Danish Embassy for publishing cartoon images of Ryan Seacrest in a major newspaper.

Who could blame the American public? Winning a gold medal is merely one of the few, undeniable, irrefutable assurances that allow someone to say, "At this particular moment, I am better than everyone else in the world at what I do."

Winning American Idol, on the other hand, allows someone to say, "At this particular moment, I am infintely more famous than I will ever be again." Then again, it can also mean, "I need gastric bypass surgery," or "I had sex with Paula Abdul," or, "Put down that cue card. It's not like I can read it." That, my friends, is must-see TV.

Sure, one would think that if 34 million viewers derived so much enjoyment from watching wannabe musicians perform songs they didn't even write, they would all just suck it up and buy season one of the "Ashlee Simpson Show" on eBay for $3.75. But no, they tuned into "American Idol" and tuned out the Olympics instead.

In their defense, many blamed the Internet's ability to bring Turin to our computer screens, as realtime results were merely a mouse click away. This argument isn't without merit. If MTV posted highlights of Randy's critique on Kellie Pickler's rendition of "Kiss Me" by Sixpence None the Richer seven hours prior to airtime ("a little pitchy, dawg"), would anyone outside of Albemarle, N.C. watch? Probably not.

Others blamed the lack of viewers on the fact that Olympic coverage is downright cheesy at times, as it seems that all athletes win their medals for anyone and everyone but themselves. It has almost become impossible to watch for more than 10 consecutive minutes without being bombarded by a montage (set to the "Rudy" theme) chronicling a Somalian ski jumper who won gold on the 12th anniversary of the freak gasoline fight accident that claimed the life of his cousin, Frank.

Even those who did watch the Games pointed an angry finger at the overexposure and underachievement of America's high-profile athletes. Speed skater Apollo Ohno? Sure, he won, but real Americans don't rock the soul patch. Figure skater Johnny Weir? Not nearly enough Will, and a little too much Grace. Snowboarder Shaun White? Goofy, Fakie and McTwist aren't Olympic-caliber maneuvers, they were characters on "DuckTales."

Then there's Bode Miller, a man whose name seemed destined to be spoken in the same breath as Eric Heiden, Mark Spitz and Jack Bauer. He's a natural, a skiing savant. He's the anomaly who goes out to McMurphy's the night before his physiology final, reels in Kina from "Road Rules," subsequently ditches her on Club Sidewalk, finds his way home only to pass out in his laundry basket, stumbles into Thompson halfway through the test and waltzes out with an A.

Say what you want about Bode. Call him a punch line. Call him the great white hype. Call him a waste of talent, a waste of space, a waste of Red Bull and Kettle One, but you're lying if you claim not to wonder what it would be like to occupy his body for just one moment. That moment directly after he reaches the summit of some secluded slope in the Alps, as he comes to the realization that, although only five people on the mountain may be talented enough to negotiate the trail at his feet, only one person is stupid enough to try.

That moment requires no Olympic victories for validation, and if we could experience it just once, we probably wouldn't care about gold medals either. It's not like we cared enough to watch in the first place.

Head Automatica cuts up Axis Nightclub

By DAVID PESSAH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The crowd at the Axis Nightclub Saturday night was anxious for Head Automatica to take the stage. Kids decked out in black T-shirts, hooded sweatshirts or the occasional Mohawk jumped up and down, fidgeted or just started at the stage waiting for the moment to come.

The venue was small and dark, and the floor was a square pit — standing room only.

Filled back from the stage. Trying to push your way to the front of the crowd wasn't an option at this point, you would just be met with cold shoulders and dirty glares. Your best plan of attack would have been to get as close as possible and wait for the pit to start, then you could jump your way to the front. Head Automatica is all loud guitars and big beats, so there would be mayhem as soon as the band took the stage, right?

Wrong. Lead singer Daryl Palumbo strolls slowly to the front of the stage in a black winter parka, complete with the fur-ringed hood, microphone in hand. He walks to front center and begins singing a capella. "What's a girl like you ... doing in a place like this?" The band saunters on stage slowly. Then Daryl snaps to, pumps his fist in the air, the lights flash and we are full force in "At the Speed of a Yellow Bullet," the opening track of "Decadence," the band's only album. If you know how to handle yourself in the pit, you are now front and center, a great place to witness the excellent hour and a half set that was to follow.

If you don't know anything about Head Automatica, you should. But here's a quick briefing. The band is a combination of Daryl, singer of the semi-hardcore band Glassjaw, and Dan "the Automator" Nakamura, producer of The Gorillaz and other rap-ish artists. The music they made together for "Decadence" — along with a guitarist, bassist and keyboarder — is two parts punk, two parts hip-hop and completely drenched in clever and sexual lyrics and themes. It's a party record.

And this show was a party, with Daryl as the coolest kid in the house. After the introduction, he lost the parka and gained some swagger, pacing around the stage with a half-punk, half-gangster walk that fit his music. "At the Speed of a Yellow Bullet" was followed quickly by "Brooklyn is Burning." The crowd jumped and screamed with their singer as he sang, "I got-I got what the people want." As the song neared the end, "Boston" replaced "Brooklyn" in the burning, and the crowd ate it up.

Then he let it leak. Head Automatica just finished their new album, titled "Popaganda." He launched into "Curious," one of the five songs the band would play from the forthcoming album. They were received well by the crowd, despite being slightly slower and more melodic than the "Decadence" songs.

The crowd's favorite of these — and it seemed to be Daryl's, too — was the sonically destructive "Oxycontin." As fast as Taking Back Sunday's "The Union" and as dirty as The Used's "Take it Away," the new song is destined to be a fan favorite on the album and at shows. If you got pushed out of the front, it was the song to get you back there.

The rest of the set before the encore was "Decadence" live. Almost every song from the album was played — sadly, "King Ceaser" was not — and played to perfection. Daryl never lost his swagger. "You killed it in Buffalo," one fan yelled. "F yeah, we killed it in Buffalo," Daryl called back. "We killed it on every fing stop on this tour, bitches." And he said it with a smile. If all the shows were like Saturday's at the Axis, this was definitely a true story.

A punk show doesn't bring your standard cutesy couples. This didn't have Dashboard show people. Here at the Axis, couples danced and made out with each other as they sang to each other, "Let me anoint the lust inside you/let me devalue what's inside you," from "Please, Please, Please." Ahh, true love.

Then came the encore. Everybody in the crowd knew Head Automatica had some hip-hop influences, but no one expected this. Cage, a white underground rapper, came on stage and performed "Shoot Frank," a song he and Daryl had recently completed together.

As Cage rapped and Daryl sang the hook and a verse to a dark RJD2 beat, it was the polar opposite of the jumping, screaming, mosh pit that had taken place minutes before. And everybody complied and "raised their C's in the air" with their hands and nodded their head as Cage jumped down into the crowd to rap directly to the people.

And this was Head Automatica. To a newcomer, none of it would have made sense. Punk, parkas, rapping? But to Head Automatica fans, this was completely normal. Never one to be pegged into one genre or style, the group is set to blow up with the release of "Popaganda" in May.

Daryl has the utmost confidence in this prediction. After all, at the end of the show, he posed a question to the crowd. "Are you the meat?" he screamed as his band played a dark instrumental. "Or are you the butcher?" Then, he screamed, positioned center-stage, staring straight into the crowd, "'Cause I am the butcher." The message was clear. Head Automatica will cut into our lives.

'The envelope, please...': Hollywood gets ready for its big night

Phillip Seymour Hoffman is nominated for Best Actor for his outstanding performance as writer Truman Capote in Bennett Miller's "Capote."

By JOE PIEMONTE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

With just days to go before the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences presents its 78th annual Academy Awards, Oscar pundits and bloggers around the world have been posting their predictions. "For Your Consideration" ads have been appearing in all of the industry publications since the nominations were announced on January 31st, and everything comes down to the big show on Sunday night. If "love is a force of nature," as high-profile nominee "Brokeback Mountain" suggests, will the groundbreaking film ride into the sunset with a trunk full or statues? Will the racial relations "Crash" examines resonate with voters? Or will "Munich," being touted as Spielberg's most personal work to date, win the big prize?

2005 was a year that smaller films were recognized by the Academy, with none but one of the Best Picture nominees coming from a major studio. The most controversial film of the year, "Brokeback Mountain," is also the most nominated film of the year, with eight nominations, including nods in every major category except Best Actress. The intense Los Angeles-centered racial drama "Crash" picked up six nominations, including Best Picture, as did the 1950s newsroom drama "Good Night, and Good Luck." "Capote," "Memoirs of a Geisha," "Munich" and "Walk the Line" all came away with five nominations.

So what does it all boil down to? A whole lot, actually. Winning a major Academy award can not only boost the career of its recipient, but it will also help the film, whether it is at the box office or on DVD. Out of the 110 nominees, only 24 of them will walk out of the Kodak Theater on Sunday night victorious. Who will it be? It's anyone's guess until the envelopes are opened, but here's a rundown on the top eight categories. The only person guaranteed victorious? Robert Altman, he's receiving the lifetime achievement award from the Academy.

BEST SUPPORTING ACTOR — George Clooney — "Syriana," Matt Dillon — "Crash," Paul Giamatti — "Cinderella Man," Jake Gyllenhaal — "Brokeback Mountain" and William Hurt — "A History of Violence"

This category comes down to three men: Clooney, Dillon and Gyllenhaal. Clooney could be rewarded for his "body of work" for the year (which Oscar voters tend to do); his nominated performance in "Syriana" as well as his trifecta with "Good Night, and Good Luck." Dillon gave a riveting performance as a racist LAPD officer caring for his ailing father in "Crash," and is a respected actor in Hollywood who has paid his dues. Gyllenhaal's performance in "Brokeback Mountain" announced his presence as genuine Hollywood star and his nomination is a definite boost to his career. All three men could conceivably win, and all of them are deserving of the honor. Clooney had picked up many of the early awards, but a recent BAFTA win for Gyllenhaal around the time Academy ballots were due could help him out.

PREDICTION: Jake Gyllenhaal "Brokeback Mountain"

BEST SUPPORTING ACTRESS — Amy Adams — "Junebug," Catherine Keener — "Capote," Frances McDormand — "North Country," Rachel Weisz — "The Constant Gardener" and Michelle Williams — "Brokeback Mountain"

McDormand and Keener are pretty much out; it was a relatively weak year for women in Hollywood (see also the Best Actress race) and they're just filler. Michelle Williams has come a long way from "Dawson's Creek" and showed her range in "Brokeback Mountain" as a conflicted wife. Nothing but good things have been said about Adams's performance in "Junebug" and Weisz has been picking up most of the precursor awards for her performance in "The Constant Gardner." Historically, this has been a category that often has a surprise winner, and I'm going to go with the current trend and predict that Rachel Weisz will be triumphant. However, I won't be surprised if Adams or Williams wins. All of them gave fine performances.

PREDICTION: Rachel Weisz — "The Constant Gardener"

BEST ACTOR — Philip Seymour Hoffman — "Capote," Terrance Howard — "Hustle and Flow," Heath Ledger — "Brokeback Mountain," Joaquin Phoenix — "Walk the Line" and David Strathairn — "Good Night, and Good Luck."

All of these men are deserving of an Oscar, as it was an extremely potent year for male roles in movies. Phoenix's buzz peaked too early, which is a shame, since he did all his own singing; Howard's buzz came too late and is probably only recognized because of his other outstanding performance this year in "Crash;" Strathairn has pretty much gone under the radar, but he's the real dark horse in this year's race and has an outside chance of upsetting the two frontrunners; Since critics and guilds began handing out awards in December, it has either been Hoffman or Ledger that have been victorious. Both of them gave extremely powerful performances. Hoffman embodied Truman Capote and was stunning in "Capote," and Ledger, much like his costar Gyllenhaal, established himself as a respected actor. As much as I'd love to see Ledger win for his heartbreaking performance as Ennis Del Mar, Hoffman's train seems to be unstoppable; look for him to be at the podium Sunday night.

PREDICTION: Phillip Seymour Hoffman — "Capote"

BEST ACTRESS — Judi Dench — "Mrs. Henderson Presents," Felicity Huffman — "Transamerica," Keira Knightley — "Pride and Prejudice," Charlize Theron — "North Country" and Reese Witherspoon — "Walk the Line"

In what many considered to be a less than stellar year for women in Hollywood, the five nominees for best actress are all worthy. Dench is out; she is almost always nominated for anything she does, and the same goes for Theron, who won in 2004 for "Monster." I highly doubt she's ready to join the select company of multiple Oscar winners, or at least not yet — it took Hilary Swank five years to do that. And Charlize ain't no Hilary Swank. Knightley's nomination is well deserved; "Pride and Prejudice" was a sleeper hit with audiences and critics this past fall, but she'll have to be content with a nomination. She's young, so there should be more in her future. The real contenders are Huffman and Witherspoon. Huffman deglammed for her role as a post-op transsexual and her role on the wildly popular "Desperate Housewives" only helps her chances. Witherspoon, however, gives a tour de force performance as June Carter-Cash in "Walk the Line," and is an equal, if sometimes superior, foil to Phoenix's Cash. After a six-year drought, beauty should triumph at the Oscars. Witherspoon is this year's Jamie Foxx — and it's not a coincidence he's presenting this category.

PREDICTION: Reese Witherspoon — "Walk the Line"

No need to be huffy with Huffman's 'Transamerica' performance

By PETER FRISMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

There seems to be an expectation in film critics and patrons today that if a movie features characters whose social or sexual identities are exemplary of a hot-button topic, that movie must act as an embodiment of that issue; a film that acts foremost as a testament to the plight of the group of people the aforementioned character represents. This attitude is obviously fine when paired with movies whose goal is to do just that, but it is an impediment to films that are designed to be nothing more than a simple story. Ang Lee must have known of the controversy "Brokeback Mountain" would stir, but was the main purpose of the film to open a public dialogue about the issues it explored? Is it possible Lee only strived to tell a love story, albeit one whose lovers in question simply happen to be of the same gender?

The same questions could be asked about Duncan Tucker's "Transamerica." As its title suggests, the film's protagonist, Bree Osbourne (Felicity Huffman, "Magnolia") is transgender, the oft-overlooked "T" in GLBT. Born male but repulsed by the physical body she is encased in, she takes all the steps necessary before her sex-change operation. But a week before the operation is to take place, she receives news that she fathered a son, Toby (Kevin Zegers, 2004's "Dawn of the Dead") 17 years ago, and that son has now run afoul of the law. She risks losing her scheduled surgery to bail him out of prison and, after learning of his squalid living conditions, makes an effort to help him acquire an acceptable career and life. She does this, however, under the guise of a church missionary, unable to bring herself to tell Toby of his relationship to her. As Bree travels with Toby back to the hospital where she has the momentous appointment, she risks Toby discovering the truth, tries her best to raise his self-esteem and does the unthinkable by visiting her estranged family.

Grade A-

Huffman excels in her role as a confident yet needy transsexual who wishes the best for her son, but is concerned about settling the affairs of her sexuality above all else. Zegers is also admirable as a cynical prostitute who grows to realize he has an underlying conscience and need for acceptance and a father figure.

The topic of transgender persons seems to invite juvenile humor, which "Transamerica" deftly avoids, although there are plenty of comic moments in the film that rely upon more sophisticated tastes, only touching upon the obvious source of jokes ("They don't like it, either"). However, overpowering the levity are truly unnerving scenes, bringing to mind everything from Oedipus to Electra. One scene that more or less negates the previous lightheartedness of the film deals with Toby's reunion with his stepfather. Tucker arguably outpaces "Happiness's" Todd Solondz in a hypothetical contest to present the creepiest father-son relationship. Advocates for the rights of transgender persons probably wouldn't want to promote this movie, lest the general public subconsciously associate the transgender community with the themes of "Transamerica."

But while the film never seems centered on the topic of transgender, it does shed some light on the qualms and hardships such people are bound to face. "Transamerica" begins with a video of a voice coach giving tips on how to affect a more feminine vocal pitch. There's a good chance it had not occurred to many viewers of the film that a person wishing to change their gender would have to go through such a process — there's more to the act than only, in the words of Bree, "going from an outie to an innie" or vice-versa. In another scene, Bree describes all the medical procedures necessary before the obvious one, feminization of facial features and so on. And, of course, there are Bree's quandaries about her family's objection to her choice. While transsexuals might not wish to see "Transamerica" touted as the film that defines them, it is undeniable that the movie presents its audience with a story of personal growth that is easy to embrace and identify with, even if it is based on a concept alien to the viewer.

"Transamerica" is a highly entertaining and emotional film; superbly written and acted. However, it is up for debate as to whether it should be heralded as a film destined to help the transgender community gain acceptance. "Transamerica" would probably be much better received if it were regarded not as a film about transsexuals, but as a road movie that simply happens to have a transgender protagonist.

Felicity Huffman stands out in this 2005 dramatic comedy by director Duncan Tucker. Huffman plays a preoperative transsexual who recently discovered that she fathered a son years before.

Internet poised to become music's next great equalizer

By PATRICK S. PEMBERTON
KNIGHT RIDDER NEWSPAPERS

SAN LUIS OBISPO, Calif. — When promoting a show, band manager Tim Brehmer of San Luis Obispo can reach 500 prospective fans without leaving his home, placing a phone call or licking a stamp.

Brehmer, who manages New Tomorrow and other acts, will simply log onto his computer, go to MySpace.com and spend the next few hours spreading the word to friends and strangers.

"Say we have a show in Orange County next week," he said. "I will get on there and do a people search for Orange County and look up our demographic, like ages 18 to 25, and it will bring them all up. Then I'll click on them and send them a message, saying, 'Hey, we're coming to play next week, check out our music.' That's basically the same thing as handing out a flier while walking down the street, except you don't have to drive down there and use all the gas."

The music industry has always been a Darwinian model, where few bands (and not necessarily the best) are lucky enough to score a record deal that gets their music heard. With major labels so reluctant to try anything new (if one boy band sells, you can expect many more boy bands), most acts simply die without ever leaving the garage.

But now the Internet is vying to become the ultimate equalizer, with bands building large fan bases from their keyboards. A few acts have actually used their Internet prowess to score record deals.

Sites like MySpace, Pure Volume and CD Baby allow bands to post music, photos, tour dates and personal information where Internet traffic is heavy (MySpace alone has 52 million members). As a result, performers who once struggled to get their songs played on local radio now can be heard worldwide.

"If you just throw a MySpace page up and make some friends, you've got 20 percent more fans than when you started," said Brandon Wood, singer of New Tomorrow, a punk band out of San Luis Obispo.

MySpace is primarily a free social networking site that allows members to create a personal Web page, invite "friends" to link to their site and communicate through an internal e-mail system. Internet surfers can use MySpace to find old classmates, new loves or fellow nudists (if you're into that sort of thing).

In its two years of existence, MySpace has also become the leading Internet site for musicians, both established and undiscovered, to promote their craft.

Black Eyed Peas, Madonna and Weezer have premiered music on the site, allowing fans to preview upcoming CDs. (In some cases, record labels and publicists create and maintain sites for well-known acts. Other sites are actually created by fans.)

For lesser-known groups, like Red Lights in San Luis Obispo, MySpace helps build a fan base from scratch.

The Red Lights page has garnered more than 3,000 page views, and more than 600 people have added themselves as friends, paltry compared to Blink 182's 710,000 friends, but still a good start.

Bass player Shawn Hafley said the band knows about a quarter of its friends. The rest are strangers who found out about the indie rock band through the Internet.

Though the site only allows bands to post four songs, those songs can be rotated. And because the site tracks the number of times people listen to the songs, bands can use that as a gauge as to which songs are best-received.

Red Lights has its own Web site independent of MySpace, Hafley said, but it's difficult to maintain.

"When you change information on it, you actually have to go in and do all this weird scripting," he said. "Whereas on MySpace, it's just click right, update ... it's done."

The Black Eyed Peas are among several artists that have premiered music on MySpace.com

Brazilian Carnaval at UMass

By GILL BENEDEK
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Do you have "ginga?" A rough translation equates this Brazilian Portuguese term as the "art of movement." As many Brazilians proudly profess, this ginga is part of the soul, a way of going through life while shaking your stuff.

This Friday from 7 p.m. to 1 a.m. at the Campus Center Auditorium, UMass's own Student Association for the Multicultural Brazilian Alliance (S.A.M.B.A.) is throwing the fourth annual "Carnaval — Out of Season" celebration to help thaw the bodies of our Five-College Community.

Carnaval has become S.A.M.B.A.'s flagship event, sparing no expense to ensure an electrifying party for all. The event includes a full Brazilian buffet, dance performances, a Brazilian band and a DJ.

Carnaval's history in Brazil is legendary. World-renowned by many, as the "greatest show on earth," Carnaval celebrations shut down Brazil for a weeklong festival of raucous dancing, singing and partying. Gabriel Belino of S.A.M.B.A. said, "Carnaval is such a big part of our culture and it's a great way of showing what we're all about."

Each part of Brazil goes about the festivities with their own regional flair. Bahia, the northeastern region, throws street-clogging parties all week while in the South "Samba teams" parade in costumes overflowing with sequins and feathers. S.A.M.B.A. hopes to share with the Amherst community an authentic representation of Brazilian culture by "offering a flavor of the euphoric and engulfing spirit associated with Carnaval." How nice of S.A.M.B.A. to kindle our wind-battered souls with some Brazilian spice.

To help celebrate Carnaval, S.A.M.B.A. has organized an event with something for everyone. Begin the festivities by feasting on a traditional Brazilian buffet including such favorites as "Estregonofe," a rich meat dish, "Salpicao," a tasty Brazilian Salad and "Frango Nobre," a roasted chicken recipe. Guest speaker Professor Sonia Alvarez will then introduce the performance portion of Carnaval.

Opening the performances is Berkshire Batera, a large drum and dance group who will get you into the wild spirit of Carnaval. Hailing from Boston, their addictive rhythms and samba sounds have been instigating parties throughout New England. The dancers will showcase a wide range of Brazilian dance styles, from the Afro-Brazilian steps of Bahia to Rio's circus flamboyance.

Kicking off the dance party, Banda Ponto Com will provide a diverse array of Brazilian music. The six-member band intend on bringing out everyone's "ginga." To cap off the night, DJ Martinez's speakers will blast all the funk they can handle, spinning an assortment of Brazilian, Latin, reggaeton and hip-hop music.

"Carnaval is a gift for everyone from our Brazilian culture," emphasized Belino. The astronomical rise in attendance during the event's four-year history — from 120 to over 400 last year — shows the people's appreciation. Riding last year's fantastic success, S.A.M.B.A. expects close to 500 people from the Valley and greater Massachusetts.

Event Coordinator Clara DoNascimento is waiting eagerly. She said, "We welcome everyone to the event. It's going to be a lot of fun." The forecast for the weekend looks bitter cold; that is, unless you plan on joining the wild Carnaval celebration. Tickets are $5 for Five College students and $8 for the general public. So come on down to the Carnaval. Who knows, you just may find your "ginga."

Spiritual roots reggae ensemble to play Pearl Street nightclub

The long lasting roots reggae band John Brown's Body is playing at the Pearl Street Night Club in Northampton tomorrow night.

By Justin Beturney
Collegian Correspondent

Tomorrow night, the eclectic reggae band John Brown's Body will bring their rootsy flavor to the Pearl Street Night Club in Northampton.

The band is an eight-piece ensemble featuring a wide variety of musical instruments. Between the various members of the group they collectively handle two guitars, two main vocalists, bass, drums, percussion, keys, a Hammond B3 organ and an energetic horn section, including tenor sax, trumpet and trombone, which all adds to their distinct roots reggae sound.

John Brown's Body falls under the genre of roots reggae, which is socially conscious, spiritual and traditional music. The genre originated in Jamaica and was made famous by pioneers like Bob Marley, Peter Tosh, Dennis Brown and Jimmy Cliff.

The band's front man, Kevin Kinsella, along with founding members Tommy Benedetti, Lee Hamilton, Josh Neuman and Sam Godin, were all previously in another band called Tribulations. When Tribulations dissolved, the remaining musicians set out to play a more traditional style of reggae, according to the band's Web site, johnbrownsbody.com.

"The goal was just to strip out the rock guitar of Tribulations and get back to the classic compositional elements of reggae," said Benedetti on the band's Web site.

It has undergone some roster changes since its conception, but in its current incarnation, John Brown's Body is Kevin Kinsella on vocals and rhythm guitar, Dan Delacruz on tenor saxophone, Eliot Martin on vocals and tambourine, Chris Welter on trumpet, B3 and vocals, Tommy Benedetti on drums, Alex Beram on trombone and bingy drum, Scott Palmer on bass and Nate Silas Richardson on keys, guitar and vocals.

The band takes its name from 1850s American abolitionist John Brown, who was tried and hanged for attempting to arm an insurrection against pro-slavery advocates. After he was martyred, the folk song "John Brown's Body" became a marching tune for Union soldiers in the Civil War.

"I saw John Brown as a paradigm and a paradox of American history," said Kinsella in the liner notes of the band's 1999 release, "Among Them."

"Someone who fights for justice and God's will using a gun ... to me, he's a white man fighting for an African cause. And because we're basically a white group singing liberation music for black people, I see a real parallel there. He's an underground rebel, a freedom fighter."

JBB has defied critics that claim the color of their skin dictates the music they can play. They have established a name for themselves by keeping close to their songwriting sensibilities, maintaining a rigorous and dedicated touring schedule and staying true to the roots of their classic reggae influences. Last summer, the band celebrated their 10th anniversary playing together, proving that they have longevity. A live recording of that anniversary show is available for download on the band's Web site and captures their live exuberance.

Their acclaim has grown in the past decade. Through live performances, JBB has proven their merit and earned the opportunity to share the stage with reggae legends like Burning Spear and Toots And The Maytals, reggae-influenced hip-hop acts like Lauryn Hill and Michael Franti And Spearhead, as well as Jurassic 5 and San Diego's Slightly Stoopid.

They've also released an impressive six albums in ten years: "This Day," "Among Them," "All Time," "Justin Hinds and John Brown's Body — Live at Grassroots," "Spirits All Around Us" and their latest, "Pressure Points."

Since relocating from Ithaca, N.Y. to Boston, John Brown's Body has been honored with a Boston Music Award in 2001 for Best World Music Act and another in 2002 for Best Live Act.

Providence, R.I.'s Zox is no stranger to the Pioneer Valley. They bring their own unique style, seamlessly blending reggae, rock and punk with a blazing amplified violin that you have to hear to believe.

Oscar nominees near their night

BEST DIRECTOR — Ang Lee "Brokeback Mountain," Bennett Miller "Capote," Paul Haggis — "Crash," George Clooney "Good Night, and Good Luck" and Steven Spielberg — "Munich"

This is the only category that is close to lock status. Ang Lee — his beautiful and heartbreaking story of love and loss in the mountains of Wyoming is nothing short of breathtaking. Lee took a film that many directors strayed away from and turned it into one of the most successful, talked-about films of the year. The only other person to pose an outside threat to Lee is Clooney, who demonstrated in "Good Night, and Good Luck" that he's just as comfortable behind the camera as he is in front of it. But the prize is Lee's to lose.

PREDICTION: Ang Lee "Brokeback Mountain"

BEST PICTURE "Brokeback Mountain," "Capote," "Crash," "Good Night, and Good Luck" and "Munich"

This is it, the big one, the one award that every producer wants to win. It's interesting to note that only one of the nominees this year, "Munich," is from a major Hollywood studio. The other four nominees are from independent studios and distributors, which speaks volumes about the current trend in Hollywood. That being said, all five films were (in my humble opinion) the best of the year, but it appears to be down to a two-picture race between "Brokeback" and "Crash." Those damn cowboys have been galloping their way towards the Oscar podium since the film was released in December, and "Crash" has become "the little film that could," opening last May and slowly gaining momentum throughout the year through word of mouth and an extremely impressive advertising campaign. There are current whispers that there is a sudden backlash against "Brokeback" and that "Crash" will be victorious on Sunday. A few top critics have also predicted that "Crash" will be crowned Best Picture, but "Brokeback" has way too much momentum to be stopped. Expect "Brokeback" to ride off with the big prize, if any other film wins, it'll be a major upset.

PREDICTION: "Brokeback Mountain"

BEST SCREENPLAY

ORIGINAL — "Crash," "Good Night, and Good Luck," "Match Point," "The Squid and the Whale" and "Syriana"

ADAPTED — "Brokeback Mountain," "Capote," "The Constant Gardener," "A History of Violence" and "Munich"

Expect "Crash" to be rewarded in the Original Screenplay category, scribe Paul Haggis won last year for his adaptation of "Million Dollar Baby" and this year he handled the interweaving plot lines with ease. "Good Night, and Good Luck" or "The Squid and the Whale" could upset, but "Crash" should go all the way.

In the adapted category, "Brokeback" appears to be the front-runner, based on Annie Proulx's short story. "Munich" could be rewarded for its emotional and controversial storyline, but this is another category where the prize is "Brokeback's" to lose.

PREDICTION: Original — "Crash," Adapted — "Brokeback Mountain"

Actor George Clooney is nominated for best Supporting Actor for his role in "Syriana." Clooney is also nominated for Best Director for his film "Good Night , and Good Luck."

UMass faces Yale on the road

M. LACROSSE from page 12

— they're great at facing off. Overall, they're a very good team. It's going to be a huge challenge for us to go down there."

When the Minutemen do have possession of the ball, there is no question that they will look to get it to senior attacker Sean Morris. The first-team Preseason All-American came out of the gates hot last week, tying a career-high with eight points on three goals and five assists.

"Anytime you can put points up on the board against a good team you're happy," Cannella said. "Sean had an exceptional day — we'd love to expect that out of him every game and get that out of him every game, but it's unrealistic. He'll bring his energy, but the opportunities may not come his way, so you hope the other guys feel confident in what they did out there. It's great to see those guys click as long as they continue to do it."

UMass featured a balanced offensive attack against Hofstra with eight different players scoring, something that Cannella has come to expect from his squad.

"The unselfishness of the group is really what helps that," Cannella said. "Nobody cares who gets the goal or who gets the assist; everybody cares if the offense is playing well. If you can keep that attitude as the year goes along, good things will happen."

On the defensive side of the ball, Cannella plans to go with freshman Doc Schneider between the pipes for the second game in a row. Schneider had an impressive collegiate debut last week, recording 14 saves in the win over Hofstra.

"We have confidence in Doc, and in [goalies] Nick Sciubba and Hosa [Guobadia]," Cannella said. "It was a very difficult decision for us to make last week. [Schneider] provides great leadership for us on that end of the field and made some big stops for us. There [are] some real good things that came out of [Sunday's game] with him."

UMass coach Greg Cannella said that senior midfielder Jamie Yaman is "expected to be a senior leader on the offensive group."

Old coaching duo revives friendship

So it should come as no surprise that when Cannella is asked about the Yale team, one of the first things he would say is about its coach.

"Top to bottom, they're very well-coached," Cannella said. "They are taking on the personality of their coach more and more. They're tougher as a team. They're hungry as a team, and it's going to be huge challenge for us to go down there."

Shay served as the recruiting and defensive coordinator for the Maroon and White, and he led one of the more successful defensive units in all of collegiate lacrosse during his tenure.

The UMass defense led the nation in man-down percentage in 2001, and his defense allowed less than 10 goals per game and had the country's third-best scoring margin in 2002 and 2003, when the Minutemen reached the NCAA Quarterfinals in back-to-back seasons.

"First of all, he is a great guy," Cannella said. "He is really enthusiastic as a coach. He is a really bright coach. He came up with some great ideas and some great schemes as to how to defend people [at UMass]. He approaches it very seriously, and that is why he is the head coach at Yale now. That was one of his goals, to become a head coach at Division I."

His overall record in two seasons at Yale is 13-13, which is very respectable since he took over a program left hung out to dry by Mike Waldvogel, who left the team in January 2003 after he was being investigated for possible rules violations. Darryl Delia filled in on an interim basis until Shay was hired in June 2003, just a short while after his Minutemen beat Yale 12-10.

"He fit in well here," Cannella said. "We had a great relationship while he was here, and we still do because there are a lot of similarities in what we believe in about letting the players play. This is a player's game, not necessarily a coach's game."

Even still, there might be a little extra attention given to each coach on the sideline on Saturday, especially from one another.

Salary cap is a dividing issue

By Dave Goldberg
Associated Press

NEW YORK — NFL owners will try Thursday to find labor peace before the start of free agency, hoping to avoid the mass dumping of veterans for salary-cap reasons.

The owners will meet in New York, looking to reach an agreement with the players' union that could add $10 million to $15 million to a 2006 salary cap that currently is projected at about $95 million. Without it, some teams could be forced into wholesale cuts to get beneath the cap by midnight. Free agency starts Friday.

Three days of talks between the league and the NFL Players Association to extend the agreement that runs out in 2008 ended Tuesday with the sides far apart on the percentage of league revenues earmarked for players. Gene Upshaw, the union's executive director, said the league is offering up to 56.2 percent of its total revenue for the players, almost four points lower than the union's.

"Our number has to start with a six," Upshaw said.

But beyond the numbers is an issue that has divided the owners for two years — revenue sharing among the teams.

Under the current system, some teams make far more than others in ancillary income, ranging from local radio rights to stadium naming rights and advertising. The lower revenue teams say that forces them to commit as much as 70 percent of that money to the players while teams with more outside money contribute far less, giving the high-revenue teams more available cash for upfront bonuses to free agents.

The NFL said in a statement after talks broke off that revenue sharing won't be discussed at Thursday's meeting.

Still, it is bound to come up during a meeting that on the surface is considered a strategy session to determine the owners' next move. Labor negotiations often have a way of being moved forward by deadlines, and revenue sharing is considered a critical part of the formula.

Under the current agreement, 2006 is scheduled to be the last year with a salary cap. An uncapped year in 2007 means new rules that will force teams and agents to change their plans this year and could keep a lot of teams out of the free-agent market entirely.

"It might mean that no rookies get signed because no one is sure of the long-term ramifications," said Tom Condon, the agent for a number of the game's top players.

Even more urgent are salary-cap ramifications for many teams, which anticipated a labor agreement and planned for a much bigger ceiling. Washington, for example, could be as much as $25 million over the salary cap after signings over the past few years that anticipated a salary cap figure well over $100 million.

The ramifications of a lower than anticipated cap were evident Wednesday, when some high-priced veterans were cut. Among them were defensive end Trevor Pryce and running back Mike Anderson of Denver, the team's leading rusher last season. Denver also cut tight end Jeb Putzier.

Buffalo, meanwhile, released defensive tackle Sam Adams and Carolina released three veterans: running back Stephen Davis, defensive tackle Brentson Buckner and kicker returner Rod Smart, "He Hate Me" of old NFL days.

Miami cut left tackle Damion McIntosh, saving $3.8 million against the cut. The Dolphins are a prime example of a team that needs a new labor agreement. They are estimated to be about $9 million over a $95 million cap, but would be under it if the agreement is reached.

Other teams seem ready for whatever happens.

"We're in pretty good shape," New York Giants general manager Ernie Accorsi said. "They're going to give us a cap number and we'll be ready for it. You always prepare for a worst case, no matter what the situation. You never want to be surprised by something negative, only something positive."

Accorsi said he's also not worried about new rules. He said those contingencies are covered in the contracts of two young Pro Bowl players — tight end Jeremy Shockey and defensive end Osi Umenyiora — that the Giants extended last fall.

But others are in a different situation, which could mean wholesale cuts of big-name players at midnight Thursday. What happens in the meetings may determine that.

NFL commissioner Paul Tagliabue is engaged in tense negotiations with the NFL Players Association over salary cap issues.

Seattle Seahawks running back Shaun Alexander's salary could be reduced from the $22 million he demanded from his team next season.

China prepares for Olympics

By Dean Visser
Associated Press

BEIJING — The government is teaching citizens "the right way to spit." A college is showing students the right way to sit. Two years ahead of hosting the Olympic Games, people across Beijing are on an all-out drive to mind their manners.

China's hard, gray, briskly communist capital has a reputation for brusqueness. Visitors are often startled to see its people spit onto the crowded pavement.

Changing all that ahead of the 2008 Summer Games is "crucial in providing a cultural and historical legacy to the world" for China, said Beijing city official Zhang Hongtaing.

"We will work with newspapers, radio stations, TV stations, the Internet and mobile telephone carriers to teach people the right way to spit," said Zhang, director of Beijing's Capital Ethical and Cultural Development Office.

Zhang said her office is running a "behavioral training" campaign that also includes lining up properly for buses and turning off mobile phones during meetings.

But spitting is the No. 1 issue, she said at a news conference Wednesday.

"You have to spit into a tissue or a bag, and then put it into a dustbin to complete the process," she said.

Zhang said her office has organized a small army of volunteers who are hitting Beijing's streets to hand out "spit bags," wearing bright orange uniforms with the Chinese character for "mucus" emblazoned in yellow on the back.

Public spitters already face fines up to $6, but "this year ... we will require law enforcement officials to step up the frequency" of penalties, Zhang said.

Others are taking a softer approach.

Lu-chin Mischke was born near Beijing, married an American and spent 10 years in the U.S. She said her heart sank when she and her family returned to live in her homeland and she saw the rampant spitting, littering and cutting in line.

It prompted her to start the Pride Institute, a private group that runs seminars aimed at demonstrating the delights of being more polite.

"I'm trying to wake up a sense of decency," Mischke said. "I know it's there."

She said hundreds of people sometimes crowd the talks at community centers, schools and businesses.

"I saw our beautiful scenery covered with plastic bags," she said. "Sometimes I think I'm the first one to see this littering and say, 'Why do you treat our country like a garbage can?'"

"Many of them never really thought of it that way," she said.

The nearing of the Olympics is starting to raise awareness of the problem, she said.

"Chinese feel it's an acknowledgment by the world," she said. "They feel like it's not a backwater any more. It's on the world stage."

China has always been sensitive about foreign — especially Western — criticism of its ways. But Mischke said what she's trying to teach is universal.

"It's not like I'm inventing any problems for China," she said. "Most people hate these things, this bad behavior. I'm just trying to wake them up and show them they can stop."

Morrison embraces spotlight

By Nicholas K. Geranios
Associated Press

SPOKANE, Wash. — Fans wear fake mustaches to look like him. They bid on eBay for a bit of his blood. Kobe Bryant shows up to watch him play.

A diabetic with floppy hair, leftist political views and a rock-star persona, Adam Morrison of No. 5 Gonzaga carries a swagger that is fast transcending college basketball.

Whether jawing at other players, baiting opposing fans or draining 30-footers, Morrison is the headline act whenever he steps on the court.

There's some Jim Morrison, a touch of Larry Bird and a ration of Karl (Marx and Malone) inside that 6-foot-8 package, and lots of people want a piece of him.

"It's reached the point of ridiculous," coach Mark Few said. "He's so not interested in all that."

It's not as if the Zags (23-3) weren't already the darlings of fans who hate Duke, Kentucky and other hoops royalty. But with every game a televised sellout and Morrison's distinctive high-release jumper a mainstay on SportsCenter, this season is special.

"It's like being with the Stones and Beatles," Few said.

Sports information director Oliver Pierce gets so many requests to talk to Morrison each week he has to sharply limit the player's interviews.

Morrison — "Mo" to his teammates — is in a nip-and-tuck race with friend J.J. Redick of Duke for the Division I scoring title, both averaging about 29 points.

Morrison and Redick share the cover of the current issue of Sports Illustrated and are the likely finalists for player of the year. Both are targets of relentless hazing by opposing fans. Stopping them is the goal of every defense.

Morrison has put up gaudy numbers this year, scoring 40 or more points five times and 30 or more 12 times. He is shooting 51 percent and makes 44 percent of his 3-point attempts. He shoots from everywhere, and dropped 37 points on Loyola Marymount in just the second half. He takes about a third of his team's shots.

"When I'm feeling it, the guys on the team don't mind me shooting it every time I get the ball," Morrison said.

Morrison, a junior, is widely expected to forgo his senior year to enter the draft. NBA scouts have flocked to Gonzaga games like frat boys to a Paris Hilton car wash.

Morrison has declined to reveal his plans, and treats his celebrity with some amusement. Off the court, he is far less flamboyant. He tends to speak in a monotone, answers most questions in jock-speak and rarely has anything bad to say about anyone.

Morrison majors in sports management, but he has been smitten for some time by radical thinkers like Karl Marx and Che Guevara, whose poster is in his room. A television commercial for Gonzaga features Morrison exhorting classmates to pursue independent thought.

When ESPN came to Spokane recently, announcer Dick Vitale and his partners donned fake mustaches. The newspaper in Morrison's hometown of Spokane is running a contest asking fans to give the player an Extreme Mustache Makeover by voting for the style (handlebar, Fu Manchu, etc.) that would look best. The wispy real one is not an option.

A piece of bloody gauze that Morrison used to stop a nose bleed at Pepperdine was put on eBay for $1 and bids reached $60 before the seller pulled the item when Gonzaga objected.

Television cameramen catch Morrison checking his blood sugar or injecting himself in the abdomen with insulin during games.

At Pepperdine last week, fans surrounded the Gonzaga bus as it pulled up before the game and heaped abuse on Morrison.

The game drew a sellout crowd that included NBA star Kobe Bryant, former Zag and current Laker Ronny Turiaf, retired NBA star Reggie Miller and actor David Duchovny. They weren't there to see the Waves.

Morrison, who began commanding national attention as a freshman, plays the part of the brash rogue who pushes the limits. Even his teammates sometimes stand back and watch him shoot, something that drives Few crazy.

Part of Morrison's allure is his gamesmanship. He's constantly talking trash and grabbing opponents' jerseys. He pleads his case with referees. He flops to the ground when an opponent brushes past him.

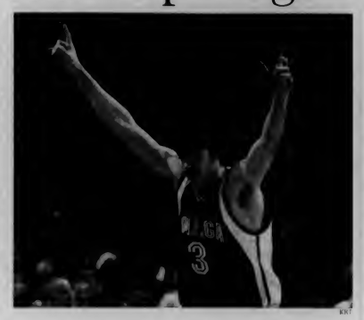
"He's probably the least politically correct of any of our guys and he doesn't seem to mind inciting a riot in opposing gyms," Few said.

"I've always had a little bit of a chip on my shoulder," Morrison said. "That's how I play the game."

But Morrison is as likely to help an opponent off the floor as he is to shove him down. And the more you taunt him about that mustache, the more he responds by draining 3-pointers.

"He's awfully proud of it," Few said.

After a recent win over Stanford on national television, in which Morrison scored 12 of his 34 points in the final three minutes, he acknowledged that all the exposure can be tough.



"There was a lot of hype and a lot of pressure put on me," Morrison said. "The whole week people were coming up and saying, 'You can't lose'"

Few said that, like it or not, Morrison is the go-to guy.

"It's sad that we have come to expect those types of games from him every night and wonder what's wrong when he doesn't deliver," Few said. "He always seems to play big in the big games."

Morrison has risen to celebrity status, and, sporting long hair and a patchy mustache, has become a cult hero on the Gonzaga campus.

Gonzaga forward Adam Morrison is competing with Duke sharpshooter J.J. Redick for the Division I scoring title.

United States soccer takes down Poland

By Barry Wilner
Associated Press

GERMANY — The last time Clint Dempsey played in a snowstorm, the match was reduced to a penalty-kick shootout rather than going the full 90 minutes.

That was in Texas when he was playing club soccer. On Wednesday night, Dempsey and the U.S. team defied the elements and beat Poland 1-0 in a World Cup tune-up played in blizzard conditions.

In a scene more befitting Lambeau Field than a soccer field, Dempsey scored the only goal off a misplay by Poland's goalie in the 48th minute.

"I never played in a game when that much snow came in at the same time," Dempsey said. "I never saw little flurries turn into big snow like that.

The ball kept bouncing around here and there."

It bounced perfectly on Dempsey's fortuitous goal. Eddie Lewis made a superb long pass from the left wing into the penalty area. Goalkeeper Artur Boruc, who entered to start the second half, tried to punch it away. Instead, the ball deflected off the head of U.S. forward Taylor Twellman directly to Dempsey.

All Twellman's teammate with the New England Revolution had to do was head it into a gaping net.

"The defender thought the goalie was going to get it, and it caused him to hesitate a bit. And I was able to get behind him and get one in the back of the net," Dempsey said.

"He apologized for his mistake, but that's not enough," Poland coach Pawel Janas said of Boruc. "You need to concentrate more."

The next time the United States plays at Fritz-Walter-Stadion, it probably will be 50 degrees warmer, with no sign of snow and a frosty wind.

By the midpoint of the second half, the swirling snow made heading the ball an adventure and trying to make cuts a dangerous proposition. In the final minutes, referee Thorsten Kinhofer even went to a yellow ball so it would contrast against the white blanket on the field.

"I'm not sure the snow was an advantage for anybody," U.S. coach Bruce Arena said. "We have been training in California, our domestic players, for seven weeks."

And they certainly didn't see any California weather out there Wednesday.

The conditions controlled play more than either team. A frozen crowd of 13,395 — many of them Americans from nearby Ramstein Air Base — saw the United States improve to 4-0-1 this year and 6-7-2 against Poland, which beat the United States 3-1 during the first round of the 2002 World Cup.

The Americans return to Kaiserslautern on June 17 to face Italy in their second World Cup game. They improved to 2-7-2 in Europe under Arena, with both wins coming over Poland.

"We beat a good team in difficult conditions," said Kasey Keller, who played the first half in goal. "I'm sure the pitch and the weather will be better in June.

"Good teams win 1-0, and that's what we managed to do."

It was the only time prior to May when all European clubs were required to release their players to national teams, and the Americans inserted many of their Europe-based regulars. Their only other scheduled World Cup warm-up game in Europe is March 22 against Germany in Dortmund.

Neither team warmed up early, then Poland had the best opportunities through 30 minutes. Keller, the career leader in victories and shutouts for the United States, had to be sharp to punch out a high ball and dived to his right to foil Michal Zewlakow moments after Keller also cleared a loose ball in the box.

Defender Oguchi Onyewu made a timely block of Miroslaw Szymkowiak's 15-yard attempt with Keller out of position.

The Americans began possessing the ball more late in the opening half without any results. The best chance came on Kerry Zavagnin's free kick that sailed just wide left.

But three minutes into the second period, the U.S. team struck. It was enough, thanks in part to the snowy conditions.

"The hard thing was seeing," Landon Donovan said. "There was a period of 15-20 minutes where you couldn't see more than 10 yards. The other thing is you are trying to run with the ball and it just keeps popping up, popping up and it's hard to get your momentum going."

Notes: The United States has played Poland more times than any other European team ... The only Americans who did not play were F Brian McBride, who has a slight groin problem but expects to play Saturday for Fulham of the English Premier League, and D Jonathan Spector ... After the game against Germany, the Americans host Jamaica in Cary, N.C., on April 11.

Ramirez reports to Red Sox training camp

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FORT MYERS, Fla. — Red Sox slugger Manny Ramirez arrived at spring training Wednesday, six days after the team's first full-squad workout and one day after Major League Baseball's mandatory reporting date.

Ramirez, who hit .292 with 45 home runs and 144 RBIs last season, was allowed an extra week away to continue working out near his Miami home. Fans had eagerly waited to see if Ramirez would show up. He requested a trade over the winter and hinted that he might not report if the request wasn't honored.

But Wednesday morning, Ramirez walked into the team's locker room in Fort Myers — a glove in hand — then went to the field for practice.

"My main focus, like I say, is getting prepared for the season to help Boston win," Ramirez told reporters. "I'm here. I don't live in the past, I live in the present."

Asked about off-season trade rumors and whether he's happy still being with the Red Sox, Ramirez said he had no problems with Boston.

"I especially like the attention," he said. "I know that I'm one of the top guys in this game and all the attention is on me. I got a lot of people on my shoulder, but I'm human. I like to go. I like to have fun. I like to do this and that but I have to represent Boston and the Red Sox in every way that I do outside this game."

He added: "I have a beautiful career going on and I'm not going to let little things like this mess [up] all the things that I accomplished because I think when I finish my career I'm going to be a special player and I'm not going to let nobody stop that and that's me. I got a goal for myself and I'm now going to accomplish that."

Ramirez also confirmed speculation that he would not be joining the Dominican Republic's team for the World Baseball Classic on Thursday, and instead spend the month playing with Boston.

"I'm not ready, so I'm not going to go out there and make a fool of myself," he said.

Red Sox slugger Manny Ramirez reported to spring training yesterday morning and answered questions from an aggressive media.

UM takes on Yale in first road game

UMass preps for tough test

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

While it was certainly nice for the members of the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team (1-0) to open the season with a convincing 11-7 win over rival Hofstra, there just as certainly wasn't much time spent celebrating the victory.

It was back to business this week for the No. 9 Minutemen as they prepared for their first road game of the season, a matchup with Yale (0-1) Saturday at 3 p.m.

"You can't rate a season in one game," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "Sure, we're happy we won a game, but that won't help us any this weekend [other than] some confidence for some of the guys. They know very well they need to work hard this week in order to play well on Saturday."

Yale is coming off of a 9-7 loss in its season opener at Delaware on Saturday, and Cannella expects the Bulldogs to provide a stiff test on their home field.

"Yale's a real strong program," Cannella said. "The last two times we've gone down there we've lost, so I'm expecting a dogfight. They're going to come out with everything they have and we're going to have to match it and hopefully persevere through it."

Yale is very effective at controlling possession, and is led by faceoff specialist and second-team Preseason All-American Dan Kallaugher. In last year's meeting, a 12-6 UMass win at Garber Field, the Minutemen were able to hold their own in the battle for possession, with each team winning 21 face-offs and UMass holding a 27-26 lead in groundballs.

"They have a real strong starting six on offense, as good as anyone we'll face," Cannella said. "They're going to try to play a possession game

KAREN WING-FILE/COLLEGIAN

All-American Sean Morris tallied eight points in Sunday's 11-7 win over No. 19 Hofstra at Garber Field, and will face off against Yale All-American Dan Kallaugher on Saturday.

Cannella finds a familiar face

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

Andy Shay came to Amherst to visit an old friend on Sunday. He braved what was an unbearable cold and sat in the stands at Garber Field to check out a game between the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team and the Hofstra Pride, which the Minutemen won 11-7.

Afterwards, Shay and his wife went to dinner with UMass coach Greg Cannella and assistant coach Jason Miller.

After all, that's what friends do.

But Shay isn't just Cannella's friend. He was a former employee — the UMass assistant coach from 2000-03 — and he is Cannella's opponent on Saturday when the 1-0 Minutemen take on the 0-1 Yale Bulldogs at Reese Stadium in New Haven, Conn.

And Shay wasn't just on hand for Sunday's game to soak in the Garber atmosphere; he was scouting one of the top teams in the country and a team he was able to beat 9-8 in double-overtime in 2004, the last time UMass traveled to Yale.

Cannella isn't the type of person to shun away an opponent, regardless of whether or not that opponent is on the schedule in five days. He would rather spend time with a friend, someone he admires and respects on and off the lacrosse field.

Caught in the Spiders' web

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

It was a dismal night for the Massachusetts men's basketball team (12-14, 7-8 Atlantic 10). It lost its eighth conference game in a route at Richmond last night, 81-66, and the Minutemen were dominated from the start — they gave up nine straight points to start the game, and it was downhill from there. They fell behind 20-12 midway through the first frame and that was the closest they were to the Spiders all night.

It was Senior Night for Richmond, and the Minutemen were on the receiving end of some inspired Spider basketball. There were several statistics that summed up the night. Richmond snapped its eight-game losing streak (the second time a significant streak has been snapped against the Minutemen this season), five Spider players were in double figures (the first time that's happened all season) and UMass was 0-for-12 from three-point land.

For a team that struggles on the offensive end, going 0-for from beyond the arc doesn't help.

In the first three minutes of last night's game, the Minutemen had four turnovers, Richmond was 3-for-3 from beyond the arc and the Spiders had a 9-0 lead. It was a microcosm of a night that was meant for the Richmond seniors and not for the struggling Minutemen, who didn't put up much of a fight.

The Spiders, up 30-22 on the Minutemen at halftime, steamrolled UMass at the start of the second half and scored the first two baskets for a 12-point lead. About five minutes into the second half, one sequence summed up the night for UMass: with time winding down on the Spiders' shot clock, Richmond guard Gaston Mofiva found himself with the ball in the corner; he threw up a prayer from the three-point line as the buzzer sounded, and it rattled home, giving the Spiders a 41-26 lead, the biggest of the night.

Richmond's Monty Sanders hit a nifty reverse lay-up, with the foul, about five minutes into the second half, after he received the ball on a backdoor cut. The ensuing Richmond possession was another reverse lay-up off of a backdoor, and UMass coach Travis Ford was forced to call a timeout at the 11:46 mark — Ford's Minutemen were down by 18 points at that stage of the game.

Out of the timeout, the Minutemen went into a scrambling, trapping defense, trying to cause some Richmond turnovers. The Spiders were already in the one-and-one, so every UMass foul from that point on caused the clock to stop. But the Spiders hit their free throws down the stretch, rendering the fouling strategy useless.

The Minutemen started in a 2-3 zone, but after the Spiders shot the lights out early, UMass was forced into a man-to-man defense — not a good sign for a team that plays its point guard for 35-plus minutes a game.

Sophomore Dante Milligan scored the first four points for the Minutemen after the Spiders put nine on the board, but was taken out after committing a couple of early fouls.

KAREN WING-FILE/COLLEGIAN

Junior captain Rashaun Freeman didn't get a shot attempt until the 8:15 mark of the first half in last night's loss to Richmond.

A-10 Championship: it's not out of reach

Danny Picard

One thing is for sure. The Massachusetts women's basketball team has as good a chance as any to come out of Philadelphia this weekend as the Atlantic 10 Champion.

The month of March is finally upon us. All Major League Baseball players have reported to spring training (including Manny). The St. Patrick's Day parade is right around the corner. Sully's, in my hometown of South Boston, has opened. And, whether you're a college basketball fan or not, March Madness is finally here.

Sure, women's basketball is not the gambling choice for most Bracketology majors, but it is still Division I college hoops, and there is still a road to the Final Four.

For the UMass women's basketball team, there is plenty of work to be done, but with the way these Minutewomen have been playing of late, this train may continue to roll all the way into the NCAA tournament.

I kid you not. And they could not have scripted it any better in Hollywood.

The Minutewomen started the season losing 13 of their first 16 games. Frustration was high and the critics, me being one of them, were bashing the team. Sophomore sensations Pam Rosanio and Kate Mills were having big games, but UMass clearly needed a few leaders to step up vocally, on and off the court.

After losing their first five conference games, things were not looking too good for the Maroon and White. Then something happened — something bizarre. The Minutewomen came out on Jan. 19 and handed it to the Richmond Spiders. They shot 61 percent from the field and had four players in double-figures.

The atmosphere after the game was amazing. All of a sudden, the UMass locker room was full of confidence. In fact, they were so confident, Rosanio told me after the game that her team would make the A-10 tournament. At the time, it seemed like a stretch.

They had only a 4-13 record overall, and were a dismal 1-5 in the conference. So while she was standing there pretty much giving me a guarantee on a post-season berth, I was thinking, "Does this girl know something I don't?"

Ohviously she did.

Suddenly, winning became contagious. The Minutewomen finished the regular season winning eight of their last 11 games, all while dominating the home court with six consecutive wins on the Mullins Center floor.

The players have "bought into the system," and finished the season strong with a 63-55 victory over La Salle, making them the seventh seed in the A-10 tournament.

So here we are, one day away from the playoffs. And if you are a UMass student, you probably would like to know how the Minutewomen will fare against the rest of the conference in this single-elimination tournament.

Because with some low attendance figures this year, chances are you have not been following the team, unless you have been watching the games through the Internet.

But if you have been following the team, you know that UMass got the match-up it wanted against No. 10 seed Duquesne, the same team that beat the Minutewomen on Jan. 6 with a game-winning three-pointer with 21 seconds left in the game.

How fitting.

Revenge is sweet, and UMass has plenty of it in store for the Dukes. There should be nothing holding the Minutewomen back in this one, and a loss in the first round to a team they are much better than would certainly be tragic. But a win would give them another shot at No. 2 seeded Charlotte, who also defeated the Minutewomen this season.

If they could win those two games and advance to the semi-finals, you could almost guarantee that they would be playing No. 3 seeded Temple, who also took down UMass earlier in the year.

In a perfect world, the Minutewomen would win all three of those games and advance to the finals, where it would be pretty much safe to say that they would take on No. 1 seeded George Washington, the same team that was No. 25 in the country when UMass shocked the world back on Jan. 22 with a 55-53 win.

In a perfect world this would all make sense. The Minutewomen would get some much-awaited revenge on those teams that beat up on them earlier in the year, and would play for an A-10 championship against a George Washington that may have given UMass some hope.

This weekend in Philadelphia, that perfect world may turn into reality. And there could not be a better storyline. It would all make sense. That is why there is hope. That is why there is a sense of revenge.

The Minutewomen are one of the best teams in the conference. They have proven it. They have shown that they can keep up with the best of the best in the A-10, and in the country. They just have to show up this weekend and continue with their motto of "one game at a time." They have to play with the passion and confidence that has helped them succeed when everyone else thought they would fail.

If they do that, they can win it all. That is for sure.

Potent Terrier attack downs Minutewomen

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

When the 2006 season for the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team (0-2) last picked up, it was a matter of things coming along too little, too late. Yesterday afternoon, it was almost the polar opposite.

After cranking out three goals in the first 10 minutes of play for an early 3-1 lead over the No. 8 Boston University Terriers, the Minutewomen ran into a wall. UMass managed only three more scores the rest of the way, surrendering a 7-0 run in the process, and fell to BU, 16-6, yesterday at Garber Field.

The Terriers were led in scoring by Jenny Hauser (six goals, three assists, nine points) and Lindsay Lewis (five goals), while the Minutewomen had two three-point scorers in Kathleen Typadis (three goals) and Kerri Connerty (one goal, two assists).

UMass is now off to a 0-2 start for the first time since 2001, while BU opened the season at 1-0. The Minutewomen return to action with the conclusion of their two-game home stand on Saturday at noon against Harvard.

Once again, the Maroon and White flexed its attack muscle with a bit of a spurt. This time, however, it came at a more appropriate time — the beginning of the game. Kerry Connerty took the initial face-off of the game and raced through the left side of the Terrier midfield and defense, cutting up field just outside of the goalkeeper's area and hitting the net for a 1-0 score, 30 seconds into the game.

After Angie Martin scored on the ensuing draw control, the Minutewomen got off two more goals by Typadis and Lindsay Cassell, making it a 3-1 score with 21 minutes left in the half.

Then it seems, as UMass coach Carrie Bolduc points out, the Terriers got angry.

"They're a great team," she said. "We can run with them, but what happens at half time is the other team gets pissed, and believes they're the better team and come take it to us. What we've got to recognize is to get even more pissed."

Hauser got her first of many goals at the 17-minute mark with a shot past Lauren McCarthy's left, in traffic, and Lewis registered her first five minutes later to make it a 3-3 tie. UMass responded on the next possession with freshman Meghan Reddy's first collegiate goal, a falling-down shot to make it 4-3, but after that the Terriers turned on the jets — big time.

Over the remainder of the first half and the first eight minutes of the second, BU ripped off seven straight goals — four of them by Hauser — to take a 10-4 lead, and from there the Terriers cruised.

Typadis ended the run with a free-position shot to cut the BU lead to 10-5, but three more BU goals, two from Lewis and one from Sarah Dalton, put the game out of reach with just over eight minutes left.

McCarthy was replaced in goal by Krissy Anderson with just over five minutes remaining. The redshirt junior left the game having surrendered 15 goals and saving nine. Anderson gave up one more goal and saved two.

The BU starters, including Hauser and Lewis, managed to stay in the game despite the insurmountable lead.

They out-shot the Minutewomen 32-21, including 18-9 in the second, and held a 13-9 advantage in draw controls.

"They have some studs on the team," Bolduc said. "They have more than one, two or three [stars] — they all can shoot, they all can finish. There were some breakdowns defensively where we needed to step up and take control. Possession was a problem for us, too."

Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Week Kayt McCormick, who was held scoreless after scoring four in the season opener, went down clutching her head with seven minutes left in the game. She was treated on the sideline, and did not return. Bolduc said she is OK, and will play Saturday.

COE, NRE host Community College Day at UMass

By Derrick Perkins
Collegian Correspondent

The 31st-annual Community College Day, hosted by the College of Engineering (COE) and the College of Natural Resources and the Environment (NRE), was held on Thursday in the Lincoln Campus Center.

This is the first year that departments from the NRE have participated in the program.

Students and faculty from the 15 community colleges across Massachusetts were invited to attend the program which focused largely on bringing qualified engineering transfer students into the University of Massachusetts at Amherst. The one-day program included a discussion on curriculum between faculty from both UMass Amherst and the Commonwealth's community colleges, a panel discussion with past transfer students and tours of the lab facilities of both the COE and the NRE.

Following a quick overview of the admissions process, university requirements and financial aid information, UMass students Josh Rubero, Jessica Nimmons and Matt Detka answered a wide variety of questions for the attending community college students. The subject matter ranged from class sizes to the University's alcohol policy. Along with moderator Greg Brown, director of the multicultural engineering program, the three fielded questions from an audience of 90 community college students during the hour-long panel discussion.

Brian Schwarz, director of recruitment and transfer affairs of the COE and the program organizer for the past five years, considers the goal of the program to make potential transfer students comfortable with the University and with both the COE and NRE.

"I travel to eight out of the 15 community colleges on a yearly basis to recruit these students," said Schwarz. "This is one way that I can get them to interface with faculty, take tours of the lab facilities, get information from admissions [and] financial aid and they can do it all in one package."

Many of the students transferring from the Commonwealth's community colleges are women or minorities.

These are students, according to Schwarz, who have faced adversity in trying to reach higher education. Schwartz believes that the program is essential to bringing more diversity to the COE and to UMass Amherst as a whole.

"They may not be able to afford to come to UMass right from high school. Sometimes they are first-generation. Sometimes they come from single-parent families that cannot afford to send them straight to a four-year institution," he said of the potential transfer students.

Several of the students registered in the program listed the cost of four-year colleges and universities as one reason that they had chosen to go to a community college after high school, but it was not the only factor in their decision.

"It's cheaper," said William Kane of the Springfield Technical Community College (STCC). "It's closer to home and you get basically the same education."

Another STCC student, Laurent Lundy, saw community college as a way to consider his options as well as a less costly alternative to a four-year college.

"Community college was the best way to go to actually have an idea of exactly where I wanted to head in the future. As a result, I'm here today after realizing that I want to do civil engineering," he said.

Many of these students also listed UMass Amherst as only one of several four-year colleges or universities that they planned to transfer into.

About 70 students transfer into the COE each fall, 40 of which come from community colleges either as regular transfer students or joint admissions students, according to Brian Schwarz. The remaining 30 come from the other UMass campuses and private institutions.

Student accused of causing fire withdraws from University

By Matt Belliveau

The University of Massachusetts student who reportedly caused the fire in the Coolidge dorm last week has withdrawn from the University, according to UMass officials.

"I can tell you that this student is no longer a student at the University, and we do not expect him to return to the University," said Director of the UMass News Office Ed Blaguszewski.

Blaguszewski declined to say whether the student was expelled or withdrew of his own accord.

UMass officials are also moving through disciplinary procedures for the 22 students who failed to leave the dorm during the fire alarm.

Blaguszewski said students who failed to heed fire alarms and evacuate the building have been put on "interim suspension," in which they face disciplinary hearings before Dean of Students Jo-Anne Vanin but can still live on campus and attend classes.

Those students were discovered in their rooms by Amherst Fire Department firefighters, who reported them to the administration, officials said. Under the University's code of conduct, candles are not allowed in dormitories and students must evacuate when a fire alarm sounds.

"It's putting [their] on notice that based on what we know, this sort of behavior is not acceptable," Blaguszewski said to the Hampshire Gazette, terming the alleged infractions "endangering behavior" under the code.

Students displaced by Sunday evening's fire in Southwest's Coolidge Hall returned to their dorms Tuesday as the investigation into the cause of that fire continued.

The Amherst Fire Department continued via press release that the fire was "caused by an unattended candle in room 1711" and was "accidental in nature."

House Republicans will try to squash Bush's ports deal

By Liz Sidoti
Associated Press

(AP) — One of the most prominent House Republicans on military issues said Thursday he would try to scuttle a Dubai-based company's effort to manage U.S. ports as lawmakers' complaints about the Bush administration's handling of the issue continued to spread.

"Dubai cannot be trusted," said Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., chairman of the House Armed Services Committee and normally one of the administration's most trusted allies. He called the United Arab Emirates "a bazaar for terrorist nations" and asserted that the United States should not permit DP World to take over significant operations at six U.S. ports.

"I intend to do everything I can to kill the deal," Hunter said.

Across Capitol Hill, lawmakers criticized the Bush administration anew following disclosures that the United States had launched a fresh investigation Tuesday into a proposed business deal by a second Dubai-owned company. Also sparking the furor was word of a previously unconfirmed investigation into a separate transaction by a leading Israeli software firm.

The government initially approved DP World's $6.8 billion purchase of London-based Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co. But on Sunday, the administration agreed to a 45-day investigation of potential security risks to quell a political backlash.

"Too little, too late," Hunter said.

Opening a hearing on the matter, Hunter said it was "quite remarkable" that the administration did not initially undertake a full review of security implications, given that the company is owned by the United Arab Emirates — "a bazaar for terrorist nations to receive prohibited components from sources from the free world and from the non-free world."

Hunter listed instances between 1994 and 2003 in which he said the country helped move materials for weapons of mass destruction, such as heavy water and high-speed electrical switches, to Pakistan, Iran and other countries. He plans to introduce legislation that would require U.S. companies to be the sole owners of infrastructure critical to national security.

The chairman's sharp remarks underscore the political tempest the White House has run into at a time when events in Iraq and renewed interest in the administration's failures in responding to Hurricane Katrina have pushed President Bush's popularity downward.

Sen. John Warner, R-Va., chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, has sided with the administration on the DP World deal. He and the White House have praised the United Arab Emirates as a key ally in the fight against terrorism.

Congressional GOP leaders want to wait for the results of the administration's new DP World investigation before considering legislation to delay or block the deal.

House Democrats tried to force a debate and vote on legislation Thursday that would require the 45-day security review and congressional approval of the takeover. That effort failed on a procedural, largely party-line vote.

Leading Democrats on the House Homeland Security Committee also asked the administration for details about all pending reviews of foreign business deals and any that have been conducted since the Sept. 11, 2001 terror attacks.

Democrats want Katrina probe

Former Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) director Michael Brown testifies before a special congressional panel investigating the agency's response to Hurricane Katrina.

By Margaret Ebrahim
Associated Press

Democratic lawmakers accused the Bush administration on Thursday of withholding information about the federal response to Hurricane Katrina, following disclosure of a videotape of a pre-Katrina briefing for the president and other top officials.

The video, obtained by The Associated Press, "confirms what we have suspected all along," said Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada, charging that administration officials have "systematically misled the American people."

Reid and House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi of California renewed their calls for an independent commission to investigate the federal response to the hurricane, which left New Orleans flooded and killed more than 1,500 people in Louisiana and Mississippi.

The House and Senate have conducted separate investigations of the federal response, and the White House did its own investigation. House Democrats for the most part refused to participate in the House probe, insisting since last fall that an independent commission should be created to handle the probe.

"I try not to get angry, but I am plenty frustrated that we're not getting answers" from the administration, said Rep. Charlie Melancon, D-La., one of the few Democrats who participated in the House investigation. "If nobody was hiding anything, why did the committee not get the documents it requested? We need to use subpoenas if necessary to get those documents."

Sen. David Vitter, R-La., said the video "makes it perfectly clear once again that this disaster was not out of the blue or unforeseeable. It was not only predictable; it was actually predicted. That's what made the failures in response — at the local, state and federal level — all the more outrageous."

A spokesman for Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va., who headed the House investigation, said there was nothing new in the tape and accompanying transcripts.

"Top federal, state and local officials failed to process and act on information at their disposal," said David Marin, the spokesman. "We already knew that."

But Rep. Bennie Thompson (news bio, voting record), D-Miss., the ranking Democrat on the House Homeland Security Committee, disagreed.

"If a picture is worth a thousand words, a video must be worth a million," he said. "Six months after Hurricane Katrina destroyed the homes and livelihoods of millions along the Gulf Coast, the truth about what the president knew and when he knew it has come to light."

The videotape captured a briefing, one day before Katrina struck on Aug. 29, involving then-Federal Emergency Management Agency head Michael Brown, President Bush, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and other officials. Brown and others warned that the storm could breach levees, endanger lives in the New Orleans Superdome and overwhelm rescuers.

Five days after the briefing, with most of New Orleans underwater, Bush said, "I don't think anybody anticipated the breach of the levees."

White House and Homeland Security officials urged the public not to read too much into the video footage.

"I hope people don't draw conclusions from the president getting a single briefing," presidential spokesman Trent Duffy said Wednesday, citing a variety of orders and disaster declarations Bush signed before the storm made landfall. "He received multiple briefings from multiple officials, and he was completely engaged at all times."

The White House did not immediately respond Thursday to the renewed Democratic calls for an independent investigation.

During the briefing, Brown expressed concern that there weren't enough disaster teams to help evacuate the Superdome.

"I'm concerned about ... their ability to respond to a catastrophe within a catastrophe," Brown told his bosses the day before the hurricane hit.

Later, Bush reassured federal, state and local disaster relief officials who were participating by teleconference. "We are fully prepared."

Senate approves Patriot Act

By Laurie Kellman
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Senate on Thursday gave its blessing to the renewal of the USA Patriot Act after adding new privacy protections designed to strike a better balance between civil liberties and the government's power to root out terrorists.

The 89-10 vote marked a bright spot in President Bush's troubled second term as his approval ratings dipped over the war in Iraq and his administration's response to Hurricane Katrina. Renewing the act, Bush and congressional Republicans said, was key to preventing more terror attacks in the United States.

Bush applauded the Senate for overcoming "partisan attempts to block its passage." The House was expected to approve the two-bill package next week and send it to the president, who would sign it before 16 provisions expire March 10.

"This bill will allow our law enforcement officials to continue to use the same tools against terrorists that are already used against drug dealers and other criminals, while safeguarding the civil liberties of the American people," Bush said in a statement from India.

Critics held their ground. A December filibuster led by Sen. Russell Feingold, D-Wis., and joined by several libertarian-leaning Republicans, forced the Bush administration to agree to modest new curbs on the government's power to probe library, bank and other records.

Feingold insisted those new protections are cosmetic.

"Americans want to defeat terrorism and they want the basic character of this country to survive and prosper," he said. "They want both security and liberty, and unless we give them both — and we can if we try — we have failed."

Some lawmakers who voted for the package acknowledged deep reservations about the power it would grant to any president.

"Our support for the Patriot Act does not mean a blank check for the president," said Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada, who voted to pass the bill package. "What we tried to do on a bipartisan basis is have a better bill. It has been improved."

Not enough even for the bill's chief sponsor in the Senate, Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa. After prolonged negotiations produced a House-Senate compromise, Specter urged his colleagues to pass it even as he promised to introduce a new measure and hold hearings on how to fix it.

For now, Bush and his Republican allies savored a significant victory. For months, their tough-on-terror image has been tarnished by the revelation that the president authorized a secret domestic wiretapping program. The report in December gave Democrats ammunition for their charge that the Bush administration had run amok in its zeal to root out terrorists.

With the help of some Republicans, they blocked a vote on whether to renew the law before 16 provisions expired on Dec. 31.

GOP leaders were unable to break the gridlock, so Congress opted instead to extend the deadline twice while negotiations continued. In the end, the White House and the Republicans broke the stalemate by crafting a second measure that would curb some powers of law enforcement officials seeking information. Both will be sent as a package to Bush.

This second bill — in effect an amendment to the measure renewing the 16 provisions — would add new protections to the 2001 anti-terror law in three areas.

Rumsfeld says impatience in war mirrors Cold War's

By Matt Sedensky
Associated Press

INDEPENDENCE, Mo. — The number of U.S. troops in Iraq should not be so big that they appear to be an occupying force, despite recent spikes in sectarian violence, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said Thursday.

Speaking at the Harry S. Truman Presidential Museum and Library, Rumsfeld said the United States has to "keep avoiding filling every vacuum and if we're around that place with too many people we tend to fill every vacuum. And that's not a healthy thing."

He said America needs to have enough military forces there to support the fledgling government and the development of a new political system, but not so many that it will feed the insurgency and make Iraqis think the United States is there only for oil.

"You don't want too many people there that you look like an occupying force, that the insurgents and the terrorists are able to lie to people and say you're only there for their oil, that you're there to occupy the country, that you intend to stay there permanently — all of which is false," said Rumsfeld.

There are 133,000 U.S. troops in Iraq, a figure Pentagon officials have said they would like to pare below 100,000 by year's end. Rumsfeld used no numbers in his remarks.

Nearly three years after the U.S. invasion of Iraq and with almost 2,300 Americans dead there, the Bush administration has been under public and congressional pressure to begin drawing down its force.

Rumsfeld also said that America's impatience and political division over the war on terror mirrors disagreements during the Cold War.

He said that during the Cold War the nation was tired after World War II and not in the mood "for more global involvement."

During the Cold War, he said, "the future then too was unclear, the tasks often seemed insurmountable, and it was difficult to view things with the perspective that only history can offer."

He said President Truman and other American leaders pressed ahead in the confrontation against communism, bolstering democracies in Western Europe.

While today's enemy is a "shadowy movement of terrorist cells," not an empire, Rumsfeld said it is an equally long war that will require Americans to gird for a sustained struggle.

The surge in violence in Iraq was triggered by the Feb. 22 bombing of a sacred Shiite shrine in Samarra. U.S. officials have been struggling to hold together negotiations between Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish leaders aimed at forming an inclusive government in the war-torn country.

Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld delivers testimony on the Defense Authorization Request for Fiscal Year 2007 and the Future Years Defense Program before the Senate Tuesday.

Nurse who killed 29 patients given life sentence

By Colin McMahill
Associated Press

SOMERVILLE, N.J. — A nurse who killed at least 29 patients was sent to prison for the rest of his life Thursday after his victims' loved ones angrily branded him "vermin," "garbage" and a "monster" who ruined lives and shattered their faith in the medical profession.

Charles Cullen — one of the most prolific killers the U.S. health care industry has ever seen — escaped the death penalty after making a deal with prosecutors to tell them which patients he killed with hard-to-detect drug injections.

He received 11 consecutive life terms at a tense and sometimes turbulent hearing in which he came face-to-face with his victims' families for the first time. Wearing a bulletproof vest under his sweater, Cullen sat quietly as relatives wept and yelled at him from a lectern about 15 feet from where he sat.

"You betrayed the ancient foundations of the healing professions," Superior Court Judge Paul Armstrong said as Cullen stood motionless, his eyes closed.

Cullen, 46, pleaded guilty to murdering 22 people in New Jersey and trying to kill three others. He will be sentenced later for seven murders and three attempted murders in Pennsylvania.

Cullen has claimed to have killed up to 40 people during a career that spanned 16 years and 10 nursing homes and hospitals.

He was fired from five nursing jobs and resigned from two others amid questions about his practices. But he always managed to find another job, in part because hospitals did not share their suspicions for fear of being sued.

New Jersey lawmakers have since passed legislation protecting nursing homes and hospitals from legal action when reporting disciplinary actions taken against employees.

About 60 relatives of the victims attended the sentencing, calling him "trash," "one pathetic little man" and "an agent from the deepest depths of Hell." As the family members spoke, he kept his eyes closed, frustrating some of the relatives.

"In case he forgot what my mother looked like, look into my eyes now," said Richard J. Stoecker, whose mother was murdered in 2003.

Some family members said they wished Cullen could die as his victims did, by lethal injection.

"I want you to die tomorrow so that you can meet God tomorrow because guess what? There ain't no door out of hell, baby," said Debra Yetter Medina, the granddaughter of victim Mary Natoli.

Cullen declined to make a statement, telling the judge he had "nothing to say," and disappointing families who had hoped to hear him explain why he committed the crimes.

John Shumagher, whose father was murdered, said his family "will never feel safe in a hospital again. We will never feel we can trust the medical profession again."

Dolores Stasenko of Kitty Hawk, N.C., said Cullen "will always be known as the monster." She held a photo of her father, Giacomino "Jack" Toto, 89, who was murdered in 2003.

"After today, we will finally toss aside his name and face, like the garbage he is," said Emily Stoecker, whose mother-in-law, Eleanor, was killed.

Other relatives talked of how the killings ruined marriages, careers and report cards.

"My heart, it aches for my son," said Mary Strenko, whose 21-year-old son was Charles Cullen's youngest victim. "I walk around with a hole in my heart."

Cullen has admitted to using lethal doses of medications — usually the heart medication digoxin — to kill patients. He told authorities when he was arrested in 2003 that he killed "very sick" patients, and described the slayings as mercy killings.

Many of the deaths were not recognized as murders at the time, in part because many of the victims were old or sickly. Cullen was finally caught after officials at Somerset Medical Center in Somerville began noticing that patients who died or nearly did had unusually high levels of digoxin in their bodies.

Cullen agreed to help investigators solve his killings. In exchange, prosecutors in all seven counties where he worked agreed not to seek the death penalty.

Because of the frailties of his memory and imprecise — and in some cases, destroyed — medical records, it is unclear whether authorities have identified all of his victims. Investigations remain open in two New Jersey counties.

Twenty lawsuits have been filed against the facilities where Cullen worked.

In other similar cases around the country, nurse's aide Donald Harvey pleaded guilty in 1987 to at least 34 murders in Ohio and Kentucky and was sentenced to life in prison, and coronary-care nurse Robert Diaz was convicted in 1986 of killing 12 elderly patients in California with lethal doses of heart drugs.

Some family members said they were satisfied with Cullen's sentence, while others complained it will do little to end their suffering.

Critics slam India nuclear deal

By Carol Giacomo
Associated Press

(AP) — U.S. critics accused President George W. Bush on Thursday of selling out weapons non-proliferation goals in order to close a landmark nuclear deal with New Delhi, hardening battle lines as the U.S. Congress prepares to debate its fate.

Congress and the 44-nation Nuclear Suppliers Group must both approve the agreement, which would allow India, after three decades of pariah status, access to billions of dollars in U.S. and other foreign atomic technology and fuel to meet its soaring energy needs.

Although many U.S. lawmakers favor closer ties with the world's largest democracy, non-proliferation advocates said details that had so far emerged suggest Bush gave away too much in the nuclear agreement in an effort to ensure a successful summit with Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh in New Delhi.

Democratic Rep. Edward Markey of Massachusetts said the accord "undermines the security not only of the United States, but of the rest of the world."

"With one simple move the president has blown a hole in the nuclear rules that the entire world has been playing by and broken his own word to assure that we will not ship nuclear technology to India without the proper safeguards," said Markey, co-chair of the bi-partisan task force on non-proliferation.

Daryl Kimball of the Arms Control Association faulted the White House for a "rush to meet artificial deadlines [that] sold out core non-proliferation values" in favor of a deal that would "implicitly endorse, if not indirectly assist, the further growth of India's nuclear arsenal."

Until Thursday's deal, Washington and New Delhi were divided on how India will separate its military and civilian nuclear plants, opening the latter to international inspections as a hedge against weapons proliferation.

Officials said India agreed to list 14 of its 22 reactors as civilian and open them to international inspection.

But experts said the fast-breeder reactors — a major sticking point in negotiations — appeared to be exempt, or at most inspections would be at India's discretion, and many more facilities — research reactors, reprocessing facilities and spent fuel stockpiles — also look to be excluded from safeguards.

"It's a sweetheart deal for India."

The administration told Congress the agreement would be about the growth of India's electricity and not the growth of Indian bomb making potential and that standard clearly has not been met," said Michael Krepon of the Henry L. Stimson Center.

Rep. Ed Royce of California, chairman of the House subcommittee on international terrorism and non-proliferation and a member of Bush's Republican party, said there is enthusiastic support in Congress for growing U.S.-India ties.

"However, the U.S.-India agreement on civil nuclear cooperation has implications beyond U.S.-India relations. In this process, the goal of curbing nuclear proliferation should be paramount. Congress will continue its careful consideration of this far-reaching agreement," Royce said.

Bush, at a news conference, acknowledged the agreement will be difficult to sell to Congress but was confident he could defend it as being in the United States's interest.

Ron Somers, president of the U.S.-India Business Council, which is leading a lobbying campaign on behalf of the nuclear agreement, said by telephone from New Delhi that there is no question that Congress supports deepening ties with India. But asked whether the deal can win legislative approval, he said "we must succeed. This is too important not to succeed."

Calif. Board of Education rejects edits of textbooks

By Sawsan Morrar
The California Aggie (UC-Davis)

DAVIS, Calif. — Our textbooks told us lies as children. There is misleading or outright wrong information about religion or history in the texts of most students. This past week, textbooks faced more lies at the California State Board of Education meeting only prevented by some local professors, faculty and community members.

At a special committee meeting before the State Board of Education, Hindu nationalists attempted to change Indian history in their favor by erasing the caste system, among other edits. The board voted unanimously to reject the many contentious changes proposed.

The two groups suggesting edits in the depiction of ancient Indian history and Hinduism, the Vedic Foundation and the Hindu Education Foundation, are linked to the Hindu right-wing movement.

According to UC Davis South Asia historian James Heitzman, some of the proposed changes were necessary to accurately depict the Hindu faith. However, according to the Friends of South Asia Web site, in many cases these groups were trying to make corrections to erroneous texts, which would "reflect their supremacist and chauvinistic political agendas."

Heitzman and many other professors grew concerned when they became aware of the political agenda behind the proposed changes.

The goal of Indian nationalists, according to Heitzman, is to define citizens of India as Hindu. Since not all Indians are Hindu, this ideology would marginalize other religions, including Islam, Sikhism and Christianity.

A commission of three India experts, Michael Witzel from Harvard, Stanely Wolpert from UCLA and Heitzman, was immediately created in response to the proposed changes.

Textbook cycles last approximately five years. The Board of Education approves textbooks for all subjects, but the actual textbooks are chosen by the school districts. A state will generally approve three to four textbooks, offering loose control.

This year, the history textbooks of sixth through eighth grades were brought to the school board's attention.

Sixth-grade history books deal largely with belief systems of several different religions such as Judaism, Islam and Hinduism.

In early 2005, the VF and HEF looked at the textbooks and recommended a number of changes in each.

Heitzman had a chance to look at all the textbooks as well.

"They are uniformly terrible," he said. "The treatment of Hinduism is decades out of date."

Asian American Studies professor Sunaina Maira said that while the Hindu right-wing groups were right that changes need to be made, they incorrectly define India for Hindus.

"As a professor and as someone who grew up in India, I think textbooks are portraying history in a Western context," she said. "I am against portraying monkeys [in reference to India] Other things are much more subtle, that many people are confused about."

To address the changes that needed to be made, the State Board of Education created a committee that would decide on the content of the changes. Some members of the committee were professors who supported the Hindu right-wing efforts of HEF and VF, which threatened to result in the inclusion of some controversial information.

In the Glencoe/McGraw-Hill textbook, it was recommended to change "men had many more rights than women" to "men had different duties."

Information on the "untouchables," India's lowest and poorest caste, was recommended to be changed as well. The original text stated that this group preformed "dirty work" such as collecting trash and skinning animals However, HEF recommended "its members were called untouchables because they performed dirty work such as skinning animals."

In other textbooks, it was recommended that the caste system be completely removed. Lower-caste community members from the Dalit community in Sacramento attended the Board of Education meeting to object to the literal deletion of their identity in the history books.

One change that surprised Heitzman was the HEF's effort to impose the idea that Aryans were indigenous to India.

"This would mean that Irish and English languages, for example, were from India, rather than the other way around," Heitzman said. "No serious scholars believe this thesis."

On Monday, the Board of Education met to decide what changes would be made. In all, 70 to 80 percent of the changes were rejected.

Maira said this is not a new issue, and that the Hindu right-wing groups have been doing a lot of planning for these edits The South Asian population in America has well over 1 million members, who represent a potential base for lobby support.

"The money is there," Heitzman said. "It is not surprising that they are reflecting their political muscle The whole experience was positive because good information got in."

Resident assistant assistance

Duncan Delvin

Whether you love them, hate them or are one, if you live in the dorms you have to deal with them. RAs, or "resident assistants," as they are properly known, are those wonderful people who live in the dorms on every floor, put there by their outstanding performance in some area deemed valuable to the community and meant to assist us in our task of living as college students. Some RAs do a splendid job at this and have earned their rewards. Some have not done so well, and their passing is viewed with about as much regret as the end of a plague. Here are your most popular categories of RAs.

THE FRIENDLY RA:

This is the kind of person we expected to have working such a position since we watched "Saved by the Bell: The College Years." These people maintain their halls and floors, put up display boards and are never afraid to be a friend to any resident. They remember being a student themselves and have a firm understanding of the give-and-take that occurs within a college community. Their presence is rarely felt, but often appreciated.

THE DISCIPLINARIAN:

Some people should just not be RAs. There seems to be some sort of sick power that comes from being able to tell people not to have fun in their own homes. These people are only seen when making obtrusive knocks on residents' doors, most often attempting to end a perfectly good party, asking for a noise reduction (because how dare young people listen to music), or being anal retentive about some policy that the resident only agreed to because they got hit with the rule after moving in. This person maintains all authority, not through respect, but through fear.

THE FREE SINGLE:

It must be nice to live in the dorms without having to pay for a room. On top of that, they get a double-single. This was the main inspiration in taking the job, and due to a lack of write-ups for noise and alcohol violations, and a tendency to suck up to disciplinarians, they were readily accepted into the role. The only time we see these people is at floor meetings, and their doors have an ominous feeling of "do not disturb."

THE COOL DUDE:

There are definitely a number of good RAs out there. For instance, my freshman RA taught me how to break many rules without getting caught, how to know my own limit for alcohol and gave me all of the good advice for judiciary hearings (be honest if it kills ya). On top of that, he offered me lots of advice on living with a roommate, finding classes and was overall a great influence upon the floor.

He took a backseat to discipline, using his authority only when necessary, and let the floor form into a community. We all appreciated this man for creating such an environment, and the friends I met then still reminisce about how much cooler he was than most RAs.

THE NEVER THERE:

Have you ever had an RA that is just not around? She can be seen on rounds from time to time, but never in the room or her door is always closed. You have no idea which face belongs to her, as she has not taken the time to introduce herself to the rest of the floor. This person is always willing to lend a helping hand, as long as it does not interfere with homework, AIM or socializing with friends you will never meet. Mostly, you will know this person only by the construction paper cutout on the door.

THE SCHOOL MASCOT:

Some people, in my opinion, just have too much spirit. They show up to every UMass event wearing maroon and might even dye their hair red. This is fine, but when every organized floor event involves some sort of sports occasion, it gets a little obsessive. The interests of the RA do not necessarily reflect the interests of the floor. We often either embrace these people for the interests we share with them, or we hide from them in the hopes that they will not notice the big flag supporting UConn.

These are just a sampling of the most popular groups of RAs. Some, such as the "sloppy drunk" or the "join my sorority" did not make the list, as there are not quite enough of them, and their names are descriptive enough to just skip the detail. We can mostly agree on which ones are the good ones and which are the bad, but many administrators would tell you very differently. Whatever story these people have, we live with them, and whether we like or hate them, all of them are here to stay.

Let children eat what they want

Katelyn Harding

Parents love having control over their children's lives. Control over who they are friends with, what movies they see, what they wear … what they eat for lunch. Imagine not being able to eat a cupcake with your lunch at school because your parents have restricted you from doing so. Sounds crazy, but in Houston, Texas, parents have complete control over what their children consume during their lunch period. The parents would like to see more greens and less grease. Children should eat healthy; I concur to that statement, but restricting them from eating a brownie every now and then is just plain dumb.

As I was skimming CNN.com last week, I came across an article that discussed prepaid cafeterias. These establishments have been around for five to 10 years, but the implementation of parents actually restricting which foods their kids ingest is a new development. I agree with how prepaid meal plans lessen the chance of children losing their lunch money during school hours, but that is the only thing I agree with.

According to the article, "'If parents want Johnny to eat chips one day a week, they can go in and make changes to allow them to buy a bag of chips on, say, Fridays,' said Terry Abbott, spokesman for Houston Independent School District, the nation's seventh-largest with more than 250,000 students."

Talk about lack of spontaneity. What if a kid just has a hankering for a bag of Doritos? He has to wait until Friday? What if by Friday he wants an ice cream instead? Oh, now he has to wait until next Wednesday, which is ice cream day. With all the problems that America has today, I do not think that monitoring bags of chips and squares of brownies that children eat during their lunchtime is anything to worry about.

A child eating a brownie for lunch, in addition to healthful foods, cannot be that detrimental to his health. Especially if they are still in high school — kids are still very active at this age, and could use that brownie for energy later on for their extracurricular activities.

In my high school, I can remember playing basketball, softball, track and I did the swim team for all four years, and let me tell you, those bags of chips and squares of cake at lunch were greatly appreciated and entirely exercised off. Parents need to chill out and enjoy the Fritos; life's too short for apples and celery all the time.

Parents need to chill out and enjoy the Fritos; life's too short for apples and celery all the time.

The argument of the parents who monitor their children's food intake could only be beneficial for one reason, which is child obesity. According to CNN.com, "in the past 20 years, the number of overweight children ages six to 11 more than doubled and the number of overweight adolescents ages 12 to 19 more than tripled, according to the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention."

Alright, so children have been getting heavier over the years. That's what sports and after-school activities are for. Parents can monitor their children's food during lunchtime all they want, but if they also give them X-Boxes and Gamecubes, how do you prevent a child from using those, and therefore adding to their laziness? Granted, the children are not eating unhealthy food, but they are sitting in one spot, not getting any exercise; could you say this is comparable?

I bet the children who get denied the food they want at school rush home before their parents get home and shove every unhealthy food that is in their refrigerator into their mouths in a feeding frenzy. Parents can try to control their kids eating habits, but children always get what they want, one way or another. If you restrict a child from something, that just creates a deeper desire within the child, who will rebel at the word "no."

If parents are denying their kids junk food and not giving them many options, children will just become confused and angry, and feel as though their parents are exerting unnecessary and embarrassing control over their eating habits.

Karen Cullen, an associate professor of pediatrics at the Children's Nutrition Research Center at the Baylor College of Medicine in Houston, cautions that "the system is good only if it sparks communication between parents and their children on healthy food choices. Kids need to be able to make healthy choices. Parents can't be in charge. Children need some freedom." Pass the cake, Karen.

U.S. lacks in language education

World Perspectives

Ben Duffy

It was the torrid summer of 2003, and I was living in Germany. I met a girl there named Alex, and even though I only knew her for a few weeks, I will never forget her larger-than-life personality. Alex and I were known to stay up drinking 'til dawn. She had a lot of good qualities, but she could also be a bitter, hateful person, you might even call her a bigot. The list of people she hated was long, including Turks, Catholics, blacks and Americans.

This makes you wonder why she would hang out with me, a Catholic American. During our long nights drinking wine, she was known to go off on angry tirades about the various groups she despised. I requently, that target was Americans. "God bless America," she once shrieked at me, without the slightest provocation.

I shrugged my shoulders meekly. "Yeah what's wrong with that?" I asked. "God bless America. How about God bless the world?" God bless the world, she meant, except Turkey, the United States, and anywhere where blacks or Catholics live.

Nonetheless, I can get behind such a slogan, even if she was hypocritical for using it. God bless the world. God bless Germany. God bless Iraq. Afghanistan. Costa Rica and Croatia. Just because a person expresses a sense of patriotism in his own country (i.e., "God bless America"), it doesn't mean that he doesn't want God's grace to fall on all of the world's people.

Unfortunately, that's how many people understand this expression of American patriotism: God bless America to the exclusion of all others. One reason for this, of course, is that Americans have a reputation for being insular. Everything we know, and everything we care about, is located within the borders of the United States. We lack a healthy sense of international curiosity. We don't travel outside of our own country. We speak only English. We don't watch international news. If it isn't hamburgers and hip-hop, we don't care to learn about it.

Do we deserve such an unfortunate reputation? Well, it isn't as clear-cut as they paint it, but it does contain some truth. Our country is massive, and we can drive for hours in almost any direction, meeting only people who look like us, dress like us and speak English like us. On the whole North American continent, excluding the Caribbean and Central America, there are only two localities that speak another language other than English: Quebec and Mexico. Some would also say Holyoke, Massachusetts, but I won't go there.

On the whole North American continent, excluding the Caribbean and Central America, there are only two localities that speak another language other than English: Quebec and Mexico. Some would also say Holyoke, Massachusetts, but I won't go there.

Foreign language education is certainly lacking in the United States. I first started studying French in the eighth grade, and even then, it was only part of a special program. Most kids were not exposed to foreign language until high school, and even then it was optional. Many students at my school took a measly two years, and only because that was the entrance requirement for most universities. Some took none at all. The foreign language department at my school offered only two languages: French and Spanish, the chocolate and vanilla of foreign language education.

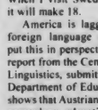
I guess I have foreign language in my blood. My mother is a French teacher. In high school, I studied four years of French and three years of Spanish. When I was 17, I saved up all my money I had earned washing dishes and spent three weeks in France.

Later on, I signed up to learn Arabic in the U.S. Army but was rejected for technical reasons. I still regret missing that opportunity. These days, I am majoring in German and studying at a German university. During my life, I've always enjoyed traveling and have managed to visit 17 countries. When I visit Sweden this spring, it will make 18.

America is lagging behind in foreign language education. To put this in perspective, consider a report from the Center for Applied Linguistics, submitted to the U.S. Department of Education. A table shows that Austrian children begin compulsory education of a foreign language (English) at the age of six. Czech students are required to study both German and English, starting at age nine.

It's embarrassing. American students are getting the short end of the stick. We need foreign language offered at a younger age, and it needs to be compulsory. Not only that, but why not expand the number of languages offered? French and Spanish are fine, although I'm a little concerned that the rush to learn Spanish because of Hispanic immigration is making other languages less popular.

If you're honestly interested in Spanish and Hispanic cultures, then by all means, study Spanish. If Spanish is not for you, then study Russian, Arabic, Swedish or Hindi. Study Mandarin Chinese; it only has 867 million speakers, making it the most spoken language in the world. All of these languages should be available in our public schools.



Think that's unrealistic? According to the same report listed above, Canadian and Finnish schools both offer six languages. Why are Americans stuck with plain old French and Spanish? We're just as good as Canada and Finland, and we should have schools that can compete with them.

There is no reason to be so focused on our own country, great as it is, that we have no idea about the rest of the planet. It's a great big world out there, and it offers more knowledge than any single human being can soak up in a lifetime.

As Americans, we should work to improve our cultural and linguistic literacy. As Secretary of Education (under the Clinton administration) Richard Riley concluded, foreign language education can build a better workforce, ensure national security, and improve other areas of education. Though I rarely find myself in agreement with people associated with Bill Clinton, we can both agree on this: America needs better foreign language education.

Television-induced depression

Kevin Dooley

In a speech made back in 1958, pioneer in broadcast journalism Edward R. Murrow told a gathering of broadcast colleagues, "This instrument can teach, it can illuminate; yes, it can even inspire, but it can only do so to the extent that humans are determined to use it to those ends. Otherwise, it is merely lights and wires in a box."

Murrow was referring to television, and when quiz and game shows (the first form of reality television, you could say) began to make their debut on the television scene as early as the 1950s, Murrow already saw television's decline. Well, now it's about a half century later, and I can only imagine what Murrow would have to say if he had the opportunity. It's become cliché to say Murrow would be rolling in his grave if he witnessed the state of television today. First of all, he was cremated, and second, how could he roll in his grave? He's dead.

It's been written many times that television is on the decline. It consumes too much of our day, and it has made us all lazy and stupid. These are some fair claims to make, but let me add one more to this list of growing problems caused by television: depression.

Yes, depression. Not the kind of depression you get when you turn on the nightly news and watch a game of Cowboys and Indians in the Middle East backfire continuously on the Bush administration. I'm talking about the depression you get when you turn on the tube and, instead of escaping everyday life, you are bombarded with shows depicting real life, i.e. reality television. Americans are getting a close look at some of the people that we share this great land of ours with, and if they're anything like me, they're not liking what they are seeing.

I'm sorry I pick on MTV, but it is just hideous, dreadful television. When executives over there decided that exploiting and ruining the music business was no longer fun, they decided to be innovators in the world of reality television.

Now we have shows like "Date My Mom," "Parental Control," "Sweet Sixteen" and of course, everyone's favorite, "Laguna Beach." I find many similarities between "Laguna Beach" and "The Charlie Brown" show; the most notable comparison being, where are their parents? How is it reality when you never show the parents? These kids live in a dream world. This show is not reality. It is a packaged soap opera.

Now, you may be saying, why don't you just turn it off? That's a reasonable solution, but the problem is that you are getting to see how low some people will go just to be famous; not to be really good at anything, but just famous, almost like it's an occupation nowadays. Reality television is like a drug. You feel good at first, or in the case of watching reality television, you feel glad you're not one of those people. Slowly but surely, you realize this is a bad habit you've gotten yourself into and you're just wasting your life away. You're not feeding your brain anything stimulating or informative except staged predicaments pretending to show reality.

As harmful as reality television may be to your health, I'm not going to go as far as to say reality television is as harmful as, say, cocaine and heroin, but let's just say it does nothing beneficial for you. I am sure, though, that there are some out there who, if they don't get the chance to watch the latest episode of the "Bachelor" or "American Idol," may go into a heroin-like withdrawal. It also doesn't hurt when television executives know the cost of producing a reality show is seemingly lower than the cost of heroin these days. For the record, yours truly does not take heroin.

I get the feeling, though, that the reason so many of us enjoy watching reality television is the fact that we get delight and a sense of satisfaction out of watching the failure and bad luck of others. "American Idol," for instance, gets some of its biggest ratings when they air the try-out shows.

I'll admit it's quite funny to watch these people get the most recognition they will get in their lifetime, but I think it says more about people like me and others who get a kick out of seeing others fall flat on their faces in their desire to be on television. Instead of enriching our minds or better informing ourselves, we are addicted to a never-ending cycle of wannabes looking to pursue a fake life.

The problem with television today, especially since the onslaught of reality shows hit the airwaves, is the diminishing role of real relationships, such as the ones with our family, in our lives. Television has become its replacement, as evidenced when you see parents on "Sweet Sixteen" being verbally and sometimes physically abused by their teenage daughter who, like many others, has a distorted view on life. Our values and morals are being replaced by a box with lights and wires.

'THE BOOKS' ARE BESTSELLERS AT THE IRON HORSE

By Alex Butler
Collegian Staff

"I have realized that the past and future are real illusions, that they exist in the present, which is what there is and all there is."
-Alan Watts, a philosopher

Alan Watts' individual way of Zen Buddhism speaks to many in a universal language. He tries to tell people, in countless ways, to free themselves of the chains of what has become accepted in our society and transcend to a higher plane of thought and being. He told us, more or less, to dance and sing. And for Nick Zammuto and Paul de Jong of "The Books," this is their way of thought, and it simply had to be retold through music.

The night of March 1 was icy and blue, but a healthy, sold-out crowd still found their way to the Iron Horse entrance at 8 p.m. The plan was to hear two acts: the stupefying "Books" and the subdued "Death Vessel."

Brownish purple. If I could describe "The Books's" opening act with one color, that would most certainly be it. For anyone who hasn't heard of "Death Vessel," the act may have been a tad bit confusing. The name suggests a trio of hardcore rockers who would jump onstage and blast metal until they were dragged offstage. When a dark-haired gentleman walked with a guitar in hand to the front of the stage, the crowd must have figured him a roadie. With no introduction, he began the night with a unique, one-man act. Except instead of a woody brown country voice that would have matched his appearance, the crowd experienced something completely reversed. This was a female voice, but a beautiful female voice that felt personal and warming. It was a country voice all right, but with a choir-filled quality to it.

As far as the crowd went, they seemed indifferent. Well, half of them anyway. The hall seemed split halfway between people that were hypnotized by the melody and people yapping all the way through it. But to the singer, this was not about them. This performance was very much for personal satisfaction, for practice and for gain. He closed his eyes and, in the ten minutes that he gave us, played his best. Quietly, he asked us to consider the merchandise to his left. He was a lonely young man, but keen on keeping himself on track. His show was inspiring.

Then, "The Books" stepped onstage. Now was the time for that chatty half of the audience to get serious. These were two gentlemen that you would not offend on purpose. It's a silly way to think, but I'm sure some people may have thought that way. A dark, damn dirty shame.

But they certainly deserved it. After releasing three inconceivable albums in the past several years, the couple has certainly earned itself a great deal of respect and awe with music lovers everywhere. The quiet and nervous duo situated themselves comfortably behind their respective instruments and shot us straight upward. In their eyes, they had a feeling and knowledge that they knew something more than what we did. And they would try to convey this ability on the screen behind them. Trippy and hypnotic video montages were played while the pair plugged away different rhythms. Their concentration was kept perfectly with each other, almost extensions of their own selves. Throughout the show, it was as if each would add a different solo on top on the other time after time.

"The Books's" music is one of the most difficult things to describe in words, as anyone who ever listened to it as a whole could plainly realize. They sample music and lay down different beats, voices, speeches and basically anything they can get their hands on.

Song requests were being shouted out at one point and the two musicians seemed perplexed.

"Oh, to tell you the truth, we actually don't know how to do those songs live yet," Nick Zammuto replied back.

This was a horse of a different color. Think of it: these two guys play music so precise and so intricate that they don't even bother trying to play it for audiences for fear that they will do it injustice. Again, this all sounds outrageous if you are thinking that "The Books" are another run-of-the-mill-type band. The complexity of their music really explains itself. What they did play was a dynamic set complete with a cello and a guitar, even playing their own rendition of Nick Drake's "Cello Song."

And so it went. The night was complete with mind-blowing, revolutionary music, followed by pure bewilderment from the audience. Alan Watts would be proud.

Oscar finds it hard to stomach 'Pimp' lyrics in new flick

By Timothy Finn
Knight Ridder Newspapers

In the category of songs, the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences aimed for genuine controversy, then settled for compromise.

When the hard-core rap "It's Hard Out Here for a Pimp" was nominated in the best original song category, it caused a stir. "Pimp" is a cut from "Hustle & Flow," a film about a Memphis pimp who wants to be a rapper.

It was written by the Memphis rap group "Three 6 Mafia," and it includes plenty of offensive language, including the "n-word" and terms that demean women.

"Pimp" also portrays the cut-throat street life in Memphis and one man's fight to survive and escape his violent surroundings.

However, viewers of tonight's Academy Awards show won't hear the version of the song that was nominated. Instead of what actor Terrence Howard, as DJay, performed in the movie, "Three 6 Mafia" will perform a sanitized version of "Pimp," which has been rewritten to appease the censors. Even with words, terms like "messed up" inserted in place of the obvious profanity, "Three 6 Mafia" will convey the song's inherent message, which is about how cheap and disposable life can be in some parts of America. And for that reason, it ought to win the award.

The two other nominees (and performers) are Kathleen "Bird" York for "In the Deep" from best picture nominee "Crash" and Dolly Parton for "Travelin' Thru" from "Transamerica." It's an odd, short field — the first time since 1980 that fewer than five songs have been nominated — that ignores worthwhile cuts from soundtracks like "Brokeback Mountain" and "Elizabethtown."

On the good side, however, this year's field is void of sweet, grand treacle from Diane Warren, James Horner, Elton John, Phil Collins and anything Disney.

Of this year's small group, Parton seems the likeliest winner. "Travelin'" is a redemptive, nostalgic country anthem, festooned with strings, banjo, fiddle and slide guitar. Much like Bob Dylan, who won for "Things Have Changed" (from "Wonder Boys") six years ago, Parton is an institution who commands interest, if not respect, from people who aren't even fans.

"In the Deep" is an appealing but innocuous slice of wispy, after-dinner indie-pop from Kathleen "Bird" York, who plays Andrea Wyatt on the TV drama "The West Wing." "Deep" is also a cut off her full-length studio album, "The Velvet Hour."

If "Pimp" wins, it will follow a precedent set two years ago, when Eminem won an Oscar for best original song for his infernal go-for-it rap, "Lose Yourself," from the movie "8 Mile." At least lyrically, "Pimp" is more unsuitable for prime-time audiences, primarily because it depicts (some would say exaggerates) the walk and talk of a more repugnant character.

Happy to be nominated and invited to perform, "Three 6 Mafia" cleaned up the words — but, one can only assume, not the ideas — that might offend. In case it hasn't applied enough cleanser, the network will use a five-second delay to help its censors, according to the group's attorney, Aaron Rosenberg.

"It's admirable that voters are recognizing the hip-hop generation and its influence on American culture," he told Reuters last week.

It's a compromise, for certain, but at this point, everyone involved seems to feel like a winner.

Japanese radio builds bridges

By Takafumi Tokumo
The Yomiuri Shimbun

GUANGZHOU, China — In the biggest city in southern China — population 7 million — and site of violent anti-Japanese protesters last April, every Friday at 3 p.m., a voice in Japanese comes on the radio.

"How are you everyone? I hope you'll enjoy the next 40 minutes with me," says Akiko Aoki, a nonfiction writer who has written a number of books including one on Chinese youth. She is known to her listeners in Guangzhou as Mingzi Xiaojie, meaning Miss Akiko in Chinese.

In the program, which started in October with the aim of introducing the latest J-pop, she talks — in Japanese — about contemporary Japan in between tracks by J-pop luminaries such as Ayumi Hamasaki, Ai Otsuka, and Porno Graffiti.

Aoki writes the script for the programs, which are recorded in one session once a month. One time, she talked about which Chinese movies were popular in Japan, while another time, she talked about the way the Japanese celebrate Valentine's Day, explaining, "It's a day for girls to confess their love to boys."

"Lucky boys," her Chinese colleague said.

Aoki first moved to Beijing in 1995. At the time, recession gripped Japan. Aoki was worried about losing her job, despite having been a writer for more than 10 years and running a planning and editing office in Tokyo.

She started recalling scenes she had seen on trips to China, scenes that refused to leave her mind. A couple of lovebirds sitting next to each other at the table of a food stall. Young people posing like movie stars in a park. As the country proceeded toward reform and liberalization, cities in China were upbeat. "I wanted to be part of it," she recalled.

Her first two years were spent learning the language. In 1998, she started working for a radio station in Beijing, hosting a program to introduce J-pop. The program was a hit, receiving dozens of requests every week. Some listeners said they began learning Japanese so they could understand lyrics.

Gradually, however, she felt a growing tide of anti-Japanese sentiment. A taxi driver asked her, "Is it true that Japan doesn't recognize its history of invasion?" — and a friend studying in China was criticized for not "knowing history."

"This is it," she thought. In 2001, she decided to return to Japan.

After returning to her hometown, she was surprised to see how Japanese feelings towards China had soured. At a bookstore in the city, there was a whole section devoted to anti-Chinese books.

To her, it seemed a negative chain reaction between the two countries was taking place, in which mutual distrust and feuding was becoming more pronounced.

"Young Chinese who listened to my radio program knew how it really was in Japan," she thought, and regretted giving it up. She knew she could write books to explain China to Japanese people and knowing that led her to think about what she could do to help Chinese people get to know Japan.

It did not take her long to decide to start a new radio program in China.

She was rushed off her feet looking for sponsors in Japan and trying to persuade broadcasters in both countries to air the show, explaining that it could contribute to an improved relationship.

In April last year, she finally found a station — Guangdong Satellite Radio Station, which has an audience share of 30 percent in Guangdong Province — that bought her idea.

They made their decision just after anti-Japanese demonstrations were held in Guangzhou. Having seen Japanese restaurants with smashed windows and Japanese firms removing their company signs, she could hardly believe it.

On the Internet Bulletin board for her program, there is a section where listeners can post their thoughts. "Why is it broadcast only in Guangzhou?" one wrote. "Start it in Beijing, too." Another asked, "Air the program at night, so more of us can listen," while one wrote, "Once a week isn't enough."

Comedies shrink to dumb laughs

By Christian Alexandersen
The Daily Athenaeum (West Virginia U.)

MORGANTOWN, W.Va. — Recently, comedies have been on the edge of a cliff slowly tipping its weight toward scatological humor and penis jokes and away from funny dialogue and witty banter.

The culprit: Rob Schneider.

While I do enjoy the occasional double-entendre and fart joke, Rob Schneider has been ruining the face of comedy for years. He proves that if you pay a B-rated actor enough money, he will consistently make terrible movies. Schneider also proves that no matter how many characters he plays, he cannot assume the most important role — a good actor.

Though Schneider has attempted such challenging roles as a male gigolo, a man made of various animal parts and a man-turned-hot chick, people might be surprised to find out these movies are not his only terribly unfunny choices.

My utter distaste and disgust for Schneider stemmed from a heated argument with my friend Noko, who, like me, is a movie connoisseur. When it comes to movies, we agree on everything except comedies because he has a love and deep respect for Schneider and his brand of humor.

"For my money, Rob Schneider is the most bankable fall-down comic in showbiz today, with neither middle age nor his other comic collaborators picking more serious roles getting in the way of his continuance in self-degrading and obnoxious humor," Noko argued. "He is the best of the best."

While I shy away from obvious humor like Schneider's, Noko and many others embrace his willingness to embarrass himself at age 43. Schneider's constant acceptance of terrible roles makes us ask the question: What makes a good comedy?

In 2005, two of the top 10 movies at the box office were comedies that involved romance, well-written characters and colorful banter and dialogue. According to the numbers, the world audience wants more smart humor rather than a movie that describes the sexual purpose of a "Portuguese Breakfast" or a "Turkish Snow Cone."

While sophomoric humor might be funny every once in a while, more and more comedies are taking the Rob Schneider route and moving films from actual comedies to grossly unfunny one-liners. We have to stop this epidemic, and I mean now.

Can you imagine it? All the theaters will be filled with movies like "Deuce Bigalow 3: Same Thing as 1 and 2" and "Scary Movie 5: Poop ... Ha Ha, We Said Poop."

It is the job of the consumers to boycott comedies that don't even involve humor, a.k.a. Rob Schneider movies.

The slow and steady decline in comedy is disheartening to a person like me who spends more time concentrating on TV and movies than concentrating on his assignments. Movies cannot survive when comedic hacks like Schneider take the spotlight away from good comedies with witty dialogue and a solid cast of characters.

I'm sure Schneider would be more bearable if he wasn't the only one attempting to tell jokes and carry the movie. Schneider is not a good actor at all, but when he has a good cast around him like in "Judge Dredd" and "The Beverly Hillbillies," he has a chance at mediocrity.

The next time you're at Blockbuster or rummaging through your roommate's DVD collection, don't go for the hour-and-a-half film with stupid one-liners and endless gay jokes, because we're better than that.

Club singer finds herself in Iraq

By Evelyn McDonnell
Knight Ridder Newspapers

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. — Before she watched soldiers shoot a man on the streets of Northern Iraq, before she talked to the woman who said that being imprisoned with her two children for triple homicide was better than the life she lived with the husband and in-laws she murdered, before she spent a month shooting a film in a language she did not speak, playing a victim of rape and familial abuse, in a beautiful but war-torn country, among people who had a violent feud with her own bloodline, Ozzie Aziz was just a normal, drag-queen-and-midget-loving, S&M-garbed, Madonna-wannabe club singer.

"Now I'm a recluse," the sometimes-South Florida nightlife queen says. "The more I travel and see stuff like this, the more it changes me as a person. It made me look at the world in a different way. These people have real problems, and they have smiles on their faces."

What kind of actress would venture to Iraq to shoot a low-budget indie release? London-born Aziz says she starred in her first feature film, "Bekhal's Tears," not to further her own career, but to make a statement for women's rights in a part of the world in which she has roots.

"Bekhal's Tears" is the result of the collaboration of two "soulmates" (Aziz's word) who are descended from ethnic groups locked in a historic conflict: Kurdish filmmaker Lauand Omar and Cypriot Turk Aziz.

A rare cinematic expression of Kurdish life, it's one of the first films to be shot in Iraq since the American invasion in 2003. The movie, sometimes amateurish in its shaky editing, shows the mountainous beauty of a region that has become synonymous with violence. It's a moving story of troubled, traditional people coming to terms with the weapons and ways of Western society, and particularly of a humble daughter determined to make a change.

"It's the first movie to address taboo issues in some Middle Eastern countries, such as rape, honor crimes where girls are beaten and even killed for having sexual or romantic contacts, forced marriage," says Omar in an e-mail interview from Iraq.

The vivacious, cosmopolitan Aziz seems light-years away from the modest villager Bekhal. (That's why they call it acting.) But just as the spark that causes the daughter to rebel and flee, her family burns bright in the actress. Bekhal changed Aziz's life.

"I had to play the opposite of how I am as a person," Aziz says. "When I first came on the set, everyone hated me, because I was from the West. That got me into character. It made me get rid of all my ego. I became that person."

Sitting in a sushi restaurant on Commercial Boulevard in Fort Lauderdale, Aziz is a woman in transition. She has a petite frame, topped with the sort of impressive decolletage that is found more often than Mother Nature intended among struggling South Florida starlets.

Her energy is huge. A raven-haired beauty with an infectious laugh, her ambition and talent have taken her from London's stages as a teen to modeling, singing and acting gigs around the world and finally to Fort Lauderdale, where she is signed as a recording artist to Bongiovi Entertainment (the company founded by rocker Jon Bon Jovi's brother Tony).

Her first single, "Let Me Be," was released to clubs in January. She and Omar wrote the song together. The house-music anthem is about a fetish-loving woman and a gay man who struggle against preconceptions and prejudice. "But it could be about anyone," Aziz says. She had to take the video, in which she plays a dominatrix, and other outre images off her Web site in order to not add fuel to the fire exploding around "Bekhal's Tears."

"We don't want anyone to get beheaded," she says, not laughing.

The difference between the stricken heroine of "Bekhal's Tears" and the naughty top of "Let Me Be" shows that, if nothing else, Aziz has versatility. "Ozzie is a chameleon," Omar says.

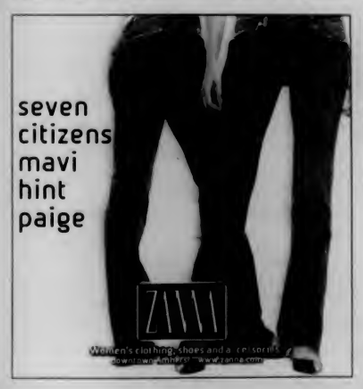
Omar wrote "Bekhal's Tears" after visiting Northern Iraq, where his father runs a cultural center. The Kurdistan regional government funded the film, which shows the police rescuing Bekhal and sending her to one of the women's shelters that are being established in Iraq. Omar says conversations with Iraq's young people, "the forgotten generation," inspired him to make the drama.

"I started to hear about the things that did not get discussed in public," Omar says. "The problems between the young and the old generation. The abuse. The honor killings. I wanted to do something."

Omar planned to shoot the film in Iraq and hire local actors and crew. But he says he realized that if he cast a Kurd in the role of a disgraced woman, he could put her in mortal danger. So he called his old friend. Far from being scared, Aziz says she was excited to see Iraq — maybe unrealistically so: "It never crossed my mind that I could get kidnapped and blown up. I love adventure."

"The hardest part was the language," Aziz says. She speaks Turkish but not Kurdish, the language of the film. She read a translation of the script, then memorized the sound of her lines without understanding the words. There was no rehearsal. The whole film was shot in two months for $50,000.

The set was heavily guarded. Aziz couldn't cross the street from Omar's father's compound without a guard. Thanks to his father's political influence, Aziz mostly felt safe. One time, she saw a man shot in the shoulder in a gun battle at a checkpoint. Another time, a suicide bomber was caught at a police station next door to where they were filming. Aziz's contact with Iraqis was limited, but she came to have a new understanding and great respect for them.



"What we see on CNN and the news is a pile of crap. There's a lot of beauty out there. The poorest person will share a piece of food with you. They're brought up in a hard way, but people really stand by each other."

"Bekhal's Tears" depicts a family not standing by each other, but turning on a daughter who brings "disgrace" after her fiancé rapes her. When the film premiered in Kurdistan, it got a standing ovation. "The young people loved it," Omar says. Then during the press conference, audience members accused the filmmakers of being outsiders showing a false picture of Iraq.

"I've never felt so much hatred in my life," Aziz says of the premiere. "Ninety percent of the questions were against us."

That kind of challenge inspires Omar and Aziz. They are preparing for their next film, also to be shot in Iraq. "Mistress of Mesopotamia" will be a horror flick that draws on classic Kurdish legends.

"There are a lot of interesting stories and talents in the Middle East that are just waiting to be shared with the whole world," Omar says.

Comic film to make 'History?'

By Brian McTavish
Knight Ridder Newspapers

Oscars for cinematography, production design and visual effects are all well and good. But will this be the year that a movie based on a comic-book story finally wins for something besides technical achievement?

Like its story, for instance?

Josh Olson hopes so, but he also knows that his script for "A History of Violence" — based on the 1997 graphic novel by writer John Wagner and artist Vince Lock — faces strong competition in the adapted screenplay category, including best picture frontrunner "Brokeback Mountain."

"I think those guys are shoo-ins," Olson said from Los Angeles. "It's an amazing film, an incredible script. I mean, I am genuinely in awe of the writing in 'Brokeback.' It's Larry McMurtry for God's sake."

Call Olson a realist or perhaps just appropriately respectful, after all, "A History of Violence" is his first studio film after years of writing for low-budget and direct-to-video projects.

Yet Olson's riveting screenplay about a small-town family man confronted by his brutal, big-city past has pushed enough artistic buttons to give "A History of Violence" a chance at making Oscar history. It joins other critically acclaimed films in recent years that have successfully challenged traditional expectations of comic-book movies as strictly superhero fare.

Those films include previous Oscar nominees for adapted screenplay, "American Splendor," the autobiographical story of eccentric, slice-of-life comics writer Harvey Pekar; and "Ghost World," the tale of two quirky teenage girls on the edge of adulthood.

Although it didn't receive a screenplay nod, the comic-book-based "Road to Perdition," the chronicle of a Depression-era hit man who seeks revenge on the mob, received six Oscar nominations, including best supporting actor (Paul Newman).

"A History of Violence," directed by fear auteur David Cronenberg, is also up for a best supporting actor statuette thanks to William Hurt's chillingly breezy portrayal of an evil crime boss.

But Olson, who calls himself "a big comics fan," doesn't see the words-and-pictures medium suddenly becoming an art form just because Oscar is taking notice.

"One of the things I loved about Michael Chabon's (Pulitzer Prize-winning novel) 'The Amazing Adventures of Kavalier and Clay' was how he kind of set the record straight: 'Comics have always been an art form,' Olson said. 'It's not that the art form has grown up. It's that the mainstream audience has figured it out.'"

But films are films and comics are comics. With rare exception — notably Robert Rodriguez's virtual panel-for-panel conversion of Frank Miller's comics into last year's crime noir film, "Sin City" — there are often big differences between the original comic and its adaptation. For example, "A History of Violence" deletes a major back story that makes the protagonist appear far less sympathetic than in the graphic novel.

Although he specializes in turning superhero comics into movies, "Batman" film franchise producer Michael Uslan is gratified that Hollywood studios are adapting a greater diversity of comic-book stories.

"Years ago, like everyone else, they looked down at comics," Uslan said. "Getting Jack Nicholson to play the Joker in the first 'Batman' movie was so breakthrough I can't overstress the importance of it. It gave the concept of doing a serious, dark comic-book movie a shot in the marketplace.

"The sea change has been that we've finally convinced them that comic books and graphic novels are an ongoing source of colorful characters and great stories, the same way novels are, the same way plays are. And it doesn't matter what genre is hot at the moment. I can bring you comic books that are Western, war, science-fiction, horror, fantasy, humor. It really doesn't matter. Any type of book you can find on a Barnes & Noble shelf, I can find you comic books of a similar genre."

If "A History of Violence" does win the Oscar for best adapted screenplay, "comics should take credit for it and we will take credit for it," said comic-book writer and comics industry analyst John Jackson Miller, whose latest comic is "Star Wars: Knights of the Old Republic."

"The thing that may make it harder to connect the dots here is that 'A History of Violence' is not a traditional comic book," Miller said. "It is from an imprint of DC Comics and is more literally a graphic novel. It was not presented in the same serialized manner as 95 percent of comics.

"Another challenge is going to be that, as with 'Road to Perdition,' people will not necessarily say, 'My gosh, it was a comic book,' because they're not familiar with it as a comic-book property, which reads as 'superhero.'

"But it might send one more producer into comics to look for material. And they might not just look at the superhero stuff."

Photographers stick to tradition

By Terry Lee Goodrich
Knight Ridder Newspapers

The cheery voice on the answering machine of Benbrook, Texas photographers J.B. and Susan Harlin tells callers, "We're busy at the moment. We're having fun the old-fashioned way."

In a world gone digital, that means the Harlins are pursuing their love of photography without memory cards or computers. They use large-format film and brass-and-wood cameras, complete with old-fashioned bellows, dark cloth and upside-down images in a viewfinder. And while many darkrooms are vacant or remodeled for other uses, the Harlins still spend hours in theirs.

The film and camera industry is changing to accommodate the spread of digital cameras, which use sensors instead of film to record images. A shrinking but resolute number of photographers still cling to film cameras, although generally not as old as those used by the Harlins.

Now many people talk of pixels instead of grain, and some of the most popular and innovative cameras will fit in a shirt pocket.

And in the world of film photography, some iconic camera models will become harder to find.

Nikon Corp. announced in January that it would stop making most of its film cameras to concentrate on digital ones, and Konica Minolta announced that it would stop making cameras, film and color paper by March 2007.

Although many professional photographers and ardent amateurs are migrating to digital, some have been reluctant.

"A lot of people that have spent years with film hated to go to digital," said Ken Spencer of Fort Worth, Texas, a former president of the 75-year-old Fort Worth Camera Club.

But he estimated that 90 percent of the club's 120 members have made the switch.

Spencer said he still uses film when he shoots large-format images, because "there's no digital that can give me that resolution — although there may be soon."

The Harlins, who travel frequently, say they use digital cameras only to shoot "reminder" images, quick shots of spots they want to revisit so they can photograph them in a more leisurely and extensive manner.

"It can be slow and tedious to process all that, but it's what we do," said J.B. Harlin, author of several books on photography.

Besides spending long sessions in the darkroom, J.B. Harlin also builds some of his own old-fashioned cameras.

"A lot of my friends who print digitally scan film because they think the film resolution beats digital," he said. Scanning film allows photographers to import a digital image of the negative or transparency to their computer.

His wife, Susan Harlin, puts it simply: "Digital just doesn't sing to me — especially for the size we do."

Ted Black of Bedford, a former president of the Trinity Arts Photo Club, said he and a few other photographers in the 70-member group remain skeptical of even the most advanced digital cameras.

"I know the world is changing rapidly," Black said. "But some of us still have the trusty Canon or Nikon, or whatever, that is still doing a very good job with very good resolution. We are just not fully convinced that a $1,000 or $2,000 digital will deliver. I get kicked in the shins all the time because I haven't gone digital."

Die-hards wanting such supplies as slide film are finding them scarce, although some small companies are filling niches.

But there's more to consider than supply, cost, familiarity and even loyalty, film aficionados say.

Because digital photography allows for greater manipulation of light, contrast, color and other aspects, some say it's not clear at what point a quality photograph becomes a clever manipulation.

"With film, the contrast of the scene is more or less a function of the film," Spencer said. "If the light is very harsh or flat, you're more or less stuck with it. And with film, at least with color transparencies, that's true, too."

But by blending digital photography with software, "you can change contrast, work on the color balance," he said. "With some of the newer, more advanced programs that cost several hundred dollars, the possibilities are even broader," he said.

"If the roses aren't red enough or you don't like the sky, you can change that," Spencer said. "You can put things in and take them out. A lot of old-time photographers have been reluctant to accept this."

"Before, they would say, 'Pictures don't lie.' But now, they do lie."

Still, one thing hasn't changed, Spencer said.

"To obtain a good photograph, whether it's in the old view cameras or the latest digital, you still have to be a good photographer," he said.

played terribly," UMass coach Travis Ford said after the game Wednesday. "That pretty much sums it up. They deserved to win. They played great. They made some tough shots and our guys just weren't ready to play. I give Richmond a lot of credit — they were ready to play."

UMass, on the other hand, was simply not there. The Minutemen had four turnovers in the first three minutes of action, an ominous sign for a team that struggles with holding onto the ball.

That is something that the Minutemen will have to remedy on Saturday if they want to come away with a win on Senior Night. Ford, by admission, is baffled by the turnover problem, and has spent long hours with assistant coaches trying to figure out how to help his players hold on to the basketball.

Inexperience at the point position is definitely contributing to the bloated turnover numbers. Freshman point guard Chris Lowe, although working his tail off for the last couple of months and playing a lot of minutes, needs to learn how to control his team.

He is talented enough to do it, but is too young to be a calming influence and team leader. In a couple of seasons, Lowe could develop into an invaluable member of UMass' basketball team, and the Minutemen turnover woes could be a thing of the past.

scenarios, UMass could also draw Boston College, Boston University, New Hampshire or Providence in the opening round.

And by taking on the Black Bears in what is considered to be the most hostile environment in Hockey East, Cahoon feels that only works as an advantage because of what his team may run into next weekend.

"This is a unique situation in that we get to play in as tough of a place as there is to play," Cahoon said. "We need to be able to put that aside, go compete and go get something done. That will be a good foundation to follow up with that same type of effort the following week.

"This week, we are going to clearly understand what it will take to succeed next week. We don't need to go into next week uncertain about how we have to compete and how we have to play. We have to be able to execute at a high level, and we have to be able to sustain that so we can continue to do it for the next few weeks to have any success in the playoffs."

on a first-round matchup with Duquesne, and this time, it hopes to be the team hitting the game-winning shot.

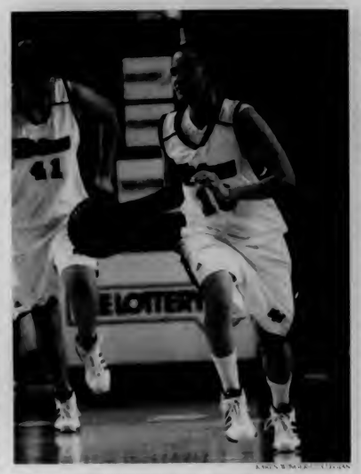
"I think it's a pretty good matchup," senior Katie Nelson said. "We lost to them earlier in the season when we weren't playing very well. We definitely have some revenge to take out on them. Hopefully we'll be able to play a good game against them, and then take it one game at a time."

UMass has been abiding by that "one game at a time" slogan for quite some time now, and if you are UMass coach Marnie Dacko, why stop now?

"We're taking it one game at a time," Dacko said in a most confident tone after Sunday's win. "Right now we're looking at Duquesne. We owe them, and we will be ready."

They will most definitely have to be ready if they want to advance to the quarterfinals to play Charlotte tomorrow. Duquesne knows that UMass is looking to get revenge, and therefore will have to hope that their best shooter, Bautre, will be ready for tip-off. Bautre has missed the last three games due to knee problems and will be a game-time decision.

The Minutewomen will also need their record on the road this season to improve if they want to have a shot at the championship. They are sporting a 3-12 record when away from the Mullins Center, while the Dukes haven't been too impressive on the road either, as they have a 5-9 record when playing from the Palumbo Center.



UMass and Duquesne have met four times in the A-10 tournament, with each team winning two games. The Minutewomen lead the all-time series with the Dukes, 20-17, so they must hope that history is on their side.

This will also be the third consecutive year that the two teams meet in the first round of the playoffs, with Duquesne winning in 2004, and UMass being victorious in 2005.

Regardless of their past battles, the Minutewomen know what they are up against in 2006, and that in itself, is something that they have been waiting for.

"I think we're ready," Nelson said. "We've been excited all year, and we've just been taking it one game at a time, working towards the A-10 Tournament. It's always a big deal for everybody, so we're pretty pumped."

"We're ready," Sharpton said. "We're going into the tournament with a win. We have the chip on our shoulder, so I think we're ready."

Senior point guard Katie Nelson and UMass will face Duquesne in the first round of the A-10 Tournament today at 4 p.m. in Philadelphia.

against BU, after leading with four goals against HC, her presence and stature (5-foot-7) make her hard to defend against. As a result, McCormick often sees double teams, allowing other attackers to make moves.

McCormick started off the year on defense due to a lack of depth in the back, but has now been moved up to attack on a full-time basis. No surprise there, though — she's already playing beyond her age.

"We're going to play more middies [midfielders] so that she doesn't have to play midfield as much," Bolduc said. "She didn't have points [Wednesday], but she can bring other things to the table."

Back to the depth thing, the Minutewomen will be back at full strength after missing two of its defensive starters for the first two games. Judging by BU's attacking onslaught, they'll be glad to have them in full swing again.

It will be an interesting matchup, as both the Crimson and Minutewomen return their top four scorers. Sophomore Natalie Curtis led Harvard with 22 goals and four assists for 26 points and 29 ground balls last season, while fellow sophomore Tara Schoen tallied a team-high 23 points.

The key for the Crimson, however, lies in its goaltender, junior Kathryn Tyrander. She missed the final 13 games of the 2005 season with an injury and surrendered 15 goals to Syracuse in the season-opener, but keeps the Crimson in close games late. She's said to possess great shot-stopping ability, and that will be tested by UMass' trio of Connerty, McCormick and the ever-elusive Kathleen Typadis.

Ski teams compete in Nationals

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts ski team has just one event left for the 2006 season, the United States Ski and Snowboard Association Nationals, held this year at Mt. Sugarloaf, Maine. The Nationals are a week-long event beginning on Sunday and running through next Saturday.

The skiers will be joined on the mountain by snowboarders competing in their own competitions, as well as some cross-country skiing events.

Last year the Nationals, which rotate from an eastern site to a western site yearly, were held at Brundage Mountain in Idaho, where then-sophomore Rush Hawkins became the first American to sweep the men's event in 10 years.

Hawkins finished first overall in both the men's slalom and giant slalom events, leading the Minutemen to a third place finish out of 19 teams.

The women's team also competed in last year's Nationals, finishing in seventh place out of 19 teams.

Just like last week's Eastern Collegiate Ski Conference Regionals, the Maroon and White will be returning nearly all of last year's top performers to the slopes for this year's USCSA Nationals.

For the men, Hawkins will be joined by sophomore Jason Small and senior Pat Bachaar, who had top-25 finishes in last year's event. Also skiing in the event will be freshman Alex Zaharuiko and senior Patrick Hofer.

The women will be returning sophomore Eliza Hawkins, who had a top-10 finish last year in Idaho, and seniors Lisbet Rauh, Shay Collins and Erica Mains. Last year's best female skier at the Nationals, Caitlin Doughty, will not be participating this year due to a knee injury.

Also similar to the ECSC Regionals, the USCSA Nationals will score the best three of five skiers for each team. During the regular season teams scored the best five of eight skiers.

The first alpine skiing event will take place on Wednesday with the women's giant slalom. That will be followed Thursday by the men's giant slalom.

The slaloms will take place after that, beginning with the women's slalom on Friday, and the men's slalom Saturday.

UMass will be one of five teams competing from the Eastern Division of the USCSA. There will be four teams each from the Mid-Atlantic and Western Regions, three from the Midwest Region, and two schools from the Far West Region. A total of 18 schools will send teams to this year's USCSA Nationals for the alpine skiing events.

NFL extends free agent deadline

By Dan Gelston
Associated Press

NEW YORK — A few hours after NFL owners voted to continue their standoff with the players union, the league extended its deadline for free agency by three days, putting off what threatened to become a mass purge of high-priced players from rosters.

League vice president Joe Browne announced the delay Thursday afternoon, seven hours before the midnight deadline.

The owners' vote after a 57-minute meeting earlier in the day had seemed to end 13 years of labor peace between the league and its union.

Browne did not elaborate on the deadline delay, which gives the union 72 more hours to negotiate a contract extension to the labor agreement that could add about $10 million to the current salary cap of $94.5 million. Many teams spent the day scrambling to get under that figure, and a number of big-name players were expected to be cut.

Free agency will now start at 12:01 a.m. EST Monday instead of Friday.

That move puts off free agency for a class led by two running backs: NFL MVP Shaun Alexander of Seattle and Edgerrin James of Indianapolis. If other players were to be cut because of the salary cap and hit the market, free agents would find fewer buyers and less money available.

The extension came seven hours after commissioner Paul Tagliabue had announced "the situation is as dire as dire can be." There was a pall around the league as general managers struggled to find cap room and agents tried to figure out how to sell clients in a market with less money and a potential glut of players.

In fact, the owners' meeting was so short that a lot of people who expected a 12-hour session arrived after most of the owners had departed the New York hotel where they met, braving a mix of ice and snow to try to get home quickly. It was thought at the time to be a strange rubber stamp by owners who had flown to New York from around the country.

Players gearing up for WBC

TAMPA, Fla. — Asked if he thought Bernie Williams would try to take him out at second base during the World Baseball Classic, Derek Jeter looked at his teammate in a corner of the Yankees' clubhouse.

"Better get down, buddy," Jeter yelled playfully Wednesday, a day before they turn in their pinstripes and head to their national teams.

Jeter will put on the red, white and blue for the U.S. team and Williams will play for Puerto Rico. They'll be among 150 or so major leaguers suiting up in the 16-nation tournament, which begins Thursday night U.S. time in Tokyo, when South Korea plays Taiwan and Japan meets China.

Williams doesn't know whether he'd barrel into Jeter in the late innings.

"I'll have to use a lot of caution," Williams said. "Hopefully, the situation will not come."

It's hard to forecast whether players, still getting back into baseball shape, will treat these like spring training games, postseason pressure-cookers or something in between.

Yet it sure will be neat to see Roger Clemens pitching for the United States, Ichiro Suzuki hitting for Japan and David Ortiz slugging for the Dominican Republic.

The United States, the Dominicans and the Puerto Ricans figure to be among the top teams in the tournament along with Japan, Venezuela and Cuba, the defending Olympic champion. It's hard to see how teams such as Italy, the Netherlands, China and South Africa can compete.

Gene Orza, the chief operating officer of the players' association, persuaded Mike Piazza to play for Italy. He tried to get Mike Mussina, too.

"I told him I'm not Italian and nobody in my family is Italian," Mussina said.

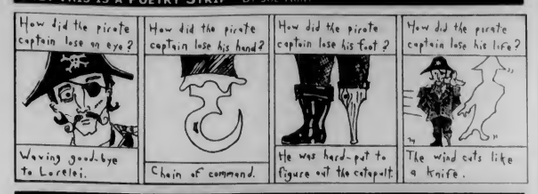
The tournament starts with Group A, which runs from Friday to Sunday at the Tokyo Dome. Other players report to their national teams Friday, and the three other groups start play Tuesday after a bunch of exhibition games.

Group B, based in Phoenix and Scottsdale, Ariz., includes the United States, Canada, Mexico and South Africa. Group C is in San Juan and has Puerto Rico, Cuba, Panama and the Netherlands. Group D games are at Kissimmee, Fla., and involve the Dominican Republic, Venezuela, Australia and Italy.

After each team plays three games, the top two teams in each group advance to second-round groups in Anaheim, Calif., and San Juan. The semifinals on March 18 and the final on March 20 are in San Diego.

Some players have backed out. Mets closer Billy Wagner and Cleveland pitcher C.C. Sabathia dropped off the U.S. team Wednesday and were replaced by Washington right-hander Gary Majewski and Yankees left-hander Al Leiter.

Boston's Manny Ramirez, who just got to spring training Wednesday, quit the Dominican team as did Angels star Vladimir Guerrero, who cited the death of his three cousins last weekend in a car accident.



"If a player is on the fence, whether he's going to make a team or not, I would prefer he stays," said Los Angeles Dodgers manager Grady Little, who is losing outfielder Jose Cruz Jr. to the Puerto Rican team.

UMass hosts Xavier in finale

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's basketball team (12-14, 7-8 Atlantic 10) is in the middle of a bunched-up Atlantic 10 conference where almost every team has a shot at climbing the ladder, even though there is only one game left in the season.

Now, for the final game of the season, the Minutemen will face a weak Xavier team (17-9, 8-7 A-10) on Saturday at 4 p.m. on Senior Night, honoring UMass' lone senior, forward Jeff Viggiano.

This season's Xavier team has not been the Xavier of old. It is a squad that goes to the NCAA tournament on almost a yearly basis, but the 2006 season has hit some bumps in the road.

The Musketeers were 14-2 when the conference season started, and it looked to be another year for Xavier and George Washington to dominate the A-10. But in the conference season the Musketeers have been downright mediocre, losing to bottom feeders like Saint Joseph's, Fordham and Dayton.

On Saturday, Xavier will be down two of its better players. It lost one to injury — Brian Thornton, who went down with a season-ending ankle injury in the first half of the Musketeers game against La Salle on Feb. 11. Thornton led Xavier in scoring, rebounding, field goal percentage and blocked shots before being sidelined for the rest of the season.

Xavier junior forwards Justin Doellman and Justin Cage have helped fill in for Thornton. Doellman leads the Musketeers in rebounding, with 6.8 boards per game, and blocked shots, with 1.7 per game.

For the Minutemen, it will be important to bounce back from Wednesday's route, where the Richmond Spiders punished UMass in almost every aspect of the game.

The Spiders were on an eight-game losing streak for starters. The Minutemen have been what the doctor ordered for teams on significant losing streaks. UMass also lost to La Salle on the road earlier this season, when the Explorers hadn't tasted victory in five games.

Richmond was at the bottom of the A-10 when the Minutemen marched into town on Wednesday, but it didn't look like it: the Spiders picked Senior Night to come out of their shell (the first two baskets, both 3-pointers, were tallied by Richmond seniors).

The Spiders had five players in double figures led by senior Jermaine Bucknor (17 points) and Kevin Steenberge (14), something that they hadn't accomplished all season; they scored 81 points in the game, the highest point total all year; they hit 10 of their first 13 shots in the second half; they shot over 63 percent from the floor in the second half.

"This was one of those games where they played great and we

Mass Attack tuning up for postseason

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts hockey team (13-18-1, 10-14-1 Hockey East) has already locked up its postseason bid, and in terms of its own destiny, UMass can only finish in one of two positions in the final standings heading into next week's conference quarterfinals.

The Minutemen — who play Maine (23-10-1, 16-8-1 HEA) tonight and tomorrow night in Orono to close out their regular season schedule — hold a one-point edge on Lowell — playing Vermont twice at home — in the standings but need to stay there because the River Hawks hold the head-to-head tiebreaker with a 2-1-0 record against the Minutemen this season. If UMass does indeed hold firm ahead of Lowell, it will clinch the seven-seed as opposed to the eighth and final seed.

And since the Minutemen don't have to fight tooth and nail for their playoff lives against No. 7 Maine this weekend, they can focus more on fine-tuning their game rather than playing tight and looking over their collective shoulder.

"We didn't really talk a lot about [the playoffs]," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "We know what we are working for. I'm sure, subconsciously, it's out of our minds. That's done. We're still concerned with getting better from day to day and from week to week. Our intensity in practice and our commitment to what we're doing is still pretty much the same."

The Maroon and White also has the ability to play the role of spoiler at the hostile Alfond Arena this weekend. Maine, which has gone 9-1-1 in its last 11 games to make a huge surge from sixth place to a tie for second in the standings, can clinch the Hockey East regular season championship if first-place Boston College stumbles against New Hampshire tomorrow night.

"It's just going to set the stage for the championship," Cahoon said. "They want to win the Hockey East Championship this weekend. We've got a chance to keep them from fulfilling that and to better position ourselves to prepare for next week's crucial games."

The Minutemen know they will be on the road during the first round of the Hockey East tournament, but who they will face is still way up in the air. There is still the possibility that UMass will have to return to Amherst following Saturday night's game and then make the six-hour bus ride back to Orono for a best-two-of-three series.

But with all of this weekend's

The postseason is a place in which only certain teams go. After battling many teams in the regular season, only those who are fortunate enough to make the cutoff will advance to the second season. The playoffs are where legends are born and champions are crowned. And for the Massachusetts women's basketball team, it is win or go home.

The Minutewomen (11-16, 8-8 Atlantic 10) will enter the Atlantic 10 Tournament as the No. 7 seed and will take on No. 10 seed Duquesne at 4 p.m. this afternoon at Alumni Memorial Fieldhouse in Philadelphia, the home of Saint Joseph's University. The winner of this first-round contest will advance to the quarterfinals to take on No. 2 seed Charlotte at 4 p.m. tomorrow.

UMass comes into the postseason winning eight of its last 11 games, including six in a row at home.

The Minutewomen have overcome the adversity of an early season blunder, losing 13 of their first 16 games, and starting A-10 play with an 0-5 record. A pair of wins in late January sparked a second-half turnaround for the Maroon and White, as it got its first conference win on Jan. 19 against Richmond, and then knocked off No. 25 George Washington just three days later.

As they became more familiar with winning ballgames during the stretch run, the Minutewomen seemed to be unstoppable, especially at the Mullins Center. They ended the regular season on a strong note by defeating La Salle by a score of 63-55 on Sunday, sending them into the postseason exactly how they wanted it: with a first-round game against Duquesne.

Tomorrow's playoff game will be a rematch of their Jan. 6 meeting in Pittsburgh. Duquesne's leading scorer, senior Aiga Bautre hit a 3-pointer with 21 seconds to play in the game to give the Dukes a 46-44 win over the Minutewomen.

While the Minutewomen are well aware that every team now has a clean slate, they are thrilled to have a chance to get revenge from an earlier loss.

"Right now we're back to 0-0," senior Ashley Sharpton said. "We know that it's a new season right now, and we got the one team who we wanted, Duquesne, who beat us at the buzzer at their place. There's no other team we'd want [to play]. We've got it out for them, and we know what we have to do to go out and beat them."

Breaking down the matchups

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

March Madness is finally here, and the Atlantic 10 women's basketball tournament will get underway this afternoon at Alumni Memorial Fieldhouse, home to Saint Joseph's University, in Philadelphia. The conference has abandoned its two-division format for 2006, as it will now feature one 12-team bracket, all vying for the championship in a single-elimination tournament.

The top four seeds have all earned a first-round bye. Those teams include No. 1 George Washington (13-3, 20-7 Atlantic 10), No. 2 Charlotte (13-3, 20-7 A-10), No. 3 Temple (12-4, 21-7 A-10) and No. 4 Xavier (11-5, 20-7 A-10). They will immediately advance to the quarterfinal round tomorrow afternoon where they will await the winners of today's games.

As for seeds five through 12, they will begin the first round today with the winners advancing to the quarterfinals. Here is a preview of all the action.

Game 1 — No. 8 La Salle vs. No. 9 Richmond

The winner of the opening game got no love from the A-10 committee. No. 1 George Washington will be scouting this one heavily to see who it will face in the quarterfinals.

Sophomore Carlene Hightower hit a 15-foot jumper with 3.7 seconds left in the game to give La Salle a 59-58 win over Richmond on Jan. 6. La Salle lost its last five regular season games, and has had only one victory in its last nine contests. Look for the Spiders to get some revenge on their earlier loss. Prediction: Richmond

Game 2 — No. 5 Saint Joseph's vs. No. 12 Fordham

Saint Joseph's has one of the better defenses in the conference, allowing only 56.2 points per game. Fordham just barely got into the tournament with a do-or-die victory over Saint Louis in the final game of the regular season.

Fordham lost twice to Saint Joseph's in the regular season, and even though they took one of the games into overtime, look for the Hawks to make a clean sweep. Oh yeah, it is also a home game for Saint Joe's. Fordham does not stand a chance.
Prediction: Saint Joseph's

Game 3 — No. 7 Massachusetts vs. No. 10 Duquesne

UMass will let you know that this was the matchup it wanted. Duquesne defeated UMass earlier in the year when Aiga Bautre hit a game-winning 3-pointer with 21 seconds left in regulation.

The Minutewomen have won eight of their last 11 games, while the Dukes have won their last two games. UMass has something to prove after its last battle with Duquesne.
Prediction: Massachusetts

Game 4 — No. 6 Dayton vs. No. 11 Rhode Island

Both of these teams play poor defense, while Dayton's offense ranks fourth in the conference, averaging 64.5 points per game. In their only meeting earlier this season, Dayton came out on top with a 62-51 win.

The Flyers may be the sixth seed, but they are entering the tournament on a three-game losing streak, and have lost five of their last six games. Rhode Island will still have its hands full, as it will have to stop one of the best players in the conference in senior Cara Wright. Wright is third in the A-10 in scoring with 15.7 points per game, and is the best rebounder in the league with 10.1 boards per contest.

Wright will be enough to break her team out of a late-season slump.
Prediction: Dayton

There will be many storylines to follow in the later rounds, as tourney time starts to heat up. Unfortunately, for many schools that hoped to be the Cinderella team of 2006, defense does, and always will, win championships.

With the top three defenses in the conference being George Washington, Temple and Saint Joseph's respectively, look for George Washington and Temple to be playing in the Championship game on Monday evening. With room for a few upsets, don't completely rule out Massachusetts and Saint Joseph's, which, if given the right opportunity, could be battling each other for an A-10 Title.

ECAC Championship on tap

By Domenic Poli
Collegian Staff

Over 60 Division 1 schools will accompany the Massachusetts track and field teams as they head to Roxbury, Mass. for the ECAC Championships, the last meet of the indoor season for any athlete who has not qualified for the IC4A/NCAA Championships. The men will send 17 athletes, while the Minutewomen send two.

"They've been very excited and their enthusiasm has gotten them this far," UMass men's coach Ken O'Brien said.

One reason for that enthusiasm is the senior leadership of Jon Korhonen.

Korhonen has been dominant in the 3,000 meters and the mile all season long, achieving personal bests of 8:33.20 and 4:04.26, respectively.

In fact, his time of 4:04.26 in the mile set a new UMass indoor record and won him the UMass/Dinn Bros. Co-Athlete of the Week on Feb. 13.

Though battling the flu in the last week and a half, Korhonen has confidence from his coach.

"He's got a great chance to be very successful," O'Brien said.

Fellow senior James Godinho holds just as much promise as Korhonen.

Godinho won the 500 meters at last year's event and, despite the brutal competition, O'Brien sees potential for a repeat performance.

"When James is on his game, he can place with anybody on the East Coast," O'Brien said.

Junior Erik Hoagland was not even on the roster at the beginning of the semester, but he has managed to produce stellar results in the long jump and triple jump.

At the Atlantic-10 Championships on Feb. 18, Hoagland won both the long jump and triple jump, becoming the first Minuteman to win both at the event since UMass entered the league in 1994.

He claimed victory in the long jump with a leap of 23 feet, 4 inches and he broke his own UMass record in the triple jump with a mark of 49 feet, 3 inches.

O'Brien commented that if Hoagland can muster performances similar to those this weekend, he has a fine chance to place.

Also armed with sophomore shot-putter Sean Calicchio and three talented relay teams, among 14 other athletes, O'Brien is excited about the upcoming competition.

"We've had a great season up until now, and hopefully we'll be able to finish, on this last attempt, one step higher," O'Brien said.

The Minutewomen will have only two representatives in sophomores Christina DeRosa and Kristen Bakanowski. However, they have UMass women's coach Julie LaFreniere very enthusiastic.

DeRosa, a long distance specialist, will compete in the 5,000 meters. Despite only competing in the 5,000 meters twice this season, she still managed to qualify by about 10 seconds. However, her time of 17:24 puts her at the tail end of a very talented corps of competition, many of whom have broken 16 minutes.

LaFreniere said that it will be interesting to see how DeRosa will fare in such an intense race.

Bakanowski, a pole-vaulter, has a season best of 12-feet. However, the event will open at a height greater than she is used to. Still, LaFreniere says that she feels Bakanowski will rise to the best of her capabilities.

"What I'm looking for both of them to do is to rise to this level of competition and perform to their best ability under this pressure, and I think both athletes are looking forward to the pressure," LaFreniere said.

Minutewomen seeking first win

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

They've seen this kind of thing before.

In their 2005 meeting with the Harvard Crimson, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team surrendered a 6-0 run after taking a 2-1 lead and never led again, faltering 12-7.

The same thing happened last Wednesday, when the Minutewomen went up 3-1 early against the No. 8 Boston University Terriers and then, following a few more exchanges of scores, gave up a 7-0 run. UMass went on to lose the game by double-digits, 16-6.

So when the Minutewomen (0-2) return to action tomorrow at noon with the second of a two-game homestand against the Crimson, you can probably guess what they're preparing against.

The solution? UMass coach Carrie Bolduc, who is confident in her team's ability to win tomorrow, offers a simple mindset that, depending on how the opposition comes out, could be hard or easy to pull off.

"It's about playing a whole game," Bolduc said. "We've thought about this, and we really need to stop fast breaks and not let the other team dictate. If we can play to our potential, we can win the game. We need to play a full 60 minutes, not just in spurts."

Against Holy Cross on Feb. 25, the Minutewomen let the Crusaders go up big early, taking a 5-1 lead at halftime, before finally snapping into gear. UMass closed the lead to two but were never able to overtake the Crusaders. A bright sign, though, was the Minutewomen rallying off three goals in a span of 65 seconds.

Facing the Terriers on Wednesday, the Minutewomen again showed that sign of attack spurt with a Kerri Connerty goal immediately off the initial draw control of the game. UMass of course then went up, and straight down.

"I saw that we worked the ball and possessed the ball well at times," Bolduc said. "If you can do that, you can win games. We tend to rush things, so we try to keep it pretty simple. I have good game plan always; it's just about being smarter with the ball, finding people. Sometimes we force things when they aren't there."

One player working the ball well has been freshman and reigning Atlantic 10 Player of the Week Kayt McCormick. Despite registering no goals and no assists

Professors debate belief in God

By Nicole Boonjakuakul
Collegian Correspondent

The question of the existence of God was debated at Amherst College last Friday afternoon. Over 150 people poured into Amherst's Assembly Room to hear the opposing but philosophical standpoints of Peter van Inwagen, the John Cardinal O'Hara Professor of Philosophy at the University of Notre Dame, and Michael Tooley, Professor of Philosophy at University of Colorado at Boulder.

The action began when Professor Michael Tooley stepped up to the podium with a PowerPoint presentation titled, "Does God Exist?"

"What is the definition of 'God'?" Tooley began. "It is, 'the supernatural being conceived as the perfect and omnipotent and omniscient originator.'" He continued his argument about the non-existence of God by explaining the inevitability of evils in the world — whether one believes in God or doesn't.

"Whether you are a Theist or an Atheist, there are notable evils in the world," explains Tooley. "Moral evils existed in Hitler, Stalin, genocide; evil suffering comes in the form of disease and starvation. Cruelty and death to animals and humans is a part of this natural cycle of life. Natural disasters are a form of evil since thousands of people lose their lives succumbing to them."

Tooley quickly lightened the tone of the debate with the quote "Death is just not a good way to go."

But the laughter in the audience resided when Tooley passionately stated, "If God is omniscient and omnipotent — if He is all-knowing and all-powerful — and He does exist, then how could He intentionally allow natural disasters and certain forms of death to occur in the world?"

"If there is a higher power that does exist who intentionally allows for these evils to occur, then he is morally imperfect," Tooley continued. "Therefore, this 'God' does not fit under the definition of 'God.' And therefore, He does not exist."

Tooley also included an argument using logical probability to compare wrong-making characteristics and right-making characteristics, both of which can determine why such evils exist in the world.

"Humans, unfortunately, lack the ability to think critically," said Tooley. "And because of this absence, humans perform evil actions." He explained that two-thirds of the time, humans are carrying out actions with wrong-making characteristics. "There is no right-making characteristic that could allow for such evils to happen, except for the one-third probability that a god can control." But according to Tooley, right-making versus wrong-making never counterbalance each other.

The tone of the debate was switched from Tooley's fervency to subtleness when Professor Peter van Inwagen took a stand.

Inwagen began, "Unfortunately, I have no fancy PowerPoint to show you guys. I don't have any solid evidence that God does exist. And that is simply because no one can convince people to believe any one philosophical argument," he said. "The belief in God should be un-coercive."

He continued to explain that if he were to try to force his audience to believe in God, he would also have to argue against free will

UMass murder trial may see delay

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

The trial of a man charged with killing a University of Massachusetts student over two years ago is close to being delayed for the second time at the prosecution's request.

Bryan R. Johnston, 24, of Westfield, shot and killed UMass student David E. Sullivan, then 22, with a .223-caliber rifle on Dec. 7, 2004, police say.

Johnston faces charges of murder, armed burglary, possession of a large-capacity firearm, and use of a firearm in the commission of a felony.

Johnston trial was initially slated for January, but has since been rescheduled for Mar. 20 at 9 a.m.

In a trial hearing on Mar. 3, Johnston's lawyer, Alexander Z. Nappan, announced he was seeking additional discovery concerning the ballistic reports on the murder. Nappan said that he only received the results of the ballistics tests from the district attorney office last week and requested that he receive all of the prosecution's evidence that they plan to present during the trial.

"Things are still continuing to develop in this case," said Nappan. "I just want to be able to present to my client, 'This is their case.' Supposedly the prosecution found fingerprints on the murder weapon. I haven't seen it yet."

"The gun found at the scene was previously purchased by the defendant," answered First Assistant District Attorney Renee Steese. "By that virtue alone the evidence is negligible. It's his gun."

The trial could involve about 90 witnesses, including a U.S. Marine stationed in Iraq, and more than 1,000 pieces of evidence. Estimates predict that it will last about 10 days.

Nappan expressed his desire to reduce the length of the trial and the number of witness testimonies.

"Why are we expending all of these resources?" asked Nappan. "I'm looking to change the case from a 100-witness case to a ten-witness case."

Johnston has admitted to shooting Sullivan several times. Nappan has claimed he will argue that Johnston is not criminally responsible and plans to request a reduction in his murder charges. Nappan claims Johnston was addicted to steroids and going through withdrawal at the time of the killing.

Both sides will meet in a trial hearing Tuesday, Mar. 7 at the Hampshire Superior Court in Northampton to determine the schedule of the case.

According to investigators, Johnston, who was attending Westfield State College at the time of the shooting, called Sullivan to hang out. After Sullivan refused, police believe that Johnston drove to Sullivan's apartment, where he entered unannounced at 12:29 a.m. and shot Sullivan six times in his bedroom.

Stephen Kubicki, Sullivan's roommate and a UMass student who was home when the shooting occurred, called 911 Upon their arrival minutes later, police found Sullivan lying in a pool of blood. He was pronounced dead at the scene.

The two men, childhood friends, grew up together in the Berkshires. They graduated together from Wachusett Regional High School in Dalton in 2000.

Additionally, a key witness, Gareth Mello, is currently serving in the U.S. military in Iraq. Shortly after the shooting, Johnston called Mello to drive him home from the parking lot of the Aqua Vitae restaurant in Hadley after being detained for a short time in a police car. The two men worked together as security guards in Baystate Medical Center in Springfield.

According to Northwestern District Attorney Renee Steese, Mello's testimony could be crucial to both sides. Steese told Hampshire Superior Court Judge Mary-Lou Rup that she had contacted the military about having Mello sent home so he could be present at the trial

Brian Johnston is charged with shooting 22-year-old University of Massachusetts senior David Sullivan.

David E. Sullivan's body was found in his Amherst apartment shortly after midnight in December 2004.

Microsoft provides grants to three teams of UMass researchers

By Chris Hynes
Collegian Correspondent

Microsoft has awarded $50,000 grants to three teams of UMass researchers for projects dealing with wireless security and information gathering using advanced technology.

Each year Microsoft internationally sends out "requests for proposals" (RFPs) to find scientists interested in helping to press forward in the fields of science, education and technology, which have a strategic importance to the corporation. Scientists then respond to these RFPs with proposals for their ideas in hopes of earning the $50,000 grants given out by the company.

"These grants are open to colleges and universities around the globe," said Karen Hayes, associate director for Research Liaison and Development. "That UMass earned three awards speaks volumes for our research abilities and our relationship with Microsoft."

The first project is largely focused on the community, entitled "What Did We See?" It focuses on the gathering and storing of data obtained by people exploring the outdoors and uploads this information onto the Web for others to access. The project will rely heavily on Memex, a device used to store images, books, records and communications, which can then be easily reviewed or studied. In this case, the research team will be developing methods to cross-reference the observations with expert information in order to validate the comments.

"New information technology folks offer potential for significant advances in our understanding of environmental issues and for the development of social networks that can address these issues in a collaborative and productive manner," said Chris Pal, the computer scientist involved in two of the projects.

The other project Pal is working on also involves the environment, focusing on ways to improve it.

The task once again is heavily intertwined with technology, using Tablet PCs and handheld computers to collect data on river and stream habitats to create models for water management. The information collected will help with decision making that will eventually protect the habitat for fish and other organisms living in the ecosystem. The team will attempt to "teach" a computer how to recognize an entire habitat using aerial photographs and communicating with survey teams equipped with the Tablet PC's and handheld computers.

This system is part of a larger project known as the "Northeast Instream Habitat Program." The project's intent is to manage and protect aquatic organisms. The information gathered by the UMass team will create a database backbone for the rest of the Northeast project.

The final project deals with security and privacy issues of mobile networking and wireless web services. It aims to raise awareness, especially in students, of the various security risks of wireless networking, and of ways to counter these risks. The research team is also attempting to promote the growth of young researchers interested in the growing field of internet security.

Being honored with three $50,000 grants is not the only connection that UMass has with the multi-billion dollar corporation. Last fall Microsoft named UMass its first-ever "Information Technology (IT) Showcase School," a program aimed at highlighting IT excellence for higher education. The award was announced by Microsoft CEO Steve Ballmer at the grand opening of the technologically advanced campus Learning Commons, and has earned the university continual funding and support from the corporation.

The designation, along with the multiple research grants, has lent legitimacy to UMass as a leader in research and information technology, allowing the school to recruit new students and faculty for further IT-related projects.

Microsoft, one of the most prominent corporations in the world today, is known to the masses as the world's largest software provider. Its financial arms acquired close to $40 billion last year, and its employers are spread over 85 countries.

Students 'Rock to Block Wal-mart'

Students assembled to listen to the Sampling Chinese Nationalists Thursday night in protest of the proposed construction of a Wal-Mart Supercenter in Hadley.

By Megan Daily
Collegian Staff

Students gathered Thursday night to "Rock to Block Wal-Mart" at a MassPIRG-sponsored event designed to inform students about the issues relating to the proposed Wal-Mart Supercenter.

Speakers from the Hadley Neighbors for Sensible Development and Stop SprawlMart lectured between musical performances from Jay Mankita, the Ski Boot Mafia and Sampling Chinese Nationalists. Mike Pease, a senior history and economics major and a member of MassPIRG, opened the event by discussing MassPIRG's concerns with the Supercenter.

"What we are most concerned about is the impact it will have on our environment," said Pease.

The environmental factor is one that many residents of Hadley and surrounding areas have expressed concern about. The new Wal-Mart has been designed to cover land that has been petitioned to be regarded as a wetlands area. The local conservation commission upheld the petition and now developers and residents are waiting for a ruling from the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) before the plans can proceed.

If the EPA upholds the commission's ruling, Wal-Mart developers will have to make several changes to their plans to make them fit for the new regulations that will surround building on or near wetlands.

Concern for the environment, however, is only one reason that Wal-Mart would be bad for Hadley, according to Aaron Goldman, the founder of stopsprawlmart.com and the first guest speaker at the event. Goldman asked students how they felt about a variety of issues. He asked if they were for the preservation of wetlands and agricultural history, if they liked to keep open space and rare species. All of these things, he said, could be in jeopardy with the building of the Wal-Mart Supercenter. He also told students that the Supercenter would more than double traffic.

"You don't have to be a radical to protest, you just have to not want to sit in traffic all day," said Goldman.

However, Wal-Mart is not just a problem for U.S. General's assessment of Iraq questioned

By Pauline Jelinek
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon's top general acknowledged Sunday that "anything can happen" in Iraq, but he said things aren't as bad as some say.

"I wouldn't put a great big smiley face on it, but I would say they're going very, very well from everything you look at," Gen. Peter Pace said.

The comments drew criticism that Pace is glossing over problems in the three-year-old U.S. campaign.

"Why would I believe him?" asked Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., a major critic of the Bush administration's handling of the war. "This administration, including the president, [has] mischaracterized this war for the last two years."

Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, cited political progress such as holding elections and writing a constitution, as well as military progress like training Iraqi security forces.

"No matter where you look — at their military, their police, their society — things are much better this year than they were last," Pace said on NBC's "Meet the Press."

Murtha, responding to Pace in an appearance on CBS's "Face the Nation," said that Iraq has 60 percent unemployment, oil production below prewar levels, and water service to only 30 percent of the population.

American troops are doing everything they can militarily but "are caught in a civil war," said Murtha, a former Marine who has called on the administration to bring U.S. troops home.

"There's two participants fighting for survival and fighting for supremacy inside that country," he said of ethnic divisions. "And that's my definition of a civil war."

Murtha added: "The rhetoric is so frustrating — when they keep making statements which are very optimistic, and then it turns out to be the opposite ... And the public has caught on to that, and they're very pessimistic about the outcome."

Pace and Murtha spoke as Iraqis continued a stalemate over forming a new government, a delay that has prevented parliament from meeting since it was elected Dec. 15.

Pressure mounted Sunday on Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari to give up his bid for a new term amid anger over the recent surge in sectarian killings that has complicated already snarled negotiations on a new Iraqi government.

Pace said the violent firestorm that followed the bombing of a revered Shiite mosque two weeks ago had forced Iraqis to look into "that abyss" and realize "that's not where they want to go."

"Anything can happen, I agree," Pace said, then added: "I believe the Iraqi people have shown in the last week to 10 days that they do not want civil war."

Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Gen. Peter Pace appears during the taping of "Meet the Press" Sunday, March 5, 2006, at the NBC studios in Washington.

Ending the insurgency depends not only on military efforts but also on whether the Iraqi government can give the people what they want, Pace said. He said the number of people in the insurgency will drop if people see that the new government can come through with jobs and services.

"If you have an opportunity to get a job and feed your family, you're much less likely to accept $100 to go plant a bomb inside a road," Pace said.

Sen. Richard Lugar, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said the U.S. must stick with the Iraqis.

"They're talking about putting their act together," Lugar, R-Ind., said on CBS. "Now, the fact is that they may or may not be successful, but we better hope that they are, because the consequences for our country and the war against terror are very fateful if they are not."

Professors examine theology of God, alternative values and thought.

"All philosophical arguments are failures, mainly because there is always someone who doesn't believe it," Inwagen said. "But what philosophers can do is tell stories, or defenses."

"Tsunamis and other natural disasters have scientific purposes in order to keep the world running," said Inwagen, as he began his "story." "When people don't believe in these scientific purposes, they separate from God. As a result, people perform perverse actions because they think, 'Why doesn't God just end the world?'" he continued.

"In various religions, God is a god of love rather than justice. And love requires free will," he said. "Because He is omnipotent, God can take away all rebellious people, who do not want to love. But then no one would have a reason to turn to Him. Only terrible things in the world make people feel the need to turn to God."

Inwagen concluded his argument by saying, "I am not a prophet. I only have alternative theories. I am only asking you to reconsider His existence. For every bad thing in the world, there isn't always an explanation. But these evils are there; otherwise the world wouldn't be what it is today, and people wouldn't need to believe in any form of higher power. And finally, with each evil, there is an unknown good that comes out of it."

During the question portion of the debate, one main issue continued to arise.

"How can one define what is morality and immorality?" addressed several audience members.

Both professors responded similarly, "The definition varies across different societies. There are fundamental moral questions people disagree about, but it all depends on the existence of objective values."

Michael Tooley has written books including "Causation A Realist Approach (1987), "Causation" (co-edited with Ernest Sosa, 1993), "Time, Tense, and Causation (1997) and "Analytical Metaphysics (1999). Forthcoming books include "Knowledge of God (co-authored with Alvin Planting) and "Causation."

Peter van Inwagen's books include "An Essay on Free Will (1983), "Material Beings (1990), "Metaphysics" (1993), "God, Knowledge and Mystery (1995) and "Ontology, Identity and Modality" (2001).

the Pioneer Valley, according to Goldman. "It's an international issue," he said. He explained that even people in other countries were affected by Wal-Mart's continued growth in the United States, citing examples of sweatshop workers in other countries working to make Wal-Mart's products.

Goldman then encouraged students to take action against Wal-Mart.

"It doesn't matter if everyone is opposed to Wal-Mart," he said. "If we don't actually do something about it, they'll just come in. We are not their pawns, we are not their victims. [The Wal-Mart developers] are counting on apathy."

David Elvin, a speaker from the Hadley Neighbors for Sensible Development, also called on his audience to stand up against Wal-Mart. Elvin says that Wal-Mart has the power and resources to drag their case for a Supercenter on for a long time, and that they are likely hoping that eventually people will give up and allow the Supercenter without protest.

Elvin also defended protesters against accusations some have made of those opposed to the Supercenter being "environmentalist wackos."

"We're just asking this company to comply with the law, and they won't do it," Elvin said.

Tillman death under probe

WASHINGTON — The chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff on Sunday promised the family of former professional football player Pat Tillman that investigators will examine all the facts surrounding his death in Afghanistan.

Gen. Peter Pace said the Army was launching a criminal investigation into the April 2004 death of Tillman — an Army Ranger shot by fellow soldiers in what previous military reviews had concluded was an accident — because the Defense Department's inspector general determined it was an additional step that needed to be taken.

A Pentagon official told The Associated Press on Saturday that a criminal investigation would focus on possible charges of negligent homicide. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because the new investigation had not formally begun.

Investigators want to look into whether fire by the friendly forces was "fire that should have been going on or was someone potentially firing a weapon when they should not have been," Pace said.

"Although there's no evidence that there was criminal activity, the investigators did not specifically look at whether or not there was criminal activity, criminal activity being when Cpl. Tillman was killed by friendly fire," Pace said on NBC's "Meet the Press."

Tillman's parents have been highly critical of the Army for its handling of questions about their son's death. Reached Saturday night by "The Washington Post," Patrick Tillman Sr. remained skeptical.

"I think it's another step," Tillman said. "But if you send investigators to reinvestigate an investigation that was falsified in the first place, what do you think you're going to get?"

The scope of the new investigation by the Army Criminal Investigation Command had not yet been determined in detail, Col. Joseph Curtin, an Army spokesman, said Saturday. Curtin said the inspector general's office reviewed the matter at the Army's request and concluded a criminal probe was warranted.

Pace responded only indirectly when asked whether Tillman's case, which will now undergo a fifth formal investigation, had been mishandled. "Folks look at them to make sure they have complete information," he said on "Fox News Sunday." "If there's not complete information, they send it back."

Tillman, 27, played football for the Arizona Cardinals but left the NFL to join the Army after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Tillman died on April 22, 2004, when he was struck by gunfire during a firefight along a canyon road near the Pakistan-Afghanistan border. The Army said at the time that the barrage of bullets came from enemy fire.

A report by the Army later found that troops with Tillman knew at the time that friendly fire had killed the football star. Officers destroyed critical evidence and concealed the truth from Tillman's brother, also an Army Ranger, who was nearby, the report found.

More than three weeks after a memorial service in San Jose, Calif., the Army announced on May 29, 2004, that friendly fire rather than an enemy encounter had caused Tillman's death. However, even at the time of the memorial, top Army officials were aware that the investigation showed the death had been caused by an act of "gross negligence," the report said.

A study on Retni-10

Jackie Hai

In the late 20th century, a new drug was developed that many believed would revolutionize the civilization of mankind. Named Retni-10 in the laboratory, this drug began its use within a small group of people at first, but within a decade caught on in mainstream circulation where commercial distributors jumped at the opportunity to make a profit. Soon, use of Retni-10 became widespread throughout the United States.

Its numerous supporters touted the benefits of the drug. Among other effects, most prominent was its ability to increase the productivity of workers, boost the intelligence and learning of children, and bring people closer to one another. Today, almost everyone is encouraged to take Retni-10, from the elderly to the very young. In fact, parents are often advised to introduce doses of the drug to their children at the earliest age possible, to maximize its intelligence-boosting effects.

While studies have shown the aforementioned positive effects to be true — when taken in moderation — there has been surprisingly little controversy over the darker side of Retni-10: addiction and overuse.

Drug Addiction and Effects of Overuse

Depending on the individual, addiction to Retni-10 can range from mild to severe. The most common age bracket of addicts today is from adolescents through the middle-aged. Repeated abuse and overuse of the drug is the quickest way to become addicted, although some are affected sooner than others.

Unlike the addicts of more well-documented drugs, the Retni-10 addict can be difficult to distinguish from normal people. In most cases, there are only a few physical symptoms that can be observed by the casual eye, such as a tendency to be withdrawn from one's surroundings, bags under the eyes, pale skin, and irritability. Students abusing the drug have been known to do considerably worse in school, as their desire to do productive work falters and grades drop.

> Direct negative effects of Retni-10 on the user after prolonged overdose include sleep deprivation, myopia, bodily pain in the back and upper extremities, dulling of the senses, and a decline in overall health.

In the most extreme cases of addiction, users reportedly take the drug at every possible moment and so remain on a high at all times. Direct negative effects of Retni-10 on the user after prolonged overdose include sleep deprivation, myopia, bodily pain in the back and the upper extremities, dulling of the senses, and a decline in overall health.

Withdrawal symptoms can sometimes be severe as well, as those attempting to quit the habit can attest to. Symptoms include nervousness, restlessness, and an acute sense of being cut off from the world. These ailments are instantly remedied by a fresh dose of Retni-10, which contributes to the difficulties of quitting.

The Many Forms of Retni-10

There are currently a handful of different ways of intake, though more are certainly on the way. The cheapest and most easily obtained apparatus is a long, flat tube made of plastic called a "plu-aid." Because it can take a long time for the effects of the drug to begin, the more impatient users are willing to shell out extra money for alternative, more efficient apparatuses that can deliver Retni-10 in its purest form.

Like many other drugs, Retni-10 has its fair share of derivatives that suit the taste of a wide variety of addicts. One form, called G-promm on the streets, is reported to take the user on hallucinatory trips that rival the real world in vividness. G-promm addicts are those who prefer these hallucinations to their everyday life, and best enjoy sharing them with fellow users.

Other derivatives include Emyu D (a predecessor to G-promm), Gnifrus, MIs, and SSBs.

Effects on Society

Although, statistically speaking, addicts of the drug are in the minority of normal users around the world, the number of cases is on the rise. Already we begin to see some repercussions, as businesses whose employees use Retni-10 inappropriately in the workplace see a decline in productivity. Also affected are schools and universities, as students neglect their academic self-improvement in order to take the drug when not in the classroom.

Continued abuse of the drug can lead to alienation of friends and family and loss of jobs. There have been numerous cases in which a pair of addicts may meet and decide to run off together, much to the dismay of loved ones. Of more dire consequence, though much rarer in occasion, is when a child is swindled away and never seen again.

Conclusions

These problems will not go away if simply ignored by the general public. While a few new stories have been run on the matter, Retni-10 addiction generally does not receive much media attention. This is probably because of its legal status, its widespread use and the fact that it is already taken for granted in most households, the majority of users taking the drug on a regular basis with no ill consequences.

However, an entire generation of youth raised on Retni-10 will soon be entering the world of adults. The true test of this drug's effect on civilization lies in the near future.

Remembering a friend

Chris Eckel

The world lost one of its finer people last Tuesday. Lisa Jollimore, a dear friend to me and many other Billerica and UMass types, passed away from cancer.

In a surreal scene, hundreds of people from all walks of life showed up to bid her farewell this weekend. There was no shortage of crying, particularly during an especially moving eulogy. But knowing Lisa as I did, I doubt she would want any of us to remain captive to our grief. Instead, she probably would want us all go out and get some honey BBQ wings and a few Bud Lights. But sometime soon, the bottles will be emptied and the wings will run out — what then? How do we keep a wonderful woman close to our hearts?

In my mind, the best way we can remember and celebrate Lisa (and we all have a Lisa in our lives, even if by a different name) is to emulate her. The finest tribute we can give her is not a eulogy, not an article, not a plaque. Instead, the best move we could make would be to live our lives as she lived hers.

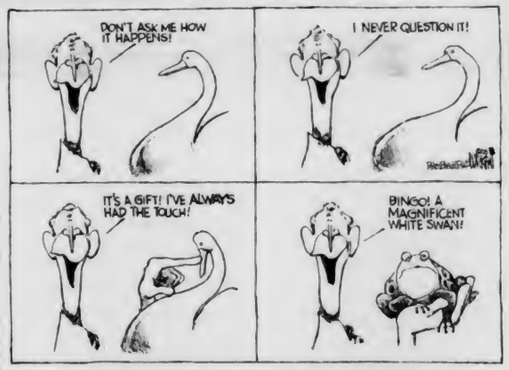
It may have been a short life, but it was a very complete life, full of smiles and laughter, good times and good friends, and a wonderful family and boyfriend. But most of all, it was a life full of astonishing acts of kindness to all of those around her.

Lance Armstrong became a hero because he was diagnosed with and beat cancer, but Lisa was a hero far before she became sick. She may not have ridden a bicycle, or even worn a cape, but she was an everyday hero. I doubt there was a single day that went by that she didn't brighten someone's day, whether it was in her role as a daughter, sister, girlfriend, Resident Assistant, or her SGA work. Every person in the line at the funeral home was a testament to that uncommon decency, and I know of many more who were touched by Lisa that were unable to attend.

She did a little bit of everything, but that doesn't mean there isn't plenty left over for the rest of us. To paraphrase another who died too soon, Martin Luther King, Junior, "Our lives begin to end the day we become silent about people and things that matter." Lisa always cared about the people and things that truly mattered, and didn't allow herself to get caught up in the things that didn't.

> She did a little bit of everything, but that doesn't mean there isn't plenty left over for the rest of us. To paraphrase another who died too soon, Martin Luther King, Junior: "Our lives begin to end the day we become silent about people and things that matter."

So forget about getting the hot new shoes or handbag, and start wondering about people who couldn't care less about brand names because they're too busy just trying to survive.



Find those people. Give them money, give them time, give them shelter, give them whatever you can give them, even if it means you have to settle for the L.L. Bean tote instead of the Louis Vuitton model. (If you ask me, having your initials on things is far cooler than having some stranger's monogram). Offer the guy you knocked down on the Boyden courts a hand getting up, even if he's on the other team.

When you see an old friend, go for the hug — handshakes are for business deals and sleazy politicians. If you're going to space out in class, think about ways to change your world, not of lines to use uptown — "Hello" works best anyhow. Recycle. Apologize first, even if it isn't your fault. Do something every day that you can be proud of. And whatever else you do and don't do, find the people you love and do whatever it is you can to show them the depths of that love.

Do I do all of these things? Hell no — I am as far from perfect as Dick Cheney is from sane. But am I working towards them? Absolutely. I don't know when my day will come, but I do know that Albert Camus may have been on to something when he said, "Do not wait for the last judgment, it takes place every day."

Lisa passed that test each and every day, and that's something to which I aspire. I can only hope that in the time I'm given, I can live as full a life as she did. Rest in peace, Lisa.

Historical relativity

Bret Devereaux

In American culture, history is not given much in the way of value. Indeed, it is common expression to label something that does not matter as 'ancient history' and move on. The only problem is that even ancient history does matter. Without history, without a frame of reference from which to interpret events occurring today, we end up as myopic and foolhardy as the Qing mandarins, who assumed that Imperial Britain could be fought off with the bows and spears of the Middle Kingdom.

What they lacked was not courage, or intelligence, but a frame of understanding with which to understand images and events around them. Had they known, perhaps, of similar attitudes that had been taken elsewhere in the world (such as the Americas) and the ends they wrought, perhaps the Sons of Heaven might have changed course.

One can be sure most readers are familiar with one senate minority whip's gaff involving his comparison of Guantanamo Bay to "Soviets in their gulags." Old news, to be sure, but illustrative of my point: Senator Durbin's knowledge of history is flawed at best. First and foremost, Gulag (Glavnoe Upravlenie Lagerei) stands for the administration for the system, not the individual camps themselves. There are no gulags, plural, only one Gulag, singular.

Of course, Durbin would have only been slightly less wrong had he been talking about individual camp complexes, for example Kolyma. Kolyma has a terrible body count. Guantanamo does not. The Kolyma river valley is deadly cold with vicious weather. Guantanamo Bay is neither of these things. Kolyma was a slave labor camp. Guantanamo is not. I could go on. The point is, even an illustrious senator not only showed his own poor grasp of history, but felt assured that no one would call him on it, since, after all, Americans don't know history.

It seems that most generations tend to view their trials as the most trying ever and their horrors as the most horrible ever. History does much to dispel this mistake and give perspective. Some have posited that our war in Iraq is really a war of revenge, the sons finishing what their fathers didn't a decade ago. But that's not what a war of revenge looks like. Hannibal Barca waged a war of revenge, all across Italy, revenge for his father.

He devastated the countryside and tore Roman armies apart. Rome returned the favor. When Rome waged a war of revenge against Carthage, they leveled the city to the ground and obliterated it completely (the salting of the earth is still, and will probably remain, in dispute…for my part, I believe salting the earth fits very well with the Roman character). Suddenly many modern conflicts don't seem quite so vicious. Perspective.

The Romans can give us a bit of perspective on something else as well. They had to deal with a strange, exotic and ancient religion in the east, a religion that produced violence and terror against the Roman state. The religion was Judaism, and the Roman response was the resounding sack of Jerusalem in 70 A.D. The great temple was destroyed, much of the city massacred, much of the city razed. If we are waging a 'war on Islam' as some have claimed, we are doing it with such untold comparable delicacy. Perhaps, compared to the Roman treatment of the Jews, the American treatment of Islam (which has at least attempted to be sensitive to the religion) isn't quite so much of a mess, is it? Perhaps we're not nearly as evil and vicious as we thought?

> Some have posited that our war in Iraq is really a war of revenge, the sons finishing what their fathers didn't a decade ago. But that's not what a war of revenge looks like.

And then there is the matter of empire. Is America an empire? Are we all imperialist? History tells us that the Imperial Game was not born in the Great Game, or even in Europe at all. The Imperial Game is a game states have played for ages all over the world. Successive dynasties in the Middle Kingdom, proud Persian rulers on the Peacock Throne, enlightened Greeks, laurel wreathed Romans, and many more have played this game throughout history.

If history teaches us anything, it teaches that those states and peoples who refuse to play the game of empire are destined to become pawns and territories in it and those states and peoples who wish to avoid being conquered must in turn play the game themselves. Japan chose to play the game, China refused. Japan survived, China was ripped apart and made successively subservient to the British, the Russians, Americans, Japanese and then Russians all over again before she wrenched herself free and chose to play the game again.

Russia chose to play the game, Poland refused. Russia became stronger and stronger, catching up to and indeed surpassing the rest of Europe by the 19th century. Poland was partitioned and repartitioned and rerepartitioned until she ceased to exist. Maybe America should only play the game to survive, and not to win (although one might point out that playing a game without playing to win is an easy way to lose), but to refuse to play the game, historically, has been a recipe for inconsequentiality followed swiftly by death.

History does matter. It is more than a laundry list of who killed whom, when and where. History is a tale of the successive battles of people, states, ideas and ideologies. To determine the velocity and direction of an object, two things are needed: its position now, and its position a split-second ago.

Without history, there is no way of knowing where we were yesterday, and thus no way of knowing where we are headed or how fast. Without knowledge of history we are running blindly into a dark room full of peril. I choose to open my eyes.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

THE GOP RAID ON STUDENT AID

In his State of the Union speech in January, President Bush emphasized the need to keep America competitive by investing in education. He stated that "we must continue to lead the world in human talent and creativity." He declared "our greatest advantage in the world has always been our educated, hardworking, ambitious people." I wholeheartedly agree with the president's sentiments, but unfortunately his rhetoric does not match his policies. While the president touts the importance of American competitiveness, his actions have just produced the single largest cut to the federal student aid program in history.

The recently passed Budget Reconciliation legislation includes roughly 12 billion dollars in cuts to federal student aid programs to finance the president's tax breaks for the wealthiest Americans. Seventy percent of the savings generated from the new cuts to student aid programs are achieved by forcing student and parent borrowers to pay excessive interest rates on their loans and by assessing new charges on parent borrowers. The Reconciliation legislation raises the interest rate cap that parent borrowers pay on their college loans from 7.9 percent to 8.5 percent. It also requires lenders to collect a one percent "insurance fee" on all college loans — a fee that will likely fall on the borrower. This legislation continues to require that student and parent borrowers pay excessive interest rates on their loans and further allows the federal government to utilize the overpayments to continue to offset big tax breaks.

The president's actions speak louder than words on education in other areas as well. For four years in a row, he and his congressional allies have failed to raise the maximum value of the Pell Grant scholarship even though it is worth 900 dollars less in inflation-adjusted terms than it was worth in 1975. And less than one week after his State of the Union address, the president, in his Fiscal Year 2007 official budget submission to Congress, laid bare his unwillingness to invest in education by cutting the 2007 Department of Education funding by 28 percent. The president's proposed '07 budget limits eligibility rules for Pell Grants, cuts total funding for student loans and eliminates programs that help low-income children prepare for college, like GEAR UP and Upward Bound. This is not how we should invest in our future.

At a time when the price of tuition has risen 40 percent over the last five years, the Republican-controlled Congress and the administration's policies have placed college even further out of reach for millions of Americans. We should, as the president said, "continue to lead the world in human talent and creativity." However, we cannot achieve this goal by approving cuts to student loans and eliminating other much-needed education programs.

TV plumber Denton owes fame, fortune to 'Housewives'

By Kathleen Kernicky
"South Florida Sun-Sentinel"

"Desperate Housewives" surround James Denton, but the handsome actor who plays mysterious plumber Mike Delfino on the ABC series feels like he's on lucky street. A hit show, a good salary and a wife and two kids.

"Life doesn't get much better than this," says Denton, who introduces himself as Jamie in a telephone interview. On this morning, Denton is at home in L.A. His son, Sheppard, 3, plays in the background. His daughter, Malin, is a year old. His wife, Erin, is a personal trainer.

Denton, 43, knows it's all about the women.

In January, he hosted the Miss America Pageant. On "Housewives," he's happy to play second to a female cast.

Q. Do you have anything in common with Mike? Are you handy around the house?

A. I have everything in common with Mike. Mike's a blue-collar guy, with a dog and a pickup truck. I'm describing myself as well. I grew up in a small town outside of Nashville. I play guitar, drive a pickup truck and I have a dog. I'm very handy around the house. I just installed a sprinkler system. I'm building a deck. I can do tile and flooring. I'm good with wood.

I'm a little easier to read than Mike. I'm not nearly that interesting or mysterious.

Q. Is Mike getting back together with Susan?

A. They started out like Sam and Diane of "Cheers." I think the audience got tired of the cat and mouse chasing their tails. The show had to find some way to get them apart. They had to give Susan (played by Teri Hatcher) someone else to obsess about. And there are other things Mike has to deal with. I don't think they're going to get us back together in this season. Of course, I'm completely guessing. Anything could happen.

Q. What's coming up?

A. There will be a two-hour finale that will resolve two mysteries: The Applewhites and Zach, whether or not he is definitely Mike's son. Even though he wants him to be his son, it's not going to turn his life around. Zach can choose to stay with Paul. (Watch for a confrontation soon between Mike and Dr. Ron, Susan's new beau, and her off-and-on husband, Carl). Dr. Ron and Mike and Carl are all together. Somebody goes down, that's all I'll say. One guy gets the worst of it. It's an interesting confrontation.

Q. What's it like working with so many women?

A. You certainly get a lot less attention. The hair and wardrobe people don't pay attention to me. When you work with five women, they're very preoccupied. Which is good because I don't like people fussing over me.

Q. Who would you like to see guest star on the show?

A. Robert Downey Jr. He's the first guy who comes to mind. His sense of humor is perfect. It's a tricky humor on the show. It's not a sitcom humor. It takes a certain sensitivity. He has it.

Q. If you weren't an actor, what would be the next best thing?

A. If I could do anything, I'd play big-league baseball. If I had a job, I'd probably teach history and coach basketball. We're saving our money and we have a place in Montana. When "Housewives" runs its course, that's probably what we'll do. I love acting, but it might be nice to do something that makes a little more of a difference.

I never came here to be a movie star. It's not anything that interests me. When you've got a wife and two kids at home, you have other things to worry about.

Q. What does your wife think of the show?

A. She likes the show creatively. She really likes "Grey's Anatomy." Just about every Sunday, we watch the show together and then we watch "Grey's Anatomy." She tolerates me. She sits through me to get to Patrick Dempsey.

James Denton had a late but important break into ABC's hit, "Desperate Housewives."

Violence still aired

By Aaron Barnhart
Knight Ridder Newspapers

Like the cartoon character Wile E. Coyote, it seems the purveyors of kids' television shows never learn.

Thirty years after researchers found that Saturday morning cartoons were more violent than prime-time TV shows, a study released Thursday argued that little had changed.

The report from the Parents Television Council, called "Wolves in Sheep's Clothing," found that children's shows were still more violent than adult shows — even when "cartoony" depictions of violence were factored out.

With Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., sitting beside him, Parents Television Council executive director L. Brent Bozell dropped an anvil on the children's TV industry Thursday in Washington.

"This disturbing trend signifies that parents can no longer be confident that their children will not have access to dark violence, sexual innuendo or offensive language on entertainment programming targeted toward children," Bozell said.

There was no immediate response from the networks to the council's report. Cartoon Network issued a release saying it had not seen the report but it was confident that its children's programming was "age-appropriate."

However, the report came under fire from a nonprofit group that works with networks to promote excellence in children's television.

David Kleeman, executive director of the American Center for Children and Media, said the council's researchers did not watch public TV, which is known for its children's programming — and did not take into account whether people on the shows were punished or learned lessons from their bad behaviors.

"They looked at all of these behaviors in isolation," Kleeman said. "That kind of analysis eliminates any opportunity to do comedy, or drama, or even learning."

To measure violence in the shows, thousands of incidents were documented by Parents Television Council researchers over a three-week marathon last summer of taping and logging children's TV programs.

The researchers, many of them recent college graduates working out of the council's Virginia headquarters, watched more than 430 hours of shows on the eight commercial networks most popular with 5- to 10-year-olds: Nickelodeon, Cartoon Network, ABC Family, ABC, WB Kids, Fox, NBC and the Disney Channel.

While a large number of shows were judged to be squeaky clean — notably live-action programs like Nickelodeon's "Hi-Jinks" and NBC's "Trading Spaces Boys and Girls" — others had content that raised red flags for Bozell.

In an episode of the Disney Channel's "Lizzie McGuire," for example, a child talks back to his father, who is supposed to discipline him for a misdeed. This scene, according to the Parents Television Council, promoted "disrespect for parents or authority."

But the dominant theme in the study was cartoon violence. Among the worst offenders was Cartoon Network's "Teen Titans," the study said. It, along with shows like the WB's "Xiaolin Showdown" and Fox's "Shaman King," are bonanzas of "fantasy violence," so named because of the lack of bloodshed and other elements of more realistic depictions.

Based on this three-week sample, the study said, children can be expected to view the following in an average afternoon or weekend of watching children's TV:

- Nearly eight incidents of violence per hour. Even when Wile E. Coyote-era "cartoony" violence is extracted, the average dropped to only 6.30 incidents per hour. "To put this figure in perspective," the report stated, "consider that in 2002 the six broadcast networks combined averaged only 4.71 instances of violence per hour" during prime time.
- Nearly two cases of "verbal aggression," like insults and abusive name-calling, every hour.
- At least one "disruptive, disrespectful or otherwise problematic attitude or behavior" per hour.
- Sexual content appeared, on average, 0.62 times per hour, usually in the form of provocative pictures of female characters.

'Walk the Line' doesn't 'Cash' in story

By Louis B. Carlozo
"Chicago Tribune"

My pivotal thrill watching the Johnny Cash biopic "Walk the Line" came on hearing the title song, when I turned to my wife and said, "Ain't no way that's Joaquin Phoenix. They had to have dubbed Cash's voice in."

I would've staked my previous career as a pro musician on it, in fact. But how wrong I was. Turns out that Phoenix and co-star Reese Witherspoon as June Carter Cash sang all their own vocals for the film — an admirable feat that Oscar winner Jamie Foxx didn't even try with "Ray," and that undid Kevin Spacey as a clunky Bobby Darin in 2004's "Beyond the Sea."

Now comes the DVD release of "Walk the Line" (Fox Home Entertainment, $39.98 deluxe set), just in time for the Oscars. The film is up for five Academy Awards, including Best Actor and Actress for Phoenix and Witherspoon, and has already snagged Golden Globes for Best Actor/Actress in a Musical/Comedy and Best Picture, Musical/Comedy. Also out between now and March 7: three more Cash DVDs, including for the first time a gospel story he co-wrote and narrated.

Why the sudden Cash resurgence? One could argue, and with good reason, that the glimmer of Oscar gold has movie moguls stampeding to empty their film vaults. But many others — including the singer's own son — see it differently.

"Part of what made my father so attractive was the enigma. He was a mystery," said John Carter Cash, who served as an executive producer on "Walk the Line." "I saw him in all his human weaknesses. There were aspects of him where he was just a country boy — and he wrestled with his demons. But he also created this stage persona that was a mystery and so much more than the man."

"He was the ultimate truth teller," said Dave Urbanski, author of "The Man Comes Around: The Spiritual Journey of Johnny Cash" (Relevant Books). "When you get right down to it, he represented America — the good, the bad and everything in between. Johnny Cash was Everyman. And Cash had a special place in his heart for people on the fringes, the outcasts of society."

That could be because Cash himself was an outcast. The onetime door-to-door appliance salesman was barely capable of doing anything with confidence — including singing and songwriting — when he begged his way into an audition at Sam Phillips' Memphis Recording Service in 1955. "Walk the Line" impressively depicts how Cash, even as his star rose and talents grew, spiraled into the dregs of drug addiction, alcoholism and unhinged behavior.

The single DVD of "Walk the Line" ($29.98) comes with limited extras, including 10 deleted scenes with optional commentary by director James Mangold and film commentary by Mangold. The two-disc set, for an extra $10, adds three extended performances by Phoenix and Witherspoon ("Rock and Roll Ruby," "Jackson" and "Cocaine Blues") and three featurettes (a making-of close-up, a look at Cash's Folsom comeback and "Ring of Fire: The Passion of Johnny & June").

For my money, the extra disc would be much more intriguing if it included an actual Cash concert or full-length interview. "Walk the Line," after all, only tells part of the story; Cash battled addiction well after 1968's Folsom Prison concert. He also weathered crises from a falling out with his longtime bandmates in the "Tennessee Three" to the death of June just four months before his own in 2003.

"'Walk the Line' leaves it happily ever after, and it wasn't," John Carter Cash said. "There were still struggles, even though they (Johnny and June) loved each other more than ever at the end of their lives."

Anyone who saw "Walk the Line" and embraced the man's legacy as I did must surely hunger to know more. So while this film represents a fine addition to anyone's DVD library, I can only lament the squandered opportunity to unearth more true-life substance behind and beyond the movie. Then again, there's always hope for a DVD encore.

One aspect of Cash's life that "Walk the Line" misses — and remains occluded to many fans — was his Christian conversion. John Carter Cash said there are no current plans to make a "Walk the Line" sequel: "But if there was one, the beginning of the film would be his movement into the Christian faith. He was tough. He fell down a lot. But he was real and he kept on going."

Cash rediscovered the Christianity of his youth in the early 1970s, striking up a friendship with evangelist Billy Graham — who persuaded Cash to co-write, sing in and narrate 1972's "The Gospel Road: A Story of Jesus" (Fox Home Entertainment, $19.98).

In the movie, June plays Mary Magdalene as Johnny retraces Jesus' life from birth to death and resurrection. While it's not on the dramatic level of, say, Mel Gibson's "The Passion of the Christ," "The Gospel Road" earns marks for its earnest retelling of Jesus' life story. And for anyone seeking insight into the transforming force that salvaged Cash from his personal wreckage, "The Gospel Road" is fascinating not so much for its already-familiar subject, but the way Cash embraces it. June, Johnny and Kris Kristofferson also contribute original songs.

Hollywood honchos turn back to comics

By David Hiltbrand
Knight Ridder Newspapers

By almost any measure — exposure, esteem, money — writing for comic books is a big step down for authors who are enjoying success in TV, films or fiction.

But try telling that to the big-name scribes — including horror-meister Steven King, Joss Whedon (creator of TV's "Buffy the Vampire Slayer") and writer/director Reggie ("House Party") Hudlin, now head of entertainment at BET — who are taking the plunge into the pulpy world of muscle-bound superheroes. They all think they've died and gone to heaven.

Thriller writer Brad Meltzer ("The Tenth Justice") remembers being recruited by Bob Shrek, the editor of the Green Arrow series.

"He waited around until the very end of a book signing and asked, 'Do you want to write The Green Arrow?'" Meltzer recalls. "I said, 'Don't say that unless you're serious.' I've been waiting my whole life for someone to say those words."

For many authors, comic books possess an evergreen coolness that far surpasses their lowbrow standing in the culture. It's a happy association that often extends back to childhood.

As a consequence, getting to dabble in the colorful realm of comics is like fantasy camp for many writers.

Of course, it benefits the publishers as well. "We get compelling storytelling and a fresh outlook on over 40 years of character continuity," says Ruwan Jayatilleke, director of development at Marvel, in New York. "And obviously we're going for a crossover audience. Increasingly we're seeing these (comic) books collected into graphic novels."

"When you have stories from well-known creative types like Joss Whedon or (sci-fi author) Orson Scott Card, or Reggie Hudlin, there's more of a mainstream audience going to Barnes & Noble or Amazon or even discovering their local comic book shop," he says.

Approximately half of the comic book industry's $500 million in sales last year came from graphic novels and paperback anthologies — illustrated books such as Meltzer's "Identity Crisis," which wound a murder mystery around some of DC Comics' most cherished characters, crusaders like Superman, Batman, the Flash and Green Lantern.

The traditional comic book, which now typically sells for $2.99, makes up the other part of sales. A hot title may sell 100,000 to 200,000 copies.

Writing for a comic book takes some adjustment, especially for novelists. "It's a very visual medium," notes Charlie Huston, 38, author of the vampire/detective mashup "Already Dead." He's now working on "Moon Knight," a comic about a brooding, cowled superhero.

"You have to learn to reduce the text and plot, and let the pictures carry the story as much as possible. My prose style is pretty spare to begin with, but it's shocking when you see it on the page how even a few words can begin to crowd a panel and diminish the action."

Even writers who are used to working in visual forms such as TV and film have to drastically pare down their prose.

"I keep finding myself with way too much story to confine in 22 pages," the standard comic length, says Damon Lindelof, the co-creator of ABC's "Lost," who is writing "Ultimate Wolverine vs. Hulk."

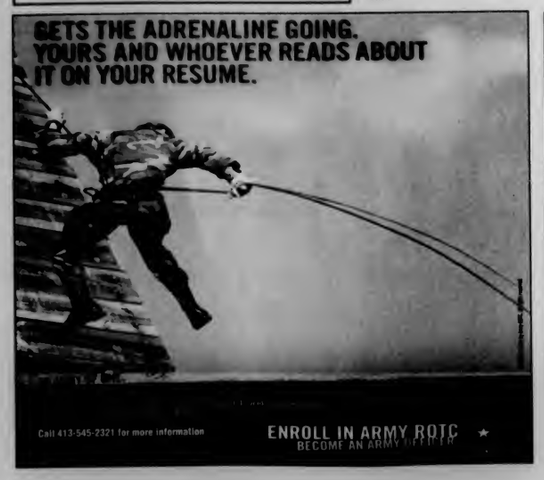
"I'm forced to cut and compress and tell the story in a 'snap-shotty' fashion. The way you convey emotion with a picture versus the way an actor will perform it is a very different style of writing. I'm still trying to find the rhythm."

And writing a comic book in the digital era, it turns out, is a surprisingly solitary pursuit. "I assumed that the collaboration between the writer and artist would be fairly intimate, a lot of back and forth," says Huston. "But it's not like the old days when they were all together in New York, working out of the famed Marvel bullpen."

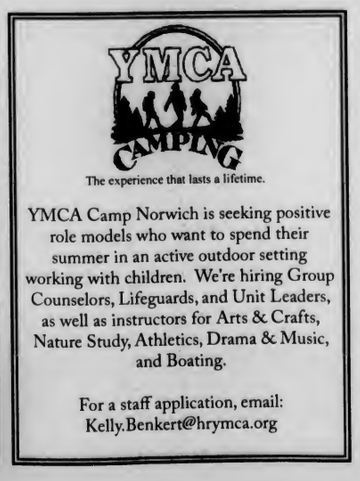
"The truth is, because of where the technology is now, the artists are really spread out," Huston continues. He has never met David Finch, the Canadian artist with whom he is collaborating on "Moon Knight."

When acclaimed Scottish crime novelist Denise Mina ("Deception") was recruited to write the occult comic "Hellblazer," the basis for Keanu Reeves' movie "Constantine," she wanted to set her seven-part story arc in Glasgow. The problem was that her artist, Leonardo Manco, resides in Argentina.

So Mina broke out her video camera to provide Manco with some authentic local flavor. "I made a DVD of the area with lots of reference points to all these places I was going to mention," she says. "I was quite heavily pregnant and climbing all over these building sites. The guys were sneaking me in at lunchtime because I told them it was for DC Comics."



Fan reaction to the celebrity scribes has been generally positive. "You have skeptical people because they're from TV or movies. And then you have people who follow their TV shows," says Jamar McLaurin, 32, who works at "Out of Time Comics" in Philadelphia.



None of these name writers are motivated to work in comic books for the payday. "You basically get $90 to $150 a page," says Douglas Rushkoff, prolific media critic and novelist ("Exit Strategy") who is writing the biblically themed comic "Testament." That's next to nothing compared with the wages of Hollywood.

"They understand the realities of working in this medium," says Marvel's Jayatilleke. "It isn't something that reaches 40 million people per week. There aren't huge ad dollars being pumped in. It comes out of a desire to recapture some of the things they loved as a child."

But the work has other compensations. "I have one friend who is obsessed with comics," says Mina. "I used his name in 'Hellblazer.' I think he wants to marry me now."

Just the beginning for Matta

By David Haugh
Knight Ridder

HOOPESTON, Ill. — At 4:36 a.m. Wednesday — Thad Matta remembers the clock face like he would a scoreboard — the Ohio State basketball coach sprang out of bed in his Evanston hotel room to see who in the name of Woody Hayes was buzzing his cell phone.

Jim Tressel was forgiven quickly.

"Coach Tressel [text-]messaged me — hey, it was 5:36 his time [in Ohio] — and he gave me a strong message to relate to my team," recalled Matta, whose Buckeyes clinched a share of the Big Ten title later that night with a narrow victory over Northwestern. "I was so fired up after reading it, I couldn't go back to sleep."

Matta, 38, has supplied Big Ten coaches their share of sleepless nights this season, a surprising one (22-4 record) at that in just his second year at the school.

All of this excites Jim Matta, Thad's dad who showed up Friday at Hoopeston High School for his daily 6 a.m. workout with more bounce in his step than usual.

"This is fun for us too," Jim said, wearing a red Ohio State hat and speaking for himself and his wife, Ellanat, who works in the school's business office.

A coach, teacher and athletic director at the school for 33 years until retiring in 2000, Jim Matta first started bringing Thad to work when the boy was still in diapers. One day as a toddler, Thad replaced the toy car his dad gave him with a basketball.

As the years passed Jim's phone booth of an office, a brown tile floor surrounded by concrete walls, served as the basketball laboratory for the Matta's youngest son. If those walls could talk, they might ask whatever happened to the kid who would never leave.

After school until his dad was done for the day, Thad would sit in front of the athletic director's desk and study the way his dad handled problems with coaches and players. He paid attention as coaches traded theories on the newest X and O, using those ideas to help form his list of goals he tacked on his bedroom wall.

"I knew as early as the third grade that this is where I want to be," Matta said on the phone.

Where Matta is now is atop his profession, one of just two Division I coaches to win 20 games in his first five seasons as head coach.

He has compiled a 144-47 record in six seasons at Butler, Xavier and now Ohio State by combining the charm of a common man with an uncommon work ethic passed along by a 66-year-old father who still fills in as a substitute bus driver to stay busy.

Jim Matta could only laugh relating how his son's motor seldom stops for anybody, not even Mom and Dad, who routinely make the five-hour drive from Hoopeston to Columbus.

"Between him recruiting the night before and his duties on game day, I think we got to speak to him exactly one minute last time we were there," Jim Matta said. "I'm hoping I get to ride home with him Sunday after the game so we get 15 minutes."

Thad Matta's 15 minutes are far from up.

Roots run deep

Along Main Street in this southeastern Illinois community six miles from the Indiana border, a boarded-up gas station has been abandoned so long a sign still advertises a gallon of unleaded for $1.58.

The most popular diner in town still does not accept credit cards, and Friday marked the opening at the downtown theater of "Brokeback Mountain," months after its release. One of Illinois' most cutting-edge outposts, this isn't.

At least three factories have closed and hundreds of jobs have vanished in recent years, disturbing the peace of mind Vermilion County locals enjoyed for decades living in a place named for a prominent landowner and not the game that occupies so many winter weekend nights. Much has changed since the mid-1980s when basketball united a bustling community and Matta, who finished third in Illinois Mr. Basketball voting in 1985, led Hoopeston-East Lynn to two straight third-place finishes in the Class A state tournament.

Kevin Root, a high school teammate of Matta's who is now Hoopeston's athletic director and basketball coach, recently made a videotape copy of an '85 tournament game for a friend when he noticed something funny.

"Thad was telling players what to do, talking to officials all the time," Root said. "He's the same person he was in high school, except now he's wearing dress clothes and has a little less hair."

The sign welcoming visitors to Hoopeston says, "People Who Care About You," and Thad Matta believes the words are more a way of life than a slogan.

Growing up in a place where he could ride his bike after dark without worry developed a trust in people that, for example, helps him break the ice quickly with recruits and their parents. Knowing people on the block well enough to say hello honed a folksy, conversational skill at which Matta excels.

"You learned to interact with people and be yourself," he said of life as a kid in Hoopeston.

Athletics helped sharpen an edge beneath Matta's soft exterior. The bigger the school Matta faced, whether it was at Hoopeston, or at Butler and Xavier, the bigger the chip on his shoulder felt.

"Always being the guy or the team from the small town in high school going up against the Danvilles or going up to play the guys in Chicago, it was there," Matta said. "I think I've always had that chip going against the 'big guy.'"

That isn't the only way Matta has stayed the same since he was a teenager. After the victory over Northwestern, Jim Matta saw an Ohio State official rush his son around to postgame commitments when something familiar happened.

"Thad stopped to talk to a bunch of little kids waiting for him, just like he used to in high school," Jim Matta said.

It brought to mind the newspaper clipping Jim sent his son recently that Thad tucked into his desk and close to his heart.

"Part of the article said, 'A person will not remember what you said or what you did, but he will never forget how you made them feel,'" Jim Matta said. "I don't think Thad will ever change his small-town ways."

Always learning

Nebraska coach Barry Collier, who coached Matta for one season at Butler and later added him to his staff, thinks those small-town ways have contributed to big-time success in the profession. Unlike some coaches whose large egos match their paychecks, Collier pointed out Matta adjusts his game plan each season around the talent on his roster.

"It's not like it's Thad's round hole and he's going to hammer a square peg into it," said Collier, who recommended Butler hire the 32-year-old Matta in 2000 when he left to take over at Nebraska. "He lets kids play to their strengths and he learned that over the years."

Some of those lessons also came from North Carolina State coach Herb Sendek, who hired Matta to his first full-time job as an assistant coach at Miami (Ohio) in 1994.

"What stood out was Thad's passion," Sendek recalled. "He was always asking questions about a new play and was always inquisitive. I'm not really surprised at all."

Nor will anybody in college basketball be surprised if Matta's name continues to be mentioned in connection with the opening at Indiana, despite his stated desire to remain in Columbus as long as his bosses want him.

alone on Quick and beat him top shelf for his seventh of the season.

On Saturday night the Black Bears were able to score two goals in the first four minutes of play. Greg Moore and Rob Bellamy both beat UMass goalie Gabe Winer to open up the scoring.

Billy Ryan scored Maine's third goal of the night at 12:17. The score came on a five-on-three power play with both Degon and David Leaderer in the box for hooking and holding, respectively.

The Black Bears continued to pour it on and put UMass in a 4-0 hole just three minutes into the second. The goal was Maine's third power play score of the night and was credited to Billy Ryan.

The Minutemen slowed the bleeding slightly when they got on the board at 5:48. Freshman Chris Davis skated in one-on-one with Bishop and beat him for his ninth of the season.

The Minutemen then came back again and scored with just over a minute remaining in the period. Senior captain Stephen Werner brought the score to 4-2 when he beat Bishop on the power play.

Both teams scored once in the third to bring the final tally to 5-3. Maine's goal was recorded by Josh Soares and freshman Topher Bevis notched his for the Minutemen.

seedings. UMass clinched the No. 7 spot with the win and will have a rematch with No. 10 Xavier (13-14, 8-8 A-10) on Wednesday at 6:30 p.m. in Cincinnati in a first round clash.

If the Minutemen beat the Musketeers, they will face No. 2 seed Charlotte (18-11, 11-5 A-10) on Thursday at 6:30 p.m. Charlotte upended UMass 72-71 on Feb. 22 at the Mullins Center.

"It's going to be a great challenge going into the Atlantic 10 (Tournament), but I've always enjoyed tournament play," UMass coach Travis Ford said. "I'm glad we played the way we did coming off of the showing we had at Richmond (an 81-66 loss on Wednesday). You always like to have some confidence going in."

Being the only senior on the team, Saturday was clearly all about Viggiano, although he received plenty of support from junior Stephane Lasme. Lasme finished with a game-high 18 points and 11 rebounds, and also blocked two shots to give him 105 on the season, the second best single-season total in school history.

Lasme was a dominant force all day, registering four dunks in the game, two off of feeds from Viggiano.

"I told him if he gave me good passes today I'd do something special for him," Lasme said, referring to a high-flying reverse jam he threw down off of a pass from Viggiano in the first half.

While the offense yielded the highlight reel-worthy material, it was the defense that led the Maroon and White to the win.

UMass held the Musketeers without a field goal for the final 8:02, going on a 11-2 run to close the game, ignited by Viggiano's 3-pointer.

Viggiano received a loud standing ovation from the crowd when he was removed with six seconds remaining in the game.

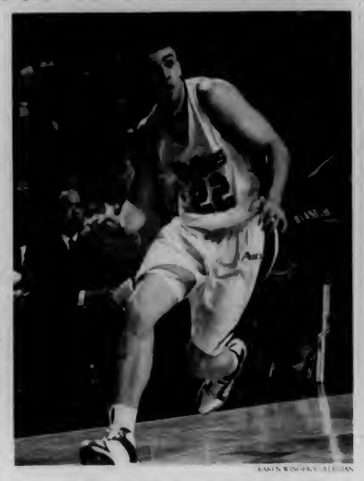
"I couldn't really ask for anything more," Viggiano said. "It seemed to be a perfect day all-around."

NOTES: UMass got a solid effort from sophomore Lawrence Carrier off the bench. Carrier scored all eight of his points in the first half. When UMass's offense was sputtering.

"Every single person scored, every single person got a rebound — that's been 27 games coming," Ford said. "I was excited that everyone made an impact in this basketball game for our team."

TOUGHING IT OUT

Viggiano left the game briefly in the first half after making a pass to Lasme. He said he felt his right shoulder pop out on the play, but after taking some aspirin on the bench, he returned to the game.



Viggiano wasn't the only player banged up during the game. Xavier's B.J. Raymond received eight stitches over his left eye after catching an elbow in the first half. Raymond returned to the game in the second half, but didn't record a point.

SAM'S A THRILLER

The ovation Viggiano received at the end of the game was certainly the loudest of the day, but a close second was the one Sam the Minuteman received for the rendition of "Thriller" he performed during a second half timeout with two members of the UMass Hoop Band.

WEDDING BELLS

The new video boards at the Mullins Center provided more than just basketball highlights on Saturday, as UMass team bus driver Guy Racine proposed to Becky Maheux via the screens during a first half timeout… she said yes.

KARIN WINEGAR/ COLLEGIAN

Senior forward Jeff Viggiano had 12 points and five rebounds in his final game at the Mullins Center on Saturday, a 65-56 win over Xavier.

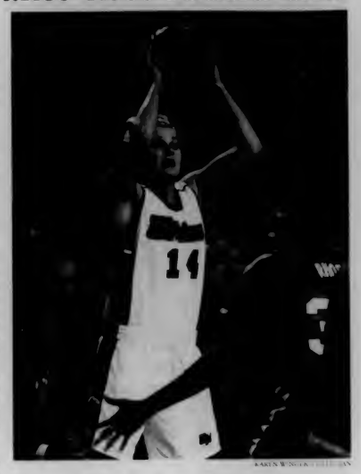
take shots that would not have to be made if the call had stayed the same.

While the overturned shot clock violation may not have been the correct call, Dacko knows that her team had plenty of opportunities to win the game.

"I'm extremely disappointed," Dacko said. "Coming out of the gates, Duquesne certainly beat us to hustle points. They came out ready to go mentally and physically. They were very aggressive coming at us, and we turned the ball over. They were playing zones, they were playing attacking man, and we were just throwing the ball out of bounds.

"We came out in the second half, got a lead, but then made one basket in six minutes of play. And again, we continued to turn the ball over. We came out of the gate in the second half and missed four open lay-ups, uncontested lay-ups. We can't afford to miss lay-ups."

UMass had the hot hand in the first half, shooting 59 percent from the field, and going 4-for-6 from behind the arc. The second half was the difference maker, as the Minutewomen went only 6-for-21 from the field.



UMass wanted to play Duquesne in the first round, but was unable to get past the Dukes when the season was on the line.

For that reason, the Minutewomen have closed the book on the 2005-2006 campaign, and the players and coaches were extremely emotional about the way they went down.

"It sucks," Mills said. "I'm a little emotional right now. It's disappointing. We should have beaten them. We're definitely a better team. It's just frustrating to play in that game because we missed so many easy opportunities. We missed seven lay-ups. That's 14 points. That would have put us ahead by 10 points. I know Marnie has been talking about inconsistency, and that's what our season has been about. We didn't get the job done tonight, and it's really disappointing for the whole team."

The Minutewomen had a strong second half of the season, and even though they made an early exit in the playoffs, the players and coaches know that the year was not a failure.

"I have mixed emotions (about the season)," Mills said. "I was excited that we were able to get our act together at the end. It's just disappointing. Coming into the season, I know everybody on our team had high hopes of what we were going to be able to do. We got glimpses of that throughout the season, but as a whole, we weren't able to execute like we should have. We're going to work hard in the postseason, and use this to fuel us for next year."

KARIN WINEGAR/ COLLEGIAN

Sophomore forward Pam Rosanio had 13 points and five assists in a 56-51 loss to Duquesne in the first round of the A-10 Tournament.

Minutewomen gain confidence

Villapiano, Typadis and Holly Drown to close out the half on a 7-0 run.

Connerty and Lindsay Cassell then scored two more goals to start the second half, making it a 9-3 affair, before Tara Schoen stopped the run with a free position goal with 24 minutes left. The Crimson then rallied off three more goals, two by Curtis and one by Simmons, to pull off their own 4-0 run and close the Minutewomen lead to two.

But Harvard was never able to take the lead back, as UMass went on a 3-0 run to keep a safe distance. Crimson attack Allie Kaveney rounded out the scoring with two minutes left in the game, an unassisted goal that made it 12-8 in favor of the Minutewomen.

In scoring so many goals in transition from so many different players, it's safe to say what worked well for the Minutewomen.

"We were a faster team than they were," Bolduc said. "We really exploited that well in transition. Everyone on our team is just fast."

Equally impressive was the turnaround in net by goalkeeper Lauren McCarthy. After getting lambasted by the scoring attack of Boston University last Wednesday, giving up 15 goals and saving nine before being pulled with five minutes to go, she made a tremendous upward rebound on Saturday. The junior had 14 saves, two off of her career-high, and gave up eight goals.

"It's a confidence thing," Bolduc said of McCarthy's turnaround. "The thing is after the Holy Cross and BU games, where we hung in there for 30 minutes, we recognized who we were. We declared as a team that we weren't going to lose [against Harvard]. We had a mentality change."

Drug testing will have impact

By Gerry Fraley
Knight Ridder

DALLAS — Big changes are coming in baseball.

"Coffee sales will be up," San Diego closer Trevor Hoffman said. "It will be a lot more relaxed," San Francisco manager Felipe Alou said.

"No more playing three weeks in a row," New York Yankees right-hander Mike Mussina said.

"Greenies" are gone.

Or at least they are supposed to be gone as part of Major League Baseball's latest drug testing policy. Without those beloved little amphetamine pills, the game is about to slow down.

Don't be surprised if an infielder who took a red-eye charter flight out of California after the previous night's game dozes off during the seventh inning. Look for sluggish play, especially early in the season as players adjust to life without greenies, a name that comes from the color of the capsule when the drug was introduced to the game.

"Guys who relied on them are going to have to find alternative solutions," Los Angeles Angels manager Mike Scioscia said. "Obviously, some players have leaned on them. There have always been things that players used."

Amphetamines were developed during World War II to help military and defense workers prevent fatigue. They seeped into society and became prevalent in baseball when expansion complicated travel and schedules.

In 1970, amphetamines were made illegal unless obtained by prescription. That was too late for baseball. By then, greenies were everywhere in the game.

Players depended on greenies to handle the rigors of cross-country travel, three-hour day games after three-hour night games, a 162-game season squeezed into 182 days and a lifestyle that often included partying until sunrise.

"Amphetamines were not being used for kicks," former major-league left-hander Hill "Spaceman" Lee wrote in his book "The Wrong Stuff." "They were being used to sober up... to get the pulse going on the morning after the night before."

Going without help from chemistry was so rare that a player who did not use amphetamines was said to be "naked." Better to have a team full of speed freaks, because the other dugout had a full supply of greenies.

In his book "Perfect I'm Not: Boomer on Beer, Brawls, Backaches and Baseball," Boston Red Sox left-hander David Wells wrote: "Those little buggers will open your eyes, sharpen your focus and get your blood moving on demand over and over again. I won't ever object to a sleepy-eyed infielder beaming up to help me win."

Good teams did greenies. In sworn court testimony, World Series winners such as the 1979 Pittsburgh Pirates and 1980 Philadelphia Phillies were said to be loaded with amphetamine users.

Great players did greenies. Pete Rose, the all-time hits leader, said in a "Playboy" interview that he used greenies. During the Pittsburgh drug trials of the 1980s, Hall of Famers Willie Mays and Willie Stargell were described as amphetamine providers.

"I don't know what kind of speed it was, but it kept your eyes open," John Milner testified about the "red juice" that the legendary outfielder gave him when they were with the New York Mets.

That is all supposed to end this season. The drug agreement unveiled in November included tougher penalties for steroid use and the first ban of amphetamines.

Greenies and steroids have had markedly different effects on the game. According to Dr. Charles Yesalis, a professor of health and human development at Penn State, steroids enhanced players' performances while amphetamines enabled players simply to get on the field and play at their expected level game after game.

"From a business standpoint, you could argue that anabolic steroids had a far greater effect than amphetamines," Dr. Yesalis said. "It's the whole 'Chicks dig the long ball' thing. Balls going over fences and records being broken."

What made amphetamines so damaging, Dr. Yesalis said, is their threat to players' mental and physical health.

Dr. Yesalis said that if given the choice between taking steroids or taking amphetamines, he would pick steroids because amphetamines "can stone-cold kill you." Amphetamine users often get into a damaging cycle in which they must use barbiturates such as alcohol to come down from the high of greenies.

Piazza feels at home in San Diego

By Lisa Olson
Knight Ridder

PEORIA, Ariz. — The meridian points are aligned, beginning with the top, with Mike Cameron in center field, and flowing south, to the spot where Mike Piazza crouches behind the plate.

It feels right, like a bolt of energy has shot through the San Diego Padres. The yin balances the yang, the physical in harmony with the mental. Earlier the Padres twisted their way through a morning yoga class, embracing their inner chi, but now it is mid-afternoon on a bright spring day, and Piazza and Cameron move easily in their natural positions.

Piazza appears thinner, happier, though he swears both are desert illusions. Cameron models his profile for a visitor, touching the nine plates and one screw that hold together his face. He'll blend in perfectly with all the other made-over Californians, his reconstruction virtually flawless.

They've jumped out of New York, and into SoCal's mellow belly. Or were they pushed? It doesn't really matter, because neither is inclined to point fingers. There will be no Frank Thomas tantrums, no bitter words for the organization that bid them adieu.

In eight seasons with the Mets, Piazza experienced tremendous highs (the 2000 World Series against the Yankees, his game-winning home run at Shea after the Sept. 11 attacks) and a few lows (got a first baseman's glove, Mike?) Cameron's two years with the Mets were marred by injuries, none more horrific than the head-on collision in the outfield with Carlos Beltran, the man who replaced Cameron in center field.

But scars fade, just like the scenery. The Padres expect Piazza to bat cleanup and catch 100-120 games this season, so he puts his 37-year-old body through hours of rigorous flexibility-enhancing routines and is often the last to leave Peoria Stadium.

"I think Mike's got something to prove," says manager Bruce Bochy. "Obviously in New York they tried to make him do the transition to first. He could've signed with an American League team and been a [designated hitter]. It certainly would've been a lot easier. But he likes to be involved with the game, he likes catching. He has a passion for it."

The Angels or even the Twins seemed a better fit for Piazza, who spent much of his final two seasons with the Mets muttering the same non-threatening mantra. "Dude, it's frustrating," he'd say, after being dropped deep in the lineup, or hearing the boos upon failing to throw out a runner, or waiting by the phone for free-agent offers that never came. The Mets poorly orchestrated his ill-fated switch to first base, but Piazza shrugs about it now. If baseball could clone his attitude, there would be no villains in the game.

"For lack of a better term, I have a soldier's mentality. You tell me what to do and I'll do it," he says. "The Mets asked me to play first and I did it, and I don't regret it. I wish I could've played better but I did the best I could.

"When a door closes you have to look for the positive," he says, and now he's talking about the Mets' desire to cut him loose, without offering even a good-faith, one-year, incentive-heavy deal. "It was just evident they wanted to go in another direction and that's fine. There are absolutely no hard feelings. I'll always be thankful to the Mets. I got a tremendous contract there, I met amazing people there, I had amazing experiences there, you know?"

Imagine — an athlete without a gripe reflex. But it gets better, because here comes Cameron asking about his boys Cliff Floyd and David Wright and Jose Reyes. Like it did in Queens, Cameron's aura lights up the clubhouse. Something — spirit, a groove — died in the Mets when Cameron and Beltran smashed into each other last August at Petco Park. While Cameron, suffering from concussion and gruesomely disfigured, lay in a San Diego hospital wondering if he'd ever play ball again, the Padres' Trevor Hoffman brought him a teddy bear. When Cameron was released from the hospital, the Mets sent a private jet. Baseball is, after all, a game of symmetry and circuitous happenstance.

Would the crash have occurred if Cameron hadn't graciously moved to right field when Beltran became a Met? Would a baseball rotate differently with one less stitch? Such were Cameron's meditations throughout his recuperation.

"I had a long time to analyze a lot of things," he says. "I wasn't going to be the future of the Mets. My future wasn't in right field. I loved New York, it gave me the opportunity to see a lot of new things and hopefully I helped set the tone for the Mets' future. I look at that as being a success. Maybe now it's a test from a higher power to see if I can face my fears in the same place I was injured."

UMass finishes strong

Viggiano a winner in last home game

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

During his four years as a member of the Massachusetts men's basketball team, Jeff Viggiano has been known for doing a little bit of everything. That versatility was on display on Saturday in a 65-56 UMass (13-14, 8-8 Atlantic 10) win over Xavier on Senior Day.

Viggiano scored 12 points in his final game at the Mullins Center, including a 3-pointer from the top of the key with 5:15 remaining to give UMass a 57-54 lead it would not relinquish. The senior captain also added five rebounds, two assists, two blocks and two steals in a typically well-rounded performance.

Viggiano put on a show for the crowd of 6,222 — many of whom were from his hometown of Suffield, Conn. — with two monster dunks in the first half. Early in the game he took a pass from freshman Chris Lowe in transition and stuffed it home. Viggiano followed that up two minutes later with an authoritative put back on a Lowe miss.

"I had so much energy," Viggiano said. "I could have played all night tonight. I didn't want the game to end. That was just a great atmosphere."

"He played a tremendous basketball game on both ends of the floor," UMass coach Travis Ford said. "He had that extra step to him today and that's what Jeff needs to be successful. If he has that gleam in his eye, he's really good."

While the win was a fitting sendoff for Viggiano, it also had a major impact on the Atlantic 10 Tournament

Junior forward Stephane Lasme had 18 points and 11 rebounds in a 65-56 win over Xavier on Saturday. UMass will face Xavier again in the first round of the A-10 Tournament on Wednesday.

Mass Attack turns focus to postseason

The Massachusetts hockey team (13-19-2, 10-15-2 Hockey East) closed out their regular season this weekend with a tie and a loss against Maine (24-10-2, 17-8-2 HEA) in Orono.

On Friday night at Alfond Arena, the Minutemen were able to come from behind to tie the score at 2-2 and force overtime where neither team could tally the game-winner. The Black Bears came out the next night firing on all cylinders to drop UMass by a score of 5-3.

The Minutemen will be traveling to Boston this weekend for their matchup with the Boston University Terriers in the opening round of the conference playoffs. The best-of-three series will be held at Agganis Arena on Friday, Saturday and Sunday night.

The Black Bears held a 2-1 advantage through two and a half periods before the Minutemen stormed back with just under three minutes to play in regulation on Friday night. Junior Chris Capraro notched his second score of the night on a power play to tie the score and eventually send the game into overtime.

At 16:01 of the third period, Maine's Michel Leveille was sent to the box for goaltender interference and that set the stage for Capraro to even the score. The play began with junior Mark Matheson controlling the puck at the blueline for UMass. He then slid it to the point for senior Marvin Degon, who threaded the puck through traffic to Capraro at the low circle. Black Bear goalie Ben Bishop wasn't able to stop the try.

In the extra period, neither team could get the puck in the net and the game ended in the 2-2 tie. Both Bishop and UMass freshman Jon Quick led their teams to a scoreless first period. To begin the game, shots were 10-8 in favor of the Black Bears.

The early tie was broken when Brett Tyler slipped the puck past Quick to put the Black Bears on top, 1-0. Rob Bellamy found Tyler with a centering pass and he put the puck in the net.

Just two minutes later Capraro brought the game back to a tie with his first goal of the night. With traffic in front of the net, Mike Kostka controlled the puck behind the Maine goal and shoved it out front. Capraro then redirected it into the net past Bishop.

The tie didn't last long as just 28 seconds later Jon Jankus put the Black Bears up for the second time in the night. The senior skated in

Minutemen top Yale

By Jeff Howe

NEW HAVEN, Conn. — After surrendering four straight goals to a raucous Yale team and suffering through a seven-minute scoring drought in which its offense went through a serious funk, the No. 9 Massachusetts (2-0) men's lacrosse team ripped off five straight second-half goals of its own and went on to down the Bulldogs 14-11 at Johnson Field on Saturday.

By escaping with the tough road victory, the Minutemen — who return to action at 1 p.m. on Saturday against Harvard at Garber Field — could potentially rise in the national polls since No. 1 Duke, No. 4 Johns Hopkins and No. 5 Syracuse all went down on Saturday afternoon.

UMass	14
Yale	11

UMass took a 7-5 lead over the Bulldogs early in the third quarter, but Yale scored four unanswered goals in 2:34 to build a 9-7 lead and steal the momentum. Minuteman middie Brett Garber cut the lead in half with a rocket that sailed past Yale goalie George Carafides with a couple minutes remaining in the third, and Jake Deane won the first four face-offs of the fourth quarter, which resulted in four straight goals and a 12-7 advantage for the Minutemen.

"Coach huddled us up and said we needed to get it going," Deane said. "We needed to have that fire, and we decided we weren't going to lose this game. That's what we said to ourselves. We had that look in our eye, and we all went out there, clenched our mouthguards and did what we needed to do."

"It was tough," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "It was like a Rocky fight. It was up and down. We would score a couple goals, and then Yale would score a couple goals to get back up on us. But we just kept getting back up off the mat, and we showed a lot of mental and physical toughness.

I'm proud of the guys and how they handled that adversity."

Cannella, who never undervalues the importance of face-offs, was impressed with the way Deane and the face-off unit performed in crunch time — particularly against Dan Kallaugher, who was the second most successful face-off man in the country last year.

"Jake was great," Cannella said. "We haven't had a face-off performance like that, intensity-wise Kallaugher is one of the best in the country, and Jake proved that he can win some draws, too.

"His physical toughness, mental toughness and grit going after groundballs is outstanding. You can't say enough about that. His wings helped him, and there is no doubt about that. But Jake is a guy who is relentless, and he is going to come up with the ball if he has a shot at it."

Deane was just one of many UMass midfielders who shined on Saturday, as Pat Larmon led the offense with three goals while Garber, Jamie Yaman and Andrew Recchione all chipped in with two. The middies combined to score 11 of 1 Mass's 14 afternoon goals.

"Collectively, I think we're doing really well," Larmon said. "I think the best thing is we play as a team on offense. Everyone knows their role, and everyone works hard. Every midfielder is doing their job. All of the attack is doing their job, and as a result, you get goals from everybody. You see a spread of points across the board."

All-American attackman Sean Morris added a goal and four assists, and though he was limited offensively in the first half, he was instrumental during the second-half charge, picking up three assists — all on goals by midfielders — and a goal after the Minutemen fell behind 9-7.

"We've got some good middies," Morris said. "If they are going to focus on me, that's fine. If I don't have a single point in a game, that's fine because other guys will step up. I think that showed today. It was a great team effort, and hopefully we can continue to do that."

"He's got the limelight on him, but he uses that to get everyone else open," Larmon said of Morris. "He does a great job of being a leader and taking what comes to him. He uses the double-team as an advantage to get us goals. He is such a great player, a great leader, and he does the best job by helping everybody else out."

Junior midfielder Pat Larmon scored three goals in a 14-11 win at Yale on Saturday. Larmon has four goals in two games this season. The Minutemen's next game is Saturday at home against Harvard.

Duquesne ends UM's season

By Danny Picard

PHILADELPHIA — The season came to an end much earlier than expected for the Massachusetts women's basketball team on Friday in Philadelphia. UMass, the No. 7 seed, was eliminated in the first round of the Atlantic 10 Tournament by dropping a heartbreaker to No. 10 seed Duquesne by a score of 56-51.

The Minutewomen had to play catch-up in the second half, and cut a seven-point deficit down to two points when sophomore Pam Rosanio hit two free throws with 2:08 remaining in regulation. The momentum seemed to be in UMass's favor down the stretch, until a shot-clock violation on Duquesne was overturned with 1:40 left in the game.

A number of missed opportunities and a very controversial call by the officials were the stories of the night, as Duquesne was able to put the game on ice with a pair of late free throws with nine seconds remaining in the contest, sending the Minutewomen home in the opening round of the A-10 Tournament.

UMass was playing strong defense when Duquesne lost the ball and sophomore Alisha Tatham made a great hustle play to save it from going out of bounds next to the Dukes' bench. As she slapped the ball back in play, the shot clock ran down to zero, and the officials blew the play dead, calling it a shot-clock violation.

Duquesne	56

After the officials gathered at center court for a few minutes, they called both coaches over to the sidelines, informing them that the original call had been overturned. The officials also awarded Duquesne two points for the shot that the Dukes' had ticked off of the clock. The ball went out of bounds. Alisha ran out of bounds and threw it back in. In my opinion, she didn't have possession, but (the officials) said she had possession."

UMass had a few more possessions after the controversial call, but the two extra points given to Duquesne proved to be the deciding factor, forcing the Minutewomen to Senior point guard Katie Nelson's career ended with a 56-51 loss to Duquesne in the first round of the A-10 Tournament on Friday.

Kristi Little threw up and hit after the play was already blown dead.

Anyone who was in attendance could see that this call took a lot out of the Minutewomen, and eventually ended up costing them the ballgame.

One might expect a youth-laden team to start panicking and forcing things that aren't there when they're down an unfavorable margin early, as was the case yesterday.

Not the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team, though.

After falling behind 3-0 early in its home affair against Harvard yesterday afternoon at Garber Field, the Minutewomen responded with a 9-0 run and held on to topple the Crimson, 12-8.

UMass	12

UMass improved to 1-2 on the season, and avoids starting 0-3 for the first time since 2001. They do, however, start the season 1-2 for the third year in a row. Harvard fell to 1-2.

The Minutewomen return to action on Wednesday, when they travel to Hanover, N.H. to take on No. 3/6 Dartmouth.

In a game that was marked entirely by runs, the Minutewomen remained calm after Caroline Simmons scored her sixth goal of the season, unassisted, to give the Crimson a 3-0 lead eight minutes into the contest. In fact, UMass coach Carrie Bolduc didn't even see the need to call a timeout, citing psychological reasons.

"I have a lot of confidence in my girls," Bolduc said. "They've had a few tough games under their belt, so they know how to handle the pressure. They were prepared, and I think they really wanted it."

Kathleen Typadis notched the Minutewomen's first goal at the 20-minute mark, a free position shot, to cut Harvard's lead to 3-1, and from there they took off. Kayt McCormick scored on another free position shot 30 seconds later, and UMass continued to roll all throughout the rest of the second half. They got goals from Meghan Reddy, Kerri Connerty (three goals, one assist), Jeannette

Non-traditional students shoulder extra responsibilities

By Linda Pelney
Collegian Correspondent

Friends of Sarah Matteau of Greenfield have reason to be concerned with the recent cold weather. Matteau, 29, sleeps in her car five mornings a week.

She works 11 p.m. to 7 a.m. at the Northampton Stop & Shop and attends classes at the University of Massachusetts during the day. Matteau has a travel pillow in her car and hangs a blanket in the window if it is sunny. Another pillow that she puts behind her back shields her from the cold door of her car. She wakes herself up for class with a battery powered travel alarm clock.

Driving home after work would cut down the amount of sleep she can squeeze in because she would have return to Amherst a few hours later, says Matteau.

"It's 25 minutes from Greenfield, at least at the speed I drive, which is just a little over the speed limit."

In case she can't make it home, Matteau keeps clothes for three week-day shifts and two day classes in her car.

Matteau says she wants to get out of working in retail and has a desire to be in a more academic setting. However, she has responsibilities so she cannot leave her job to get her degree. Matteau is responsible for making repairs on the house she owns and she is responsible for caring her mother, who lives with her, her two dogs Tucker and Bentley and her two cats Fred and Julie. It's also up to her to pay the mortgage, says Matteau.

According to the U.S. Department of Education, adult students are the fastest growing group to continue their education after high school. Adult students are often referred to as "non-traditional" students despite this growing trend.

The website of The Association for Non-Traditional Students in Higher Education defines a non-traditional student as:

UMass alumnus gives grant for professorship

By Peter J. LaPrade
Collegian Correspondent

A prominent alumnus recently gave a $1 million gift to help create an endowed professorship in the measurement science field at the University of Massachusetts.

The gift, which was given by Jerome M. Paros, from the class of 1960, will be combined with $1 million of available state and university matching funds. With support of the UMass President's Office, the Jerome M. Paros Professorship of Measurement Sciences will be created.

The new professorship will be based in either the College of Engineering or the College of Natural Sciences and Mathematics, according to a press release. The new position would focus on the development and application of networks used to monitor a variety of environmental conditions, including ice-cap melting and tsunamis, and to make precise geological measurements of these conditions.

Paros, who earned a Bachelor of Sciences degree in Physics at UMass, founded a company called Paroscientific. According to the company website, Paroscientific uses quartz crystal resonator technology called Digiquartz, which Paros developed, to manufacture sensors that detect pressure, acceleration, temperature, weight and other parameters.

Paros said that he hopes his gift will "improve the measurements of geophysical phenomena and enhance our

Supreme Court rules in favor of recruiters

By Gina Holland
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court ruled unanimously Monday that the government can force colleges to open their campuses to military recruiters despite university objections to the Pentagon's "don't ask, don't tell" policy on gays.

Justices rejected a free-speech challenge from law schools and professors who claimed they should not have to associate with military recruiters or promote their campus appearances.

The decision was a setback for universities that had become the latest battleground over the military policy allowing gay men and women to serve only if they keep their sexual orientation to themselves.

The ruling does not, however, answer broader questions about the policy itself. Challenges are pending in courts in Boston and Los Angeles that could eventually reach the high court.

Justices seemed swayed by the Bush administration's arguments that after the terrorist attacks, and during the war in Iraq, the government had a responsibility to bolster its recruitment.

Chief Justice John Roberts said that campus visits are an effective recruiting tool. And, he said, "a military recruiter's mere presence on campus does not violate a law school's right to associate, regardless of how repugnant the law school considers the recruiter's message."

The 8-0 decision upheld a federal law that says universities must give the military the same access as other recruiters or forfeit federal money.

Justices ruled even more broadly, saying that Congress could directly demand military access on campus without linking the requirement to federal money.

"When you're in the middle of war, even if it's not a terribly popular one, courts are hesitant to tie the hands of the military," said Jon Davidson, legal director of gay rights group Lambda Legal.

Jay Sekulow, chief counsel for the American Center for Law and Justice, called the decision "an important victory for the military and ultimately for our national security."

The military's policy had put college leaders in a thorny situation because of campus rules that forbid participation of recruiters representing agencies or private companies that have discriminatory policies.

The Supreme Court recently ruled that recruiters are now allowed on all college campuses. Some UMass students, like those in the Army ROTC program pictured above, have already been recruited.

Most college leaders have said they could not afford to lose federal help, some $35 billion a year.

Roberts, writing his third decision since joining the court last fall, said there are other less drastic options for protesting the policy. "Students and faculty are free to associate to voice their disapproval of the military's message," he wrote.

Joshua Rosenkranz, the attorney for the challengers of the law, said that the case called attention to the military policy. "A silver lining to the Supreme Court's opinion is the court made it clear," he said, "law schools are free to organize protests."

Geoffrey Shields, dean of Vermont Law School, said the school since 1999 has given up some federal money and will continue to bar recruiters "as a symbol of the importance of fair treatment of all people."

Colleges recruit lower-income student body

By Justin Pope
Associated Press

The signs are everywhere, from the BMWs parked on campus, to the students' designer cell phones, to the number of families paying full price even as tuition and fees climb past $40,000. The most prestigious colleges are overwhelmingly attended by the wealthy.

It's a problem colleges are speaking about more frankly and have tried to address with more financial aid, but with only mixed success. At the most selective schools, a 2003 study found, just three percent of students came from the poorest socio-economic quarter of families, while 74 percent came from the richest.

Now, a small group of selective colleges is turning its attention to what may be an untapped reservoir of able, low-income students: the 6.5 million people who attend community colleges. Historically, those students have been ignored by elite colleges, which recruit mostly at high schools and often accept few or no transfers because they want to offer a distinctive four-year experience.

Five well-known private colleges and three highly selective public schools — the flagship campuses of the universities of Michigan, California and North Carolina — were to announce

Families of 9/11 victims watch conspirator's trial

By Denise Lavoie
Associated Press

BOSTON — Christie Coombs didn't want to pass up the chance to view the death penalty trial of Zacarias Moussaoui, the al-Qaida operative she considers as much her husband's murderer as those who commandeered two planes and flew them into the World Trade Center.

But for Susan Retik, who also lost her husband, it was too painful a reminder of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks and she couldn't bear to watch on closed-circuit television the proceedings taking place in a Virginia courtroom.

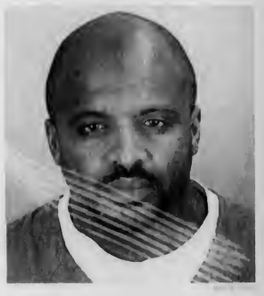
More than four years after the attacks took place, a federal jury began to hear testimony Monday on whether Moussaoui, 37, a French citizen, should be put to death for conspiring with al-Qaida to hijack planes and commit other crimes.

He has denied any connection to Sept. 11, but says he was training for a possible future attack when he was arrested a month earlier.

Moussaoui pleaded guilty to the charges in April, and Boston was one of several locations where victims' families were allowed to watch the trial on closed-circuit television at federal courthouses. Other locations include Central Islip, N.Y., Newark, N.J., Philadelphia and in Alexandria, Va.

Coombs' husband, Jeff, the father of her three children, was a passenger on American Airlines Flight 11 when it slammed into the World Trade Center in New York. For her, seeing Moussaoui on trial is the closest she'll get to seeing those responsible for her husband's death on trial.

"Zacarias Moussaoui could have prevented Sept. 11th. He is as much a murderer as the hijacker that actually flew the plane into the building," Coombs said just before entering the courtroom, where the trial was being shown on three large TV screens.



Coombs, who lives in Abington, said she is hoping the trial will reveal new information about the hijackers and the attacks that could provide some answers for families.

"It's not a matter of whether or not I'm for the death penalty, or whether I think he should get life in prison," said Coombs. "It's more a matter of information-finding and knowing that justice is served," she said.

Only relatives were allowed to watch the trial in the closed-circuit locations. About 60 people received the required credentials to watch the trial in Boston. According to an Associated Press database, 93 of the Sept. 11 victims were residents of Massachusetts and 197 had Massachusetts ties.

The media was not allowed inside the courtrooms.

Carie Lemack, 30, of Framingham, said she came to the courtroom in Boston to represent her mother, Judy Larocque, 50, who was also a passenger on American Flight 11.

Zacarias Moussaoui is accused of conspiring with al-Qaida about the 9-11 attacks.

Measurement sciences to gain new professor ability to understand complex earth and ocean processes that affect our environment."

Michael Malone, Dean of the College of Engineering, said one of the practical uses of measurement sciences is designing equipment to detect tsunamis while they are still at sea. This would to give more time for authorities to make the necessary evacuations and contingency measures before the tsunamis hit land.

The equipment would be need to be strong enough to function in deep water, under high pressure, yet would also have to be sensitive enough to detect any small change on its surface. This design challenge is the reason measurement sciences are so important, according to Malone.

"This new professorship will greatly enhance programs in the two colleges…advances in sensors and their integration into networks for the monitoring of large-scale natural phenomena are dramatic and evolving. These advances are nationally recognized, and we are well-positioned at UMass Amherst to take advantage of this growth area," said Malone.

"Some of the most exciting areas of research in the geosciences department of this college involve high-level sensing, monitoring, and subsequent analysis of environmental parameters. The Paros professorship will allow us to expand our activities in environmental monitoring and develop new interdisciplinary activities in emerging areas of measurement sciences," said George Langford, Dean of the College of Natural Science and Mathematics.

The new faculty member would be chosen by the dean of the College of Engineering and the dean of the College of Natural Sciences and Mathematics. Provost Charlena Seymor will also be a consultant in the selection of the new professor, who will also have to be approved by the UMass Board of Trustees.

It is unclear at this time whether courses from the new faculty member would be taught on the graduate or undergraduate level.

Adults returning to school deal with outside pressures

In 2004 at UMass, seven percent of the 18,726 undergraduate students were over age 25.

Jon Engstrom, 28, of Greenfield returned to school because he was recruited for a job in criminal justice and he needed a bachelor's degree. He went to Greenfield Community College (GCC) where he earned a degree in business, then transferred to UMass to pursue his bachelor's. He has been working full-time at Friendly's since he was 16.

Engstrom finds traditional undergraduates far more advanced technologically but not in maturity level. "They have no concept of bills, jobs, [or] life in general. They are more idealistic, we are more cynical. They don't realize life isn't fair," he said.

"Non-traditional students come to class more often. We are here everyday," he said, pointing at Matteau. Despite the numerous challenges and responsibilities they experience everyday, both Engstrom and Matteau go to class. As older students, they feel they are continuing their education for different reasons than the traditional students. College life and partying are still important to many traditional students. "They come to school hung over," says Engstrom.

Mixing with the traditional students is not for everyone, but there are other options for older people pursuing a bachelor's degree at UMass. For example, the University Without Walls (UWW) program is specifically designed for the non-traditional student.

Bob Coven, 67, has owned a travel agency in Amherst for 15 years. His first attempt at college was in the 70's but he never finished. He heard about UWW from a friend and "decided to check it out. I felt I had unfinished business [and] I wanted to finish it up." After attending an orientation session he decided that "this was exactly what I needed." He graduated from UWW in 2002.

According to the website, Back to College, www.back2college.com, "the Association for Nontraditional Students in Higher Education (ANTSHE) reports that students who are over 25 make up 47 percent of the new and returning student population on many of today's college campuses."

When she can get home, Matteau says, "Sometimes I don't bother sleeping. If I have the night off [from work] I don't sleep all day and I go to bed around 7 and get up around 4 a.m. when the house is quiet, [it]s the best time [to do homework]. My social life is completely on hold the months I'm in school. Luckily my friends understand."

The warmer than normal temperatures this winter has been a lucky break for Matteau. However, with colder temperatures finally here she may need to find a warmer place to

Al-Qaida operative on trial for murder

"Today is important because it's the first time someone is going to be held responsible for her murder and for the murders of 2,972 others," she said.

After listening to opening statements in the trial, Lemack said she was frustrated by the government's argument that the attacks of Sept. 11 could have been prevented if Moussaoui had not lied to investigators.

"What really scares me the most is the government is saying they need terrorists to tell the truth and to not lie in order to stop terrorist plots," Lemack said. "I guess I'm hoping for more from my government…My Mom counted on it and she didn't get it."

Stephanie Holland-Brodney, of Wayland, whose mother, Cora Holland, sat two rows away from Lemack's mother on American Flight 11, said that listening to the opening statements "fuels my anger" over the government's failure to stop the attacks.

"Our government was so pompous that this couldn't happen. They didn't think outside the box," she said.

"My son is 7, and he's so focused on the bad guy and getting him. Honestly, I don't know if they got the right bad guy or not," she said.

Retik said she decided to stay away from the trial because it would be too painful for her.

"For me, learning every detail about what happened does not help me," said Retik, whose husband, David, was also on American Flight 11.

Retik, 38, of Needham, who was 7 1/2 months pregnant with the couple's third child when her husband was killed, said her opposition to the death penalty also influenced her decision to stay away.

"I know without a shadow of a doubt that I want nothing to do with another person murdered," said Retik. "To me, that does not solve any problem."

The trial, which started Monday in Alexandria, is expected to last one to three months.

Low-income student sought after plans Monday to accommodate a total of about 1,100 more community college transfer students from low- to moderate-income families over the next four years. The Jack Kent Cooke Foundation will contribute about $7 million for support programs, while the colleges will spend more than $20 million of their own money on support programs and financial aid.

The private colleges participating are Amherst, Mount Holyoke, Bucknell, Cornell and the University of Southern California.

Though the numbers amount to a relative handful — with UC Berkeley taking by far the most transfers — the hope is that the variety and prestige of the schools involved will persuade others to take a chance on students who have started at two-year schools for financial or family reasons.

"There's a lot of focus at Harvard and lots of other places on the fact that there are no low-income students at those schools, or very few," said Joshua Wyner, the Cooke Foundation's vice president for programs. "The place where a lot of them are that nobody seems to be looking is community colleges."

A 2005 Department of Education study found more than one-third of 12th graders in 1992 who went first to community college and earned more than 10 credits eventually transferred to a four-year college. But few go to the most selective schools. On those campuses, typically only about one in 1,000 students transferred from a two-year school, Wyner said.

Some of the participating colleges, like Cal and Mount Holyoke, already have close ties with "feeder" community colleges and will expand existing programs. Mount Holyoke, a women's college in Massachusetts, will provide a full-time academic counselor inside nearby Holyoke Community College to identify transfer candidates and help them prepare. It hopes to add about 10 slots per year.

Cal, which already has a wide pipeline from the state's community colleges, will add about 480 slots, and aims to provide preparatory services to 1,400 candidates.

Other participating schools have not previously had strong community college ties. UNC-Chapel Hill typically takes 650 transfer students annually, but only about one-quarter come from community colleges. The university will work closely with three nearby schools, and hopes to enroll about 25 from each community college per year.

Stephen Farmer, UNC's assistant provost and director of undergraduate admissions, believes most community college students in North Carolina would need help to thrive at Chapel Hill. But with assistance, he says, they can succeed.

"This is not charity on the part of Carolina," Farmer said.

At private Bucknell, vice president for enrollment management Kurt Thiede says his college faces growing competition from honors programs at state universities. It needs high-achieving community college students to maintain quality without cutting enrollment. Typically, only a handful of Bucknell's 30 or so transfers per year come from community colleges, but it aims to increase that number to 15.

"I think the last time campuses really enriched themselves was the GI bill, when people came back from the war," Thiede said. With changing demographics and rising college prices, "this is a way that places like Bucknell can keep their current status in terms of quality but also enrich their campuses in a way that frankly hasn't happened in 30 or 40 years."

UMass basketball player arrested for disorderly conduct

Friday March 3

After receiving reports for17 hang-up phone calls, police investigated Bueno Y Sano, the origin of the calls. An employee named Victor Ortiz was apparently unaware he was making the calls.

William Rutherford Boysen, 20, of 9 Cornelia Dr., Greenwich, Conn., was arrested on charges of being a minor in possession of alcohol and for unlawful possession of a keg. The arrest was made while a plain-clothed officer was investigating a non-permit beer keg delivery to 29 East Dr.

Saturday March 4

Daniel Luigi Iannetta, 20, of 33 Hobbs Brooke Rd., Waltham, was arrested at Rafters on University Dr. at 12:58 a.m. Iannetta was pulled over for failing to stop/yield and for speeding and was ticketed. Upon inspection of the 1992 blue Jeep Cherokee, Iannetta was then arrested for a minor in possession of alcohol and possession of a class D substance. Amherst Towing then towed the vehicle.

Andrew J. Mackay, 21, of 14 Waushkaum Ave., Ashland was arrested at 1:03 a.m. for having an open container of alcohol while driving. Police witnessed Mackay at 406 North Pleasant St. with an open Bud Light and promptly made the arrest.

Joe Malo Tautalatasi, 23, of 11 James St. Second floor Holyoke and Neanh Kry, 23, of 122 Gilbert Ave, Springfield were arrested for disorderly conduct and assault and battery. Police responded to Barsies of 43 North Pleasant St. at 1:10 a.m. to the disturbance call. Jessica Yazhari, 22, told police a bottle was thrown at her and her friends as they attempted to leave. Glass fragments struck both Yazhari and her boyfriend, Nicholas Publicover, 23. The couple was then allegedly attacked by approximately 10 Asian and Puerto Rican males.

Alcohol led to a motor vehicle crash at 277 East Pleasant St. at 2:33 a.m. Upon police's arrival, the driver, Patricia Nugent, 21, of 10 Kenwood Dr. in Lynn, was being extracted from the vehicle and into the ambulance. Nugent was vomiting and a strong odor of alcohol emanated from the green 1994 Saturn SC2. There were no reported injuries to the passenger. Beer was found inside the car and Nugent was arrested for liquor violations as Amherst Towing towed the vehicle.

Police arrested Allison Courtney, 20, of 78 Hastings St. Greenfield at 3:26 a.m. after she struck another vehicle driving in the opposite lane and then fled the scene. Police charged Courtney on Fearing St., where they caught up with her, for operating under the influence for the second time, and for leaving the scene of property damage.

Five males were arrested at 111 Fearing St. at 11:41 p.m. for liquor law violations. Joseph P. Sances, 20, of 142 Union Park St. Monponsett, Adam Reynolds, 20, of 13 Bell Dr. Whitman, Shawn Joseph Whitlock, 20, of 270 School St. in Whitman, and Andrew Thomas, 20, of 40 Holmes Terrace in Whitman, were arrested as minors in possession of alcohol and for having an open container of alcohol while driving. Matthew Veazie, 21, of 548 State St. apartment 1 in Hanson, was charged for having an open container of alcohol while driving.

Sunday March 5

A UMass basketball player was arrested at Judie's Restaurant at 51 North Pleasant St. at 1:21 a.m. for disorderly conduct and resisting arrest. Stephane Yann Lasme, 23, of 30 Neoponset Ave. in Boston, was reportedly yelling and cursing within a bar crowd of 50 people. Lasme was upset because he had allegedly been slapped in the face. Police advised Lasme to calm down and leave, but he continued to push people and cause a disturbance. Police escorted him into an alley where he harassed two unknown women and was subsequently placed under arrest.

An employee of D.B. Mart on Triangle St. called police after a male allegedly verbally threatened him upon denial of permission to use the restroom. The person was described as an African American male wearing a gray hooded sweatshirt.

Police responded to Hillel House at 388 North Pleasant St. at 4:18 p.m. on a report of vandalism. At about 3 a.m. the previous night, someone threw a brick and broke the library's double-paned window. Numerous beer bottles were found smashed outside the building and several windows had BB pellet holes in them. Extra patrols were called in to monitor the house overnight.

Bulger brother loses pension for lying to jury

By Ken Maguire
Associated Press

BOSTON — The state's highest court ruled on Monday that a brother of fugitive mobster James "Whitey" Bulger must forfeit his $65,000-a-year state pension because he lied to grand juries investigating the gangster's disappearance.

Lawyers for John "Jackie" Bulger, a retired court clerk magistrate, had argued that his crimes — essentially lying when he said he hadn't heard from his brother since he'd fled shortly before his indictment in 1995 — were based on family loyalty and didn't affect his job.

However, the Supreme Judicial Court ruled that he had an "unwavering obligation to tell the truth" to grand juries investigating his brother's disappearance.

"At the heart of a clerk-magistrate's role is the unwavering obligation to tell the truth, to ensure that others do the same through the giving of oaths to complainants, and to promote the administration of justice," the SJC said in its ruling.

John Bulger, 67, may now be forced to pay back $243,000 of the more than $300,000 in pension money he's received since retiring in 2001.

He had pleaded guilty to perjury and obstruction of justice

Romney stands firm on gay adoption issue

By Steve LeBlanc
Associated Press

BOSTON — Gov. Mitt Romney said Monday he's trying to find a way to exempt Catholic social services agencies from a law requiring them to consider gays as adoptive parents.

Romney said he doesn't have the power to unilaterally exempt Catholic Charities from the state's anti-discrimination laws. But he said he wants to let Catholic agencies continue placing children with adoptive parents without violating the teachings of their faith.

"The church through its Catholic Charities provides an extraordinary service to the Commonwealth by placing many special needs children every year in homes," Romney told reporters. "That's a service I hope we will continue to be able to avail ourselves of."

Romney did not elaborate on what options he is exploring. Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey, who is seeking the Republican nomination for governor, broke with Romney last week, saying she's opposed to exempting the church from the anti-discrimination laws.

In the past two decades, 13 of the 720 children placed with adoptive families by Catholic Charities have been placed in same-sex households.

The state's four Catholic bishops have said the state law threatens the church's religious freedom by forcing it to do something it considers immoral.

Seven members of Catholic Charities board stepped down last Wednesday in protest of the bishops' stance. An eighth board member resigned on Thursday. The 42-member board had voted unanimously in December to continue considering gay households for adoptions.

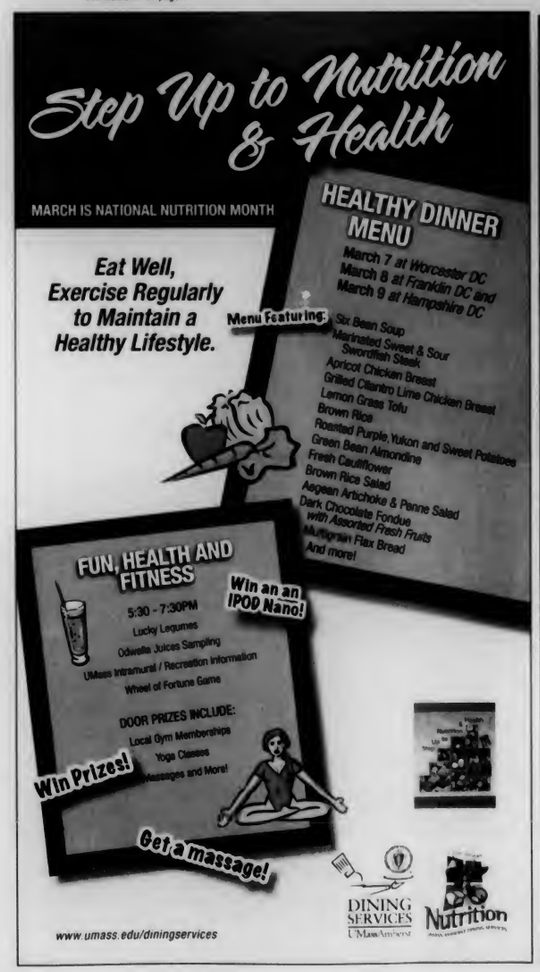
Romney met in his office Wednesday with church leaders, including Boston Archbishop Sean O'Malley, and said religious institutions should be able to help people without violating their faith.

"Ultimately, legislation may need to be filed to provide an exemption based on religious principles," Romney said in a statement released after the meeting.

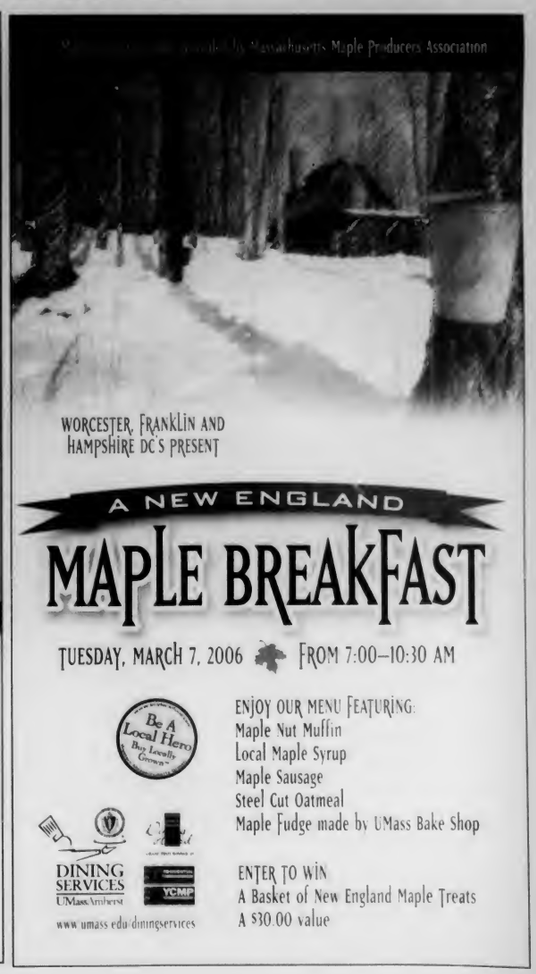
Any legislation seeking to grant the Catholic church an exemption could face a tough time on Beacon Hill.

House Speaker Salvatore DiMasi said he supports the state's anti-discrimination law, including the part allowing gay parents to adopt.

"The state's top priority should be placing children in loving and caring homes, regardless of adoptive parents race, ethnicity and sexual orientation," DiMasi said last week. "Denying same-sex couples the right to be considered is discriminatory and runs counter to the principle that all citizens are created equal under the law."



Arline Isaacson, co-chair of the Massachusetts Gay and Lesbian Political Caucus, said she is baffled why the issue is coming up now.



"We fought this battle from 1985 to 1991 and the courts settled the question in the early 1990s," she said. "If the Catholic Church had a problem with gay adoptions, the question was resolved over a decade ago. It makes no sense that they are raising it now."

Geri Denterlein, one of the Catholic Charities board members who resigned, said she had no inside knowledge why the bishops asked for the exemption now.

Governor Mitt Romney says Catholic adoption agencies should not have to consider gays as possible parents.

Lies cost Bulger his pension

in 2003 for lying to two federal grand juries. He admitted that he lied when he testified he had not heard from his brother since he fled in 1995.

John Bulger also admitting lying to a grand jury in 1996 when he said had no knowledge about a safe deposit box owned by his older brother.

The state retirement board halted John Bulger's pension payments after his conviction. A Boston Municipal Court judge later reinstated his pension, and state Treasurer Tim Cahill appealed to the SJC.

"This case was never about the last name of the person involved, but rather insuring that everyone plays by the same rules," Cahill said in a statement.

It's not the only Bulger pension dispute.

The state is appealing a Superior Court's November ruling that gave another brother, former University of Massachusetts President William Bulger, $29,000 more than what he was awarded by the state's pension system. William Bulger's annual pension is now $208,000.

Whitey Bulger, 76, the oldest of the brothers, is wanted in connection with 21 murders and is on the FBI's "Ten Most Wanted" list. He ran the Winter Hill Gang and was an FBI informant who ratted out his competitors in the Italian Mafia in the 1970s and 80s.

Whitey Bulger disappeared in late December 1994 after being tipped by his former FBI handler, John J. Connolly Jr., that he was about to be indicted for racketeering. Connolly is now serving a 10-year prison sentence for racketeering and obstruction of justice.

Paul T. Hynes, attorney for John Bulger, did not immediately return a call to comment. A phone listing in South Boston for Bulger was temporarily disconnected Monday.

John Bulger's monthly pension was $5,326. Since his retirement from Boston Juvenile Court in late April 2001, he has received more than $312,500.

Excluding the $69,500 Bulger contributed to the retirement system through payroll deductions during his nearly 33 years as a state employee, that leaves $243,000 that the state could seek to recover, according to Neil Morrison, Cahill's chief of staff.

"That's a decision of the state retirement board," Morrison said.

The clerk magistrate's duties include managing the affairs of the court, administering oaths to witnesses before testimony, and sometimes holding show-cause hearings on criminal complaints.

Sheehan arrested at anti-war demonstration

NEW YORK (AP) — Cindy Sheehan, who drew international attention when she camped outside President Bush's ranch to protest the Iraq war, was arrested Monday along with three other women during a demonstration demanding the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq.

The march to the U.S. Mission to the United Nations by about a dozen U.S. and Iraqi anti-war activists followed a news conference at U.N. headquarters, where Iraqi women described daily killings and ambulance bombings as part of the escalating violence that keeps women in their homes.

Women Say No to War, which helped organize the news conference and march, said Sheehan and three other women were arrested while trying to deliver a petition to the U.S. Mission to the United Nations with more than 60,000 signatures urging the "withdrawal all troops and all foreign fighters from Iraq." Police said they were arrested for criminal trespassing and resisting arrest.

Richard Grenell, the spokesman for the U.S. Mission, said in response to Sheehan's arrest: "We invited her in to discuss her concerns with a U.S. Mission employee. She chose not to come in but to lay down in front of the building and block the entrance. It was clearly designed to be a media stunt, not aimed at rational discussion," Grenell said.

At the news conference, Sheehan said when her 24-year-old son — a U.S. soldier killed in Iraq — died in April 2004, "the morgues were filled with innocent men, women and children."

Entessa Mohammed, a pharmacist who works at a hospital in Baghdad, became tearful when recalling the deaths and injuries she said she has witnessed daily.

She estimated that 1,600 Iraqis are killed in Baghdad every month, with a greater number injured. "Thanks for the liberation from Saddam" Hussein, Mohammed said, addressing the Bush administration, "now please go out."

President Bush seeks line-item vetoing power

By Andrew Taylor
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Seeking new power to weed hometown projects from legislation passed by Congress, President Bush on Monday asked lawmakers to give him a modified version of the line-item veto struck down by the Supreme Court eight years ago.

Like presidents dating back to Ulysses S. Grant, Bush wants the power to strike individual items from a bill without having to veto the entire measure.

President Clinton got that wish in 1996, when the new Republican majority in the House pushed through a line-item veto law that allowed him to kill individual spending projects and special-interest tax breaks.

Two years later, the Supreme Court declared the law — one of the key planks of the House GOP's "Contract With America" — unconstitutional because it allowed the president to amend laws passed by Congress.

Bush is now pressing for a modified, weaker version. Instead of being able to strike items from bills, he would send one or more items back to Congress for an up-or-down vote. Present law permits Congress to ignore these proposed rescissions, but under the Bush proposal lawmakers would have to vote on them. If majorities in both the House and the Senate agreed with the president, the cuts would take effect.

"Forty-three governors have this line-item veto in their states," Bush said. "Now it's time to bring this important tool of fiscal discipline to Washington, D.C."

Bush has not vetoed any legislation during five years in office, but he said the modified line-item proposal would help "reduce wasteful spending, reduce the deficit and ensure that taxpayer dollars are spent wisely."

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., issued statements supporting Bush, as did several conservative lawmakers.

Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., who promoted a similar approach in his presidential campaign against Bush in 2004, immediately jumped on board.

"It's no secret that President Bush and I don't agree on much, but I fully support giving him the line-item veto," Kerry said. "I'm going to introduce this legislation, Congress should immediately pass it, and I want to see President Bush use this veto pen to get tough on wasteful spending."

"Giving the president line-item veto authority is essential to enforcing the budget and restoring fiscal sanity in Washington," said Rep. Jeb Hensarling, R-Texas.

The proposal may be helped along by the drive on Capitol Hill for so-called "earmark reform."

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada said he was opposed to the idea even though he supported a similar plan in 1995 when offered as a weaker alternative to the GOP version.

The earlier version of the line-item veto was used by Clinton in 1997 against about 80 parochial projects and a handful of special-interest tax breaks. Lawmakers' enthusiasm for the earlier veto power waned sharply, leading lawmakers like Sen. Robert Bennett, R-Utah, to change their minds and oppose the idea.

Congress, by a huge margin, overturned Clinton's vetoes of 38 military construction projects.

Bush's version was actually pushed by Democrats in the 1990s — including Sen. Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia, who filed suit against the 1996 law.

Still, a proposal similar to Bush's veto plan was actually voted down by the House two years ago on a 237-174 vote, with three out of four Democrats voting "nay." Some 89 Republicans, including then-Majority Leader Tom DeLay of Texas and Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier, R-Calif., also opposed the measure.

President George Bush has asked lawmakers to grant him the power to strike individual items from a proposed bill without vetoing it.

Hamas parliament leaders strip Palestinian president of power

By Ibrahim Barzak
Associated Press

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip — Hamas headed into a full-blown confrontation with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas on Monday, voting to strip him of powers he was hastily awarded by his Fatah Party in the last session of the outgoing parliament.

In Gaza City, an Israeli missile strike killed two Islamic Jihad militants and three bystanders, including two young boys.

The Hamas-Fatah conflict has been simmering since Hamas swept Fatah out of office in January parliamentary elections, ending four decades of unchallenged rule by the party of the late Yasser Arafat.

Hamas has 74 seats in the new parliament and Fatah just 45, and the first order of business for Hamas was to cancel the powers the outgoing parliament gave to Abbas, the Fatah leader, authorizing him to cancel laws passed by the new parliament and appointing Fatah officials to key positions.

In the West Bank administrative capital of Ramallah, Fatah delegates walked out, accusing Hamas of twisting the rules to weaken Abbas' authority.

About 15 Fatah gunmen marched on parliament in Gaza City, firing into the air. The gunmen eventually headed to a Fatah meeting, where they demanded their party stay out of the government Hamas is setting up and threatened to kill any Fatah official who joined.

With its absolute majority, Hamas can set up a government by itself, but Hamas leaders prefer to bring in other parties, partly to deflect international criticism and threatened economic sanctions because of Hamas' record of violence and refusal to recognize Israel.

Israel, which considers Hamas a terror group, refuses to allow its members of parliament to travel from Gaza to the West Bank, so the two buildings were linked by teleconferencing equipment to allow the session to take place.

Hamas easily passed legislation to rescind Abbas' new powers, but some experts said Abbas has the authority to cancel Monday's resolution, perpetuating the standoff.

In a statement, Fatah complained the Hamas action "undermines the basis of dialogue and partnership in any institution with Hamas." A Fatah legislator said Monday's decisions would be appealed to the Palestinian Supreme Court.

Hamas lawmaker Mushir Masri ridiculed the Fatah reaction. "It is obvious that some people until now have not understood the rules of the democratic game," he said.

Abbas was elected president of the Palestinian Authority in January 2005, and his term has three years to run, regardless of the makeup of parliament.

Though Abbas is seen as a moderate and remains in power, Israel has reacted to the Hamas victory by cutting off transfer of vital tax money to the Palestinian Authority, charging that it is now controlled by terrorists.

As the parliament was wrapping up its session, the Israeli air force targeted an ice cream truck in Gaza City, killing two Islamic Jihad militants and three bystanders, two of them children, the military and Palestinian officials said.

Seven people were wounded, doctors said.

A spokesman for the group who gave his name as Abu Dajana vowed retaliation.

"God willing we are going to get revenge for the honorable bloodshed today," he told reporters outside a morgue at the Shifa hospital in Gaza, where angry Palestinians chanted, "Death to Israel."

Abbas appealed for international intervention to stop Israeli attacks. "These aggressive actions threaten the exerted efforts to maintain the truce," he said in a statement. "Achieving security would come only through negotiations, not unilateral action and aggression."

The "unilateral action" reference came as Israeli security officials outlined plans for Israel to cut itself off further from the Gaza Strip, after the summer withdrawal of soldiers and settlers.

The officials said Israel should gradually reduce and then ban Palestinian workers from Gaza entering Israel, cut off power, fuel and water supplies and allow the Palestinians to open a seaport and airport, eliminating Gaza imports and exports through Israel.

The officials, speaking on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to give details to the media, said security chiefs would present their plan after Israel's March 28 election.

The recommendations came a day after a key ally of acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said if his Kadima party wins the election, it will take further unilateral steps in the West Bank, including moving settlers from isolated points to settlement blocs.

RIP Cookie Monster

I've recently received some terrible news. News that is more important than UMass tuition increases, secret FBI agents on campus, and even that Noriega thing. It's a breaking story on the street, the Sesame Street.

It seems the producers of the show have decided to suck the soul out of the beloved Cookie Monster. In consideration of the increase in child obesity rates, the powers that be have decided that the Cookie Monster is sending a bad image to kids. The great Sesame Street character was revamped for this season, where he is taught that a cookie, or rather a whole stack of cookies, is not a thing that you can shove down your throat in an outrageously hilarious fashion. A reliable and attractive source confirms, now and forever, the Cookie Monster is being taught that a cookie is a "sometimes food."

Tucker Merrick

It gets worse. The song: "C is for Cookie, that's good enough for me" is no more. Now there's the song: "A cookie is a sometimes food." Yes, they took away the song. (Now I'd like to write that last sentence with swears and italics and exclamation points, but then I'd have to edit it out for the paper, so to compensate, please reread it in a morbid, phenomenally depressing way).

They took his identity. If they don't compensate by installing some reproductive organs, then essentially he has no reason to live.

The song's gone and the Cookie Monster is learning moderation… Everything is getting turned upside down. Am I in Bizarro World? Next thing that's going to happen is I'm going to get free beer, gain access to any party I want, and be treated like an object.

It just doesn't make any sense. The Cookie monster can't abstain from cookies, because that's his whole reason to exist. He's the "Cookie Monster." a monster who exists specifically to devour cookies and cookie-related objects. If he's not munching on a plate of cookies or at least plates that look like cookies, then he is no longer the monster of that snack variety. He no longer has any reason to be, no telos. He is simply a blue monster with messed up eyes. They took his identity. If they don't compensate by installing some reproductive organs, then essentially he has no reason to live.

Now, I guess I can step outside of my ball of rage and relate to some of the producers in their reasoning of taking away the Cookie Monster's right to existence, maybe shed some light. For one, they are the spawn of Satan. I think this insight from "anonymous" helps in explaining why they haven't put Oscar on welfare and why Bert and Ernie's relationship has to be left so ambiguous and strangled.

Also, I guess they really believe that the blue Muppet really has an influence on kids. Hey, maybe they're right. I remember that time that I had to go to the hospital after OD'ing on Double-Stuff Oreos, or that time that I tried to eat the moon because it looked like a cookie… talk about a lack of oxygen.

I guess they also really believe that if the Cookie Monster does really influence kids, then if they have him eating vegetables, kids will think that they are good to eat too. Here's how I refute that. First and foremost, vegetables are gross. Second, they cannot be eaten in an aggressive, Blitzkrieg manner that the "Monster who enjoys to eat cookies and other good stuff too" is accustomed to. You ever try to eat a bunch of celery really fast? Neither have I. But I'm sure that it's hard, and if Little Johnny Impressionable ever tried it, all the peanut butter in the world wouldn't make it better. Vegetables wouldn't be fun ever again.

A big mistake was made Sesame Street, which has always taught us about social understanding, is singling out and oppressing a race of monster, and a sweet one at that. (pun!) Why does cookie monster have to change just because America's youth is turning into one big "Heavy Weights" movie? (Except without the 75 percent chance of hilarity.) Last checkup, the Cookie Monster's metabolism was fine, and his diabetes is under control.

In the end, the producers of Sesame Street overestimate their impact, and forget the importance of the parents' role in raising a kid. How about instead of letting your kids eat sweets and gain weight, dictate their eating habits. I know this is a revolutionary thought, but maybe, just maybe, you could curtail obesity by reinforcing or simply forcing good eating habits on your children.

Or you could do what my parents did and lock your kid in the cellar for three days with only water and a cockroach named Timmy. Either way is fine. But please, don't destroy an innocent Muppet by turning him into a shell of his former self. C is for cookie, and that should be good enough for all of us.

Sympathy for the Devil

I'm going to take a deep breath, put caution to the wind and say something rarely said. Poor Scott Stapp.

If you don't know much about this guy and have only heard bare essentials, it's not clear why he deserves your pity. Most people might know he's the lead singer of Creed, a big selling, hard rock band of the late nineties often labeled a Christian group because of his "inspired" and "faithful" lyrics.

Michael Toomey

If you're a little more informed in the pop culture world, you might know that Stapp was a source of embarrassing controversy for the band's name. But that's not a whole lot to judge him on as a candidate for your empathy and concern. The story that explains the nature of this Scott Stapp fellow is unusual and disturbing to those sensitive to large helpings of cheese, but it's a story we need to hear nonetheless.

The seeds of the infamous Scott Stapp I'm talking about were sown during his years as a depressed youth in a struggle with all the common existential woes we go through. A sensitive, thoughtful young man, Stapp sought refuge from his troubles in his writing, finding both catharsis and clarity through the pen. Maybe under different circumstances, Stapp could have utilized his passion to eventuate a prosperous career as an author or journalist, but his rock n' roll spirit led him on a path far away from the dry world of literature.

After honing his "style" in several local bands, Scott fatefully met a certain Mark Tremonti, a disarmingly handsome guitarist who aspired to Metallica's Hetfield and Hammett. The two hit it off surprisingly well, forming the core of what would become Creed. Stapp and Tremonti wrote much together, composing songs that would end up on Creed's debut album, "My Own Prison."

Greeted by a warm reception from the rock world, Creed had kicked off an auspicious start to their career, getting a lot of airplay on the rock radio, and selling a ton of records for a new band. The "Oh, I think the first album was the best," cliché that can be used deceptively to earn credibility with any music fans, is certainly applicable here, as it truly is in most circumstances.

But at any rate, to the hard rock ear, this album had some well-conceived, heavy stuff on it, most notably the opening track, "Torn." If Creed had dissolved shortly after this album's release, they would have become fabled by the "what-if" factor alone. Idolized by people who transfer their hopes and dreams onto something that might have been, Stapp and company could have been regarded as the would-be saviors of rock. However instead of dying out, Creed picked up steam and decided to take their songwriting to "higher" level.

This is when the situation got a little hairier. "Human Clay" was released, and this is when the band's popularity skyrocketed. This popularity came at a price that alienated the band from the rock fans that listened to Metallica and Alice in Chains, but endeared them to millions more people who would in years to come vote religiously (no pun intended) for American Idol contestants. This is also when all-around public bashing of the band, Stapp particularly, began.

Mind you, I've yet to describe what is actually humorous about the guy. Musically, Stapp has a very obvious limitation, fully realized by the public by his surplus exposure received around when "Human Clay" was exploding. Stapp is only is able to sing in a key that matches up pretty closely to the mating call of the water buffalo. Rock n' roll is full of beloved vocalists who have a decidedly specific range, Mick Jagger, Jim Morrison, David Lee Roth, Vince Neil, to name a few. Unfortunately Stapp combined his bovine grunts with dramatic onstage posturing appearing to most a failed attempt to channel the God of Thunder, which contributed to his appearing a rock caricature to an extent.

Fred Durst from Limp Bizkit publicly expressed his strong disapproval of Stapp's performance stylings, which prompted a response that provided a foreshadowing of the enigma Stapp would become. Stapp was initially diplomatic, claiming he was confused by Durst's animosity, but held no hard feelings. Stapp later issued the red-capped raprocker an official challenge to partake in a boxing match. He even provided a charitable incentive to the fight, but Durst ultimately declined. This unexpected chest beating was the first indication of a change in the Scott Stapp we were getting to know, from a victim to a possible villain.

For the first time and most notable time in modern music, a singer was being tried with the distinct possibility of being held legally responsible for sucking.

Needless to say things only got stranger. Stapp engaged in certain wacky behaviors that greatly inflamed his growing image as a luckless but ludicrous loser. His shirtless drunk driving escapade in 2002 was a doozy of an event, where he appeared to be starting an off-road figure eight before the OC Sheriff's Department cut his endeavor short. Providing the public with another reason to scorn and mock Creed, and a nightmare mugshot, this was not the pinnacle of Stapp's shenanigans.

2002 was a busy year for Stapp, gin-soaked joy rides, platinum records and Grammy's be damned, Stapp was going to make music history. In Chicago's Allstate Arena, Scott Stapp, apparently "juiced" up on more than the thunder of electric guitar and roar of the capacity 15,000 fans, gave an immortal performance that added a few new moves to his repertoire of manly poses.

Including but not limited to "rolling on the stage, forgetting lyrics, passing out," Stapp's presence was so erratic that four incensed fans filed a suit against the band, their management and Ticketmaster. They requested full reimbursement for tickets and parking, but also, so disgusted by Stapp's display, asked the judge to take into consideration a class-action suit, representing all 15,000 fans who witnessed the boozy concert, which would put the band back about two million bucks. For the first time and most notable time in modern music, a singer was being tried with the distinct possibility of being held legally responsible for sucking.

To the humiliation of the group, this fiasco received a massive amount of coverage in all realms of the media, from CNN to US Weekly, doing irreparable damage to Creed's already shaky reputation. Although not immediate, this proved the breaking point to the quartet that sold some twenty million records in a few years of existence, as Stapp's peculiarity became burdensome to Tremonti and the other dudes.

While they abandoned ship and formed a similar group, "After Bridge" to some success, Stapp had been living comfortably on his millions until more recently. He launched a solo career this year with his album "The Great Divide," professing his growth and newfound insight in life. It seemed that Stapp had found some sort of stability in his hiatus, which maybe his antics were caused be some concrete problem he had hurdled.

This notion was dashed on the typically peaceful holiday of Thanksgiving. Stapp made a loud, apparently drunken appearance in a hotel bar, breaking shot glasses, shouting, confronting patrons. Witnessing Stapp's boorishness were members of the lame, reggae/bubblegum band 311, who much to their dismay found themselves identified by Stapp.

Quoted as finding his company "annoying," these musician (albeit inept ones), most likely acted less courteously than Stapp would have liked. In what I consider to be Scott Stapp's shining moment, maybe his most outrageous documented move, he "sucker punched" one of 311 in the face. The ensuing melee resulted in Stapp being escorted to his room by the Baltimore police, and then requested to change his accommodations.

Even more recently, Stapp was arrested at LAX for public drunkenness on his way to make sweet love to his wife of a day. It all just doesn't make much sense. The sensitive, thoughtful Scott that can be found in his lyrics or interviews seems real enough, but still it seems the belligerent, zany Stapp could deal a sucker punch to anyone at anytime. He's patently misunderstood, and will continue to be. Don't feel too bad for him though, chances are if you knew him personally he'd have sucker punched you already.

International law and you

Never judge a textbook by its cover — instead, use the index. You learn an awful lot about how an author treats her subject by browsing what is and is not worthy of discussion; you also learn a lot about the course, and about the politics of your school.

Mike Sances

For example, those enrolled in a Dean's Book section this semester were required to read David Shipler's "The Working Poor." Shipler's index is fascinating in its exclusion of any political idea that deviates even remotely from the dichotomy repeated daily on the editorial page of the New York Times, his former employer. In particular, his sole and obscure mention of Marxism reads as if it could have been written by a computer.

Two semesters ago, in spring 2005 — and I promise I'll stop bashing Dean's Book shortly — it was mandated, from above, that Dean's Book students should read another work by a former Times journalist, Chris Hedges' "War Is a Force that Gives Us Meaning." Like Shipler, Hedges tries in vain to squeeze a huge issue into an extremely narrow political lens, with equally painful results. His index is notable in its exclusion of terms such as "United Nations," "UN Charter," and "international law." The omissions help to explain why Hedges can't conceive a world without war, just as Shipler can't imagine an America without poverty.

Another example: I have in front of me the second edition of "American Foreign Policy" by Bruce Jentleson, a professor of political science at Duke University. The inclusion of a term like "international law" in such a book is arguably of greater importance than those mentioned already, since Jentleson's readers are more likely to work someday for, say, the State Department (Jentleson's former employer).

It isn't there. Instead there are some scattered references to "international legal institutions," such as the International Criminal Court, and more often than not the discussion is framed around why the United States disagrees with the institution in question. The distinction is important, because such institutions carry no weight absent an underlying body of international law to back them up. Similar to American ambassador John Bolton's famous declaration that "There is no such thing as the United Nations," Jentleson is effectively denying the existence of international law.

Ridiculing the UN, in effect the cornerstone of international law, is in vogue again these days, these criticisms being sometimes accurate. What is not accurate is to say that it is a radical or idealistic organization, any more than imagining a world without war is a radical idea. On the contrary, the roots of the UN are in fact highly practical, and remain relevant today.

Aggressive war has long been American foreign policy, but it has only recently been officially sanctioned by the 2002 National Security Strategy, also known as the Bush Doctrine.

Some history: by 1945, millions of soldiers and civilians had been killed in combat, millions more by the concentration camp, and two atomic bombs had just been dropped on Japan. It was now apparent that advances in the technology of killing, specifically the atomic bomb, threatened to destroy the species. Thus, it was the judgment of the Nuremberg tribunal that from then onward, wars of aggression would be forbidden as "the supreme international crime."

It was with these sentiments in mind that the UN Charter was crafted, as its first sentence makes clear, "to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war, which twice in our lifetime has brought untold sorrow to mankind." The Charter also sets clear limits on the threat or use of force in international relations: specifically, force is only allowed in self defense, or with the approval of the Security Council. Anything else constitutes "the supreme international crime."

So it is not surprising that the government of the United States, especially but not exclusively the Bush administration, detests the UN, as do the government lapdogs in the intellectual elite. Aggressive war has long been American foreign policy, but it has only recently been officially sanctioned by the 2002 National Security Strategy, also known as the Bush Doctrine.

First, you'll recall, the White House argued that the attack on Iraq was justified due to a gathering threat to our survival; by 2004, the absence of banned weapons forced them to admit that they reserved the right to attack any country on the merest suspicion of a threat. The contempt for international law has now reached such heights that the 2005 Pentagon document, National Defense Strategy of the United States, identifies three threats to American dominance: "international fora, judicial processes, and terrorism."

It would be interesting to inquire into how the UN Charter came to be written, and whether it had popular support or not. But its popular backing today is beyond dispute. A 2004 study by the Chicago Council on Foreign Relations found that majorities of the American public favored eliminating the Security Council veto, and felt that "the United States should be more willing to make decisions within the United Nations, even if this means that the United States will have to go along with a policy that is not its first choice."

These sentiments weren't lost on those who planned the Iraq war, of course, since they labored intensively, and for the most part successfully, to convince the American public that the invasion of Iraq was not aggressive, but defensive, and that it was undertaken with a "coalition of the willing." The necessity of such lying is, strangely enough, grounds for hope.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

CONSIDER MEDICAL MARIJUANA

As a Massachusetts resident and medical professional, I am appalled at the fact that some of our state legislators still refuse to consider the bill that would protect seriously ill people who use medical marijuana with a doctor's recommendation from the threat of prosecution.

As our current law stands, any and all marijuana users are subject to criminal penalties, even those seriously ill individuals who have been advised by their doctors to use marijuana. Medical professionals worldwide continue to recommend marijuana to patients who suffer from a variety of conditions, including muscle spasticity and neuropathic pain associated with multiple sclerosis (MS), and severe nausea and wasting due to chemotherapy treatment.

If these seriously ill individuals can be prescribed morphine, OxyContin and other powerful, highly addictive narcotics by their doctors, why not allow them to use relatively safe, all-natural marijuana?

According to the Drug Policy Forum, over 1,300 doctors in Massachusetts have signed a pledge supporting medical marijuana. In all seven Massachusetts districts where medical marijuana has appeared on the ballot, voters have consistently been in favor of the measure by an average of 69 percent. Despite overwhelming support from the community, many legislators still oppose the bill. They continue to hide behind the same old objections, even though these complaints have been discredited time and again.

They claim, for example, that medical marijuana legislation sends the wrong message to teens and encourages teen drug use. In fact, every other state that has had a medical marijuana law in effect long enough to produce data has seen a decrease in teen marijuana use since implementing the law. Some claim that the THC pill, Marinol, is a sufficient substitute for marijuana, but I know first-hand that cancer patients undergoing chemotherapy can often be too nauseated to even swallow a pill. In fact, research has shown that oral administration is the least effective way to administer THC or the other therapeutic components of marijuana.

The Joint Committee on Public Health is considering the bill this week, and I call on the committee to recognize the plight of these seriously ill people and pass this bill. I also urge all concerned constituents to contact their senators and representatives and let them know how important medical marijuana is to Massachusetts's residents.

Prosecuting medical marijuana patients, besides being cruel and inhumane, wastes taxpayer dollars and preoccupies law enforcement officials when they could be arresting violent criminals. Individuals who are seeking relief from the debilitating symptoms associated with their diseases should not be branded as criminals. They deserve our compassion and understanding, and it's time to allow them a wider range of options for relief.

NICE AND LEGAL

Facts matter and Mike Sances' column about the 2002 incident involving the FBI can be seen in a very different light when the actual facts are discussed.

Then (as now) Amherst town politics made the SGA look civil by comparison. There was some sort of dispute involving the public access cable station and in the course of this someone told the FBI that the man then running the station was telling everyone else that he was a terrorist. Well, the FBI kinda had to go check this out much as the fire department has to show up when you pull the fire alarm. The fire department doesn't honestly expect to find a fire anymore than the FBI actually expected to find a terrorist, but you still have to go…

It is like when a woman is shrieking in a parking lot after midnight, even if it likely is because her boyfriend just dropped a handful of snow down her back, the cops still have to check it out and that is essentially what happened here. When the police are told that a crime is about to be committed, what exactly else do we expect them to do but to go check it out?

What is being missed in all of this is that the real criminal is the town political wannabe who started all of this with the false allegation. The racial aspect of this lies not in the investigation, but in the false allegation. Had the professor been from Dublin rather than Baghdad, he might well have instead been falsely accused of harboring Whitey Bulger.

Martha Stewart went to jail for lying to Federal investigators and it truly is a pity that the person who made the false allegation couldn't have shared a similar fate. Justice would have been served, but when the FBI is told that a specific individual is telling everyone that he is a terrorist intent on murder and mayhem, aren't they supposed to go check it out anyway?

Likewise when a woman dials 911 and tells the cops her boyfriend is intent on killing her, they aren't supposed to go check that out, even if the dispatcher really doesn't believe her?

Facts matter and while the UMPD makes no pretense of always observing the Massachusetts Constitution, they really did nothing wrong here.

THE OSCARS

Some solid choices, few surprises

By Craig Outhier
The Orange County Register

Jack could never quit Ennis, but Oscar voters ultimately found a way to quit "Brokeback Mountain." Ang Lee's now-iconic cowboy love story was upstaged by the sprawling L.A. racial drama "Crash" on Sunday night, losing Best Picture in a startling, show-capping upset.

Otherwise, the packed house at the Kodak Theatre in Hollywood was treated to few surprises. Until the last hour, a complete "Brokeback" bust remained a remote but real possibility. By the time "Capote" star Philip Seymour Hoffman trumped the rest of the Best Actor field — including "Brokeback" leading man Heath Ledger — for his commanding portrayal of flamboyant writer Truman Capote, "Brokeback" had collected just one statuette, for Best Score. Hoffman deserves every ounce of his Oscar, portraying the "In Cold Blood" author with a fearless mix of despair and self-awe that rivals any male performance in recent memory.

Likewise, it's hard to find fault with the selection of Reese Witherspoon for Best Actress in "Walk the Line." As June Carter, Witherspoon is the romantic heart and soul of the popular Johnny Cash biopic, an optimistic, deep-feeling anchor to Joaquin Phoenix's tormented Man in Black. Witherspoon's main rival, "Transamerica" star Felicity Huffman, should not be forgotten, performing an unforgettable feat of gender contortion as an unwitting parent on the cusp of sexual and emotional transformation.

After "Brokeback" picked up late awards for its adapted screenplay and director Lee, the stage seemed set for a crowning Best Picture win. And that's when "Crash" pulled its fantastic — and, arguably, undeserved — upset. Writer-director Paul Haggis' wordplay is outstanding: biting, merciless, unrelenting. But this is, ultimately, a somewhat narrow, contrived piece of storytelling.

Geography may have something to do with it. Los Angeles, after all, is an industry town, and "Crash" provided Oscar voters with an opportunity for navel-gazing they couldn't resist. "Brokeback" remains the year's most influential movie. Opinion may vary as to its true greatness — certainly, the film's same-sex themes have engendered small but hot pockets of ill will — but its wide-ranging impact on America's movie-going consciousness is beyond debate. Admittedly, losing Best Picture takes away some of its iconic luster.

Late fireworks notwithstanding, It was George Clooney who set the tone for the evening by snatching a Best Supporting Actor statuette for his lumpy yet riveting performance as a burnt-out CIA agent in "Syriana." It was a solid vote of confidence for one of the more vocal members of Hollywood's liberal elite, but a blow to the no-less-deserving Paul Giamatti. Period-perfect as a Depression-era fight manager in "Cinderella Man," Giamatti is building an impressive resume of Oscar non-support: He wasn't so much as nominated for his so-real-it-hurts performance in last year's "Sideways." Maybe Clooney's excruciating torture scene in "Syriana" put him over the top. Nothing sends a tingle up Oscar's collective spine quite like hot coals and thumbscrews.

As a love-starved Southern wife in "Junebug," Best Supporting Actress nominee Amy Adams conjured a true, touching portrait of upbeat suffering and emerged as the category's fashionable pick in the days leading up to the awards. For naught, as it turns out. In the end the award went to prohibitive favorite Rachel Weisz, so deliciously sly as a doomed activist in "The Constant Gardner." Weisz and Clooney make for a fitting Supporting Actor/Actress tandem. Like Clooney, Weisz is active behind the scenes (she produced the Neil LaBute-directed "The Shape of Things" two years ago) and is admired for her creative taste. Like Clooney, she tears it up in one of the year's most overtly political films.

Politics, overt or otherwise, seemed to rule this Oscar ceremony. Host Jon Stewart's early swipe at Dick Cheney to the amusing election-year spoof of TV ads to the political, anti-escapist nature of the movies themselves, it was a polarizing year for Oscar. It says something that most populist films honored — "March of the Penguins" and "Wallace & Gromit: Curse of the Were-Rabbit" — were in relatively obscure categories. (Best Documentary Feature and Best Animated Feature, respectively.) Not that any of the honorees seemed troubled by that fact. In the words of Clooney, this was the year when Oscar was "proud to be out of touch."

Three 6 Mafia awarded Oscar

LOS ANGELES (AP) — The Oscar people showed they were ready to embrace a song called "It's Hard Out Here for a Pimp," and the hip-hop group Three 6 Mafia couldn't have been happier — or more surprised.

When Three 6 Mafia's name was called Sunday as the winner of the Oscar for best original song, its members bounded joyfully onto the stage, where they offered shout-outs to friends.

"I just couldn't believe it. I couldn't stand still," Jordan "Juicy J" Houston said backstage. "I had to run somewhere. I started to run somewhere. People thought the police was probably chasing me somewhere."

Host Jon Stewart was especially impressed.

"That's how you accept an Oscar!" he gushed.

Stewart joked that the Memphis group might have to "get into it" with Itzhak Perlman's "posse." The classical violinist had earlier performed a medley of Oscar-nominated film scores.

Ra calls Pearl Street's name

By Jeremy Fowler

After the release of "From One," Ra fell into the rock forefront with the hit single "Do You Call My Name." Getting major radio play on stations such as WAAF in Boston, "From One" went on to sell upwards of 200,000 copies. This is phenomenal for a band that started on a small indie label before being picked up by Universal records. Their unique sound blends both modern and progressive rock, as well as a unique, Middle Eastern sound that seem to go hand in hand with lead singer Sahaj's distinctive voice.

Now, after nearly a three-year hiatus from touring, comes the bands sophomore release, "Duality." This album carries just as much force as "From One" and even contains an amazing cover of the Police's "I Very Little Thing She Does Is Magic." Sting and the Police are Sahaj's greatest musical influences, and he was extremely honored to be able to cover one of their songs for the latest album.

It is also very easy for a band to sink into the sophomore slump and put out a record that's less than great. This is not the case here, however, as Sahaj took his time producing and mixing this album, which was recorded mostly in his parents' basement. Made over a 10 month span, you can hear the effort that went into making this — it avoids the typical sophomore album formula of a second hit and then 90 percent filler.

Spirituality is also a large part of this band's influence. Sahaj himself has traveled extensively throughout India and the Middle East studying philosophy, and he actually takes his name from his journeys there.

The message conveyed on "Duality" is one of fear and love, an interesting combination that seems to fit together in many ways, both obvious and subliminally. The CD is almost split in half, with fear dominating the first seven tracks as love takes over for the remaining eight songs on the album. It is riveting to listen to the lyrics and the overall tempo of the band. You can feel a change, which leaves the listener with a sense of wonder and curiosity about standing.

The presence they command on stage is also unbelievable. At a show in New Hampshire — a free concert for 40,000 people attended — the crowd was never moving as much as when Ra took the stage for their set. Evidently is something Ra prides themselves on, and they want everyone to be involved and moving when they perform. Pearl Street this Thursday will be no different.

Ra is sure to blow the doors off with the screaming guitar riffs of Dave Carrol, thumping bass of D'Haese and raging drums of Massachusetts native Andy Ryan. Sahaj's strong, commanding voice will grab the listeners and keep them till they see the light.

Ra is a band that you will have a hard time forgetting. They are a breath of the air play or non-eyes, they command. Through progressive rock and Middle Eastern vibes, Sahaj and the rest of the guys in Ra are bringing to what rock music should sound like.

So come down and check these guys out. You will not leave disappointed.

Eels

7.5/10

"With Strings Live at Town Hall"
Vagrant Records

Following last year's double album "Blinking Lights and Other Revelations," Eels mastermind E, or Mark Oliver Everett, decided that he would have to do something special to take the massive album on tour. Abandoning the straightforward rock 'n' roll approach of 2003's "Shootenanny!" it only made sense that E wouldn't bring back the meat-and-potatoes band that he had with him on that tour. For "Blinking Lights," E brought with him a backing band of string players, as well as an ensemble of musicians to play a variety of instruments, from acoustic guitar to lap steel to organs and well beyond.

Opening humbly with E on his acoustic guitar playing "Blinking Lights (For Me)," and the string section joining him when the second verse begins, "With Strings" proves to be a suitable, modest affair rather than the cliché live record blow-out atmosphere. Indeed, on paper it seems odd that an artist such as E would be inclined to release a live album, but within a few short minutes it becomes clear that an assembly of musicians so unique, playing a particularly special batch of songs, is something that demands to be captured on tape for eternity.

Over the course of the 22 tracks on "With Strings," E and his band wind through a lot of the "Blinking Lights" songs, including most of the double album's highlights like "Trouble With Dreams," "Hey Man (Now You're Really Living" and the closer, "Things the Grandchildren Should Know," and revisit a lot of older favorites. The "Blinking Lights" songs seem like the ones best suited for the "With Strings" ensemble, which is both an advantage as well as a disadvantage. "Trouble With Dreams" sounds great, but only because it is a straightforward rendition of a great song — though the drum solo at the end does seem like a dicey choice for such a modest group of musicians (and it should be noted that percussion is generally sparse throughout the recording). Some of the older songs are more exciting, simply because they undergo drastic revision. "Bus Stop Boxer," from 2001's "Souljacker" album, gets completely reimagined with a downtempo feel, strings and something that sounds like a Theremin. "Flyswatter," from 2000's "Daises Of The Galaxy," is another particular highlight, with the string section taking over the song's catchy, memorable, instrumental hook. The constantly reimagined "Novocain For The Soul," the Eels' first, and only, big commercial breakthrough, is not the best version of the song, but is still a worthy companion to the original. E also throws in a few covers and an unreleased track for the fans, including a rendition of Bob Dylan's "Girl From North Country."

"With Strings" is a great recording of a very impressive performance. It encapsulates a lot of what makes E and the Eels so special and unique. The performance is grand in its scope but never takes away from E's ragged, haggard voice and the naturally intimate feel of his songs. However, like all records, all that "With Strings" adds is really just for fans only – not that that's a bad thing. E shifts all 22 of these songs, sometimes subtly and sometimes drastically, into new lights and "With Strings" never feels like a self-congratulatory trip. Anyone that's ever enjoyed an Eels record will find something on "With Strings" to hold on to and there is little, if anything, to dislike, however the record is ultimately for the diehards that simply can't get enough Eels. E, a man known for not doing things the conventional way, has once again proven that doing things his way may not be the simplest path, but it will always pay off.

Mogwai

8.5/10

"Mr. Beast"
Matador Records

When Mogwai titles their albums, they know exactly what they are doing. The Scottish post-rockers named their 2001 album "Rock Action," and while their music is far away from the verse-chorus-verse conventions of modern, or really any, rock music, there is nothing more rock 'n' roll than being blistering, deafeningly loud and painting the speakers with wall-to-wall distortion and sheets of sound. 2003's "Happy Songs For Happy People" was also called ironic at the time of its release, but irony is probably not the concept that Mogwai was aiming for. The mostly instrumental band is known for a type of shoegaze-influenced style that is, on the surface, anything but cheery. However, if Mogwai is anything they are a celebration of sound, and when the band leaves so much up to the listeners' ears, well, happy people probably find a lot of happiness in these songs.

On their latest album they went for a title that is perhaps more outwardly forthright. "Mr. Beast" is the title of the album, and probably the best name that the hypothetical personification of Mogwai's music could be. The opening track, "Auto Rock," is indeed monolithic, but it never lumbers. Starting with a quiet keyboard, "Auto Rock" launches as a pack of guitars chime in and the song builds and builds, moving gracefully but taking up a massive amount of space, finally dying down while the drums just continue to stomp and pound on. After another fit on unbridled guitar lust, "Glasgow Mega-Snake," Mogwai settles down for two songs that feature vocals. The first of the duo, "Acid Food," revels in the quiet subtleties that Mogwai has always had a penchant for, though they often bury them under piles of guitars and drums, and "Travel Is Dangerous" is a brilliant quiet/loud dynamic exploration. Vocals make a third, and final, appearance later in the album on slow-burning "I Chose Horses."

Mogwai has always been a band of great promise, great talent and glorious, uncompromising vision, and "Mr. Beast" continues down that same path. Never recycling anything from the Mogwai catalog, but never entirely removed, it is a fitting step of sonic evolution and artistic betterment from a band that never takes the easy way out. Each song is packed to the brim, but never overstuffed, with sound and composition. Many of the songs on "Mr. Beast," in fact, play much more on the quiet side, sometimes building into a massive climax ("Friend Of The Night") and sometimes drifting off into a quiet atmosphere ("Team Handed"), but always sounding completely natural. The band has become masters of letting each composition breathe and grow into itself. Each song is intricately crafted, especially the album's highlights, such as "Emergency Trap," which feeds off of a mixed down wall of noise that plays an elegant piano and drum line.

While "Mr. Beast" makes no concessions toward the mainstream, it is notable for perhaps being Mogwai's most outsider-friendly album. Not one song even reaches the six-minute marker and, while Mogwai is meant to be played at an insanely loud volume, most of the songs have plenty of quiet moments of course that quiet just helps to touch off the inevitable explosions that follow (such as the colossal finale, "We're No Here").

"Mr. Beast" continues to see Mogwai break exciting new ground in fresh territory. While they are still bound to scare off more people than they attract, Mogwai even stands the chance of expanding their horizons with their latest offering. At the very least they will certainly expand their name recognition; bands of this caliber are simply impossible to ignore forever, especially when they make this much of a racket.

Untied States

1/10

"Retail Detail"
Foul Country Records

Atlanta based Untied States come out with their freshman debut, and, I'm sorry to say, their inexperience shows on this album. It doesn't take a keen ear to see where they went wrong with "Retail Detail," as every track leaves the listener scratching their head, wondering what the hell just happened to them — and not in a good way.

The CD opens with "Its Not Goodbye," and as soon as it starts, you'll wish that it were already over. The sound is a mix of electronica and space-age sound effects, with random dashes of piano and guitar. The vocals are indistinguishable and sound like a cross between Marilyn Manson and Julian Casablancas of the Strokes, without the commanding presence of either. It continues to the instrumental "Retell the Tail," which was not a showcase for a good guitar solo or heartfelt piano sequence. It was a mix of synthesized sound effects that lasted just over a minute.

"Retail Detail" continues on this same path of sounding very electronic — almost Nine Inch Nails-esque, but far less talented and conveying much less impact than Trent Reznor and company. One notable track would be "My Cause is My Curse." There are some very cool sounds on this song, but the vocals remain a mystery and leave one needing to search for them on the internet in order to understand what message Untied States are trying to get across. They try to sound very space-age — a kind of Pink Floyd meets the Strokes. However, they fail miserably, not capturing either side to any degree worthy of buying this record. Save your change for the Strokes' "First Impression of Earth" or Pink Floyd's "Wish You Were Here."

Got dem ol' kozmic Southern-fried rockin' blues again, Mama

By Ben Wiener
The Orange County Register

These past few days ... when my free-time mind hasn't been pondering the legal comings and goings of Scott Stapp and Kid Rock (our latest sex-tape scandal sensations, and doesn't it ever make you wonder if some of these things are deliberately leaked to drum up business?) and Gary Glitter ... and when I haven't been lamenting what a sad year it's been for movie songs, when you notice that only three less-than-memorable ones (try humming any, just try) were up for the Best Song Oscar when better years have struggled to keep it to five — when I haven't been doing either of those things or figuring why it is I have three copies of most Elvis Costello albums, I've been Southern frying my brain.

I have no idea why it started, although I wouldn't blame you if you thought it was merely because three reissues — two from ZZ Top, one from Lynyrd Skynyrd — arrived last week. I swear I had the itch before I heard Bucky Covington (good ol' boy "American Idol" contestant, for those who avoid the show like syphilis) work his way, not entirely poorly, through Skynyrd's "Simple Man."

I also know I get on kicks, when I can find the time away from what must be listened to. After I prepared and wrote that Ray Davies piece (thanks for noticing, all those who did), I didn't want to stop listening to Kinks favorites for a week. (In regular rotation those particular seven days: all of "Face to Face" and "The Kinks Are the Village Green Preservation Society," part of "Arthur" and "Lola," "Waterloo Sunset" and "See My Friends" as often as possible ... and, by the way, have you heard "Quiet Life," Davies' tune from the Julien Temple musical "Absolute Beginners"? Great Davies-does-Broadway ditty, and the set piece is reason enough to see the flick.)

Anyway, whatever the reason, I can't pinpoint it. Just got a fever for the flavor, and then, lo and behold, realized the reissues I'd been sitting on had just come out this week. Lucky timing, I guess.

As for whether I'd recommend either of these reissues, well, that depends on your level of desire for Top and Skynyrd. ZZ's "Tres Hombres" (1973) remains a great one, their breakout third album, the one that introduced "La Grange" (the how-how-how-how groove that sounds like souped-up John Lee Hooker) and the happy accident that produced the perfect transition from "Waitin' for the Bus" into "Jesus Just Left Chicago." It's a solid album, start to finish, with few lags and several oft-overlooked surprises ("Precious and Grace," the slinkier "Shiek," the soulful slow one "Hot, Blue and Righteous.") Cleanly remastered by Rhino Records, the disc now includes three solidly performed live cuts of varying audio quality.

"Tres Hombres" is a must for any proper Top collection; "Fandango!" (1975) is optional. Those who grew up on or still had the band's five sound (and let's face it, ZZ Top is foremost a live band) will value the whole thing highly, fondly recalling the rough-and-tumble medleys and rowdy covers (like "Jailhouse Rock") that make up the first half. But even some more-than-casual fans will prize it only for its studio side, which gave us both "Heard It on the X" and "Tush." Those bits and must-have others are available on best-ofs and in box sets. Even with the bonus live tracks, the long-term merit of "Fandango!" is debatable — though the price is right.

Skynyrd's ongoing overhauling, on the other hand, is represented by Universal's two-disc deluxe edition of "Gimme Back My Bullets" (1976), the penultimate studio work from the original band. Again, purists will consider it essential, and it's far from a bad album — indeed, it's loaded with far funkier riffs than the group put down elsewhere. That said, it also doesn't stack up against its predecessors (or 1977's crucial swan song "Street Survivors") in terms of delivering instant-classics or monumental arena anthems.

And it'll set you back about $25, depending on where you shop. However, the bonus disc, a DVD, might justify the price. It sports a seven-song performance the touring warhorses gave on BBC's now-defunct but fundamental late-night live program "The Old Grey Whistle Test," including robust performances of "Call Me the Breeze," "Every Mother's Son," "Sweet Home Alabama" and (of course) "Free Bird" — all of them intimately captured, with lingering closeups. Authentic, pre-tragedy footage of Skynyrd is rare. This, then, is a brief but very satisfying treat for fans.

I'd heard all three albums long ago, and recalled their standout songs. But what really struck me during this resuscitantance, however, was both bands' guitar sounds. There's as much crispness as there is force-fulness and what typically passes for grit and grime in 'em. In fact, there's probably more. Skynyrd's Gary Rossington and Allen Collins had a harmonized, finger-fast twin-guitar approach that I don't think has ever been duplicated — it's so brisk and clean yet so twangy and rooty and seemingly raw, almost primal, the way good AC/DC can be. Everyone focuses on the meaning of Ronnie Van Zant — the sensitive and soft-spoken but hell-raising rebel — that I think it's overlooked that, musically, anyway, Rossington-Collins was the soul of the band.

Likewise, nothing sounds like the multilayered Tejas blues-rock riffs that ZZ Top's Billy Gibbons created/creates in the studio. Back then, before the airtight turbo-production of "Eliminator" and "Recycler," his sound was so rich and thick and unfiltered — it blasted out of the speakers at you (still does, actually) as if a miniaturized Gibbons were tucked into your tuner, cranking out licks. It had an immediacy, a palpability, you just don't hear these days, not even in most blues records.

What rawness we do get, in fact, seems stagey by comparison, as if the artists are trying to make it sound like they were sitting on a back porch with a field recorder. That can be very convincing sometimes, but it's still artifical. Gibbons (don't mean to slight Dusty Hill or Frank Beard's contributions, mind you) sounded as dirty and down-home as a Muddy Waters record, but was then warmly amped-up to blow the back door off an air hangar. (More recent ZZ Top albums, like "XXX" and "Mescalero," by the way, have found Gibbons, Hill and Beard returning to that feel. Wise move.)

Again, whether these particular albums are worth your lunch money, I dunno. At the very least, if you don't have a few quintessential albums or a solid retrospective from each act, your collection is spotty and incomplete.

Long-bearded Southern blues rock band ZZ Top's classic albums "Tres Hombres" and "Fandango!" have recently been rereleased.

This month, the death march of the DVD will begin.

Just as DVDs replaced VHS tapes, two new formats capable of displaying high-definition video will begin the drive to consign DVDs to bargain bins and yard sales.

But although consumers stand to benefit from the new technology, it's almost certain that only one format will survive, which means that many users will end up stuck with the digital equivalent of Betamax tapes.

Movie players and disks built around the HD-DVD standard will hit stores in late March. Devices and disks built around the competing Blu-ray format will arrive a few months later.

In many ways, the releases seem premature, given the lack of a single format and the fact there are still fairly few people who own high-definition TVs.

But movie studios and electronics makers are eager to reinvigorate the slowing DVD revenue machine.

Consumers will benefit, too, as they finally get access to features that are either illegal or technically impossible with current DVDs.

Only about a quarter of U.S. televisions are expected to be capable of displaying HD video this year, and those are the only sets that will be able to take full advantage of the razor-sharp images on HD-DVD and Blu-ray disks.

But the adoption rate for HD-capable TV sets is expected to zoom past 50 percent by 2008.

For the movie studios, it's a simple financial calculation.

Roughly 80 percent of homes in the United States now have a DVD player, according to a report from the DVD Forum, an industry group.

Americans now spend twice as much buying and renting DVDs as they do going to the movies.

"That is an impressive track record, but its flip side is that the growth years for standard-definition DVD are behind it, as sales of players and prerecorded discs reach market saturation and the inevitable sales plateau," the report says.

"It is time for the DVD industry at large to upgrade its technology, so it can renew market growth and keep pace with competing and complementary technologies."

Both formats cleared their final technical hurdles last week, when an industry consortium called the Advanced Access Content System Licensing Administrator issued near-final specifications for the anti-piracy software that will be used on HD-DVD and Blu-ray disks.

The biggest benefit of the new disks and players, of course, will be the ability to watch movies in full high-definition resolution.

Current DVDs do not display high-definition video because there is not enough capacity on the disks.

Steve Nickerson, senior vice president of market management at Warner Home Video, said people buying HD television sets are looking for something to watch.

"We've done an awful lot of consumer research, and initially the motivation for consumers about buying high-definition media will be the HD-quality pictures," he said.

But eventually there will be other benefits as well, notably a feature called managed copy, which will finally bring many of the conveniences into the video realm that users have long enjoyed with music CDs.

Managed copy will allow users — with certain restrictions — to copy their HD-DVD or Blu-ray movies and TV shows to a computer hard drive or portable video device.

In theory, you could copy all your movies to a home server, and then stream them to any television in your house, like a massive video jukebox.

But the feature will not be available when the new technologies initially go on sale because the movie studios and other groups are still working to make sure that managed copy doesn't throw open the door to rampant piracy.

What's being discussed is a system in which you put the disk in your HD-DVD or Blu-ray drive in your computer, and your Internet-connected PC queries a movie industry database to find out what you're allowed to do with the disk.

How many and what types of copies you'll be allowed to make will depend on the individual studios. The studios might charge a small fee to let you make a copy.

Rob Enderle, president of research firm the Enderle Group, said many people already use gray-market software to copy their DVD movies to their PCs and laptops.

But many of those programs are clunky and erratic.

He said legitimate movie copying will be welcomed by both the movie industry and consumers.

"If they can find a way for people to do this legally and make a little money from it, piracy gets down to a much more manageable level because the vast majority of people don't want to be crooks," Enderle said.

Which will prevail?

Because HD-DVD and Blu-ray will offer nearly identical features, it's hard to say which format will triumph.

Many analysts think that Blu-ray has a slight edge, for several reasons:

—Blu-ray disks can hold more data (50 gigabytes vs. 30 gigabytes).

—Dell Inc., the world's largest computer maker, is currently backing Blu-ray but not HD-DVD.

—Some movie studios releasing Blu-ray movies currently have no plans to release HD-DVD movies.

—Sony plans to include a Blu-ray drive in its upcoming PlayStation 3 game console.

HD-DVD has its advantages, as well:

—Microsoft Corp. is backing HD-DVD and plans to heavily support the format in its upcoming Windows Vista operating system.

—HD-DVD movie players and disks are hitting the market first, and the first HD-DVD players will be less expensive than the first Blu-ray players ($500 vs. $1,000).

Without having to worry about vanquishing a competing standard, DVD players and movies eclipsed VCRs and videotapes in about a decade.

But industry experts disagree on whether the looming format showdown will ensure a longer lifespan for DVDs.

Nickerson at Warner — which currently plans to support both standards — said only about 300,000 DVD players were sold in the first year the technology was available.

He estimated as many as 8 million HD-DVD and Blu-ray players combined could be sold in their first year.

"It's going to be a much quicker impact in the marketplace," he said.

Maria Colon, marketing manager for the DVD division at Samsung Electronics, which will be making only Blu-ray players, said the inability of the HD-DVD and Blu-ray camps to negotiate a unified format will discourage some buyers.

"Obviously, for the consumer we would like to be able to offer one format, and that just hasn't been able to happen," she said. "I think that having two formats does change the timeline."

Egypt hits the States

By Ellen R. Stapleton
Associated Press

ALBANY, N.Y. — The 27-year-old British archaeologist was making his first trip to Egypt, on a mission to uncover the truth about the Great Pyramid. When he moved into an abandoned tomb at Giza and slept on a hammock, everyone noticed the unconventional William Matthew Flinders Petrie.

Petrie became even harder to ignore after his 1880 adventure as he brought a scientific approach to excavations and, as a result, changed what the world knew about the ancient civilization.

Some of his best discoveries from the Petrie Museum of Egyptian Archaeology at University College London are currently touring the United States. "Excavating Egypt" is at the Albany Institute of History & Art through June 4.

Known as the father of Egyptian archaeology, Petrie got his start by measuring the Great Pyramid and dispelling the popular notion that the structure contained mystical secrets. He determined it was only a monument to a pharaoh.

"That really placed him on the archaeological map," said Tammis Groft, the Albany Institute's deputy director for collections and exhibitions. "It really helped the beginnings of the rewriting of Egyptian history."

Trained as a surveyor, Petrie was involved with digs at some 50 sites during his career. The exhibit contains 221 artifacts, many that are among the earliest examples of their kind.

"It's really highlighting his work and the contributions that he made to the field of archaeology, which were extraordinary in their day as well as today," Groft said. "The thing I'm really struck by is the range of materials. ... Each piece in itself has a wonderful story to tell."

Like the bead-net dress that is one of two such garments that have survived from the Old Kingdom period, about 2400 B.C. Worn over another garment, it would have rattled with movement. One of Petrie's students found a box containing thousands of beads and shells in the previously robbed tomb of a girl, and they were restrung based on pictures from the period.

"Sometimes he would go back to sites that had already been excavated and he would use his own methodical methods and discover great new things that people had just really overlooked," Groft said. Petrie was a pioneer in using small, everyday items to piece together a historical record. He saw sites as time capsules and relied on variations in pottery, for example, in the dating process. One "tomb group" in the exhibit, from about 2000 B.C., contains bowls and jars, a wooden doll, a jewelry box and a scarab.

"At a time when excavation often seemed little more than a treasure hunt, he saw the need to develop scientific methods and techniques for the practice of archaeology," said Gay Robins, an art history professor at Emory University in Atlanta, which debuted the exhibit at its Michael C. Carlos Museum and published a companion catalog.

Petrie excavated Amarna, where he identified the palace of Akhenaten, the first monotheistic pharaoh, and his wife, Nefertiti. The exhibit contains five artifacts bearing images of her iconic profile.

At Hawara, Petrie unearthed a Roman cemetery where mummies were accompanied by painted portraits of the dead. The Petrie Museum has the largest collection of these second-century portraits, and one is part of the exhibit.

Petrie, also a prolific author, taught at University College London for 40 years and died in 1942. "The present has its most serious duty to history in saving the past for the benefit of the future," he once wrote.

The exhibit is traveling while the Petrie Museum, which has 80,000 objects in its collection, builds a new facility scheduled to open in 2008. Other locations include: Mount Holyoke College Art Museum in South Hadley, Mass., Jan. 28-July 29, 2007; Museum of New Mexico, Museum of Fine Arts in Santa Fe, N.M., Aug. 24, 2007-Jan. 6, 2008; and University of Miami, Lowe Art Museum in Coral Gables, Fla., June 28-Nov. 2, 2008.

Razzies, Stinkers award absolute worst

By Joe Pudas
The Daily Cardinal (U. Wisconsin)

MADISON, Wis. — As of today, the movie awards season is officially over. Most of the awards shows are congratulatory affairs that encourage you to see the highest touted films of the year, which are often under-seen by the general populace. It's kind of ironic how similarly little press coverage is given to the various awards ceremonies for bad movies, such as the Golden Raspberry Awards and Stinker Bad Movie Awards, which disparage some films that, unfortunately, have made significantly more money than the Oscar nominees for Best Picture.

The Golden Raspberry Awards, or the Razzies as they're commonly called, are considered the foremost authority on bad cinema. They were founded in 1980 by John Wilson, who first held the ceremony in his living room, and have been growing in prominence ever since. The tacky trophies Wilson and company dole out cost approximately $4.79 each, and are composed of such materials as 8-millimeter film reels, wood-grain shelf paper and lids from iced tea jars, which are hastily glued together and spray-painted.

The films "honored" range from extremely successful garbage ("Wild Wild West") to high-profile camp ("Showgirls"), and the celebrities lampooned are generally easy targets (Sylvester Stallone and Madonna are the all-time champions). The ceremony has gained some odd respectability in the past few years, with some celebrities even getting in on the joke and showing up to receive their award. Tom Green, who won five Razzies for "Freddy Got Fingered," was the first winner to attend, and Halle Berry collected her Worst Actress trophy for "Catwoman" while clutching the Best Actress Oscar she won just the year before for "Monster's Ball." Although it really is a big parody of awards shows, I think the Razzies have some cultural significance in representing and pinpointing the worst Hollywood has to offer.

I know most of us can sniff out a dud — I probably don't have to tell you that "Deuce Bigalow: European Gigolo" or "Son of the Mask" are vigorously awful films best avoided — but alternative awards shows such as these can provoke fun debates about movies most of us are sadly aware of. Now, other than "House of Wax" and "The Dukes of Hazzard," I haven't seen the Razzie nominees for Worst Film (the lesser known Jenny McCarthy debacle "Dirty Love" also won over "Deuce Bigalow" and "Son of the Mask"), but it seems as if they've also been picked because of tabloid sensations Paris Hilton and Jessica Simpson.

For a much more accurate breakdown of the worst films of the year, consult the Stinker Awards, which proclaimed "Ed Wood"-esque director Uwe Boll's reprehensible creature feature "Alone in the Dark" Worst Picture over "Deuce Bigalow," "Son of the Mask," "Dirty Love" and "Bewitched." They also took time to mention legitimately bad performances like Sandra Bullock's embarrassing shenanigans in "Miss Congeniality 2: Armed and Fabulous" (which just might be my pick for Worst Movie of the Year), Martin Short's atrocious mugging in "Jimmy Glick in Lalawood" and Tyler Perry's painfully unfunny cross-dressing in "Diary of a Mad Black Woman." They also have my favorite bad movie category: the Spencer Breslin Award for Worst Performance by a Child.

So if you're sick of talking about how "Brokeback Mountain" got robbed by the Academy and you want to look at the other end of the spectrum, check out the Razzies and Stinkers. While the picks can be simplistic and lazy, some are incisive and surprising, not to mention helpful for making a wise rental choice (you might even want to check them out if you're a bad-movie connoisseur). And I can promise you there'll be at least one movie you honestly like that got nominated and/or won.

"Alone in the Dark" and "Jimmy Glick in Lalawood" were among the films nominated for this year's Stinker Awards.

A-10 referees blow crucial call

Philadelphia is supposed to be the city of brotherly love, right? Only, the Massachusetts women's basketball team was getting anything but in the Atlantic 10 Tournament this past weekend.

Just ask the officials.

I have seen my fair share

Danny Picard

of bad calls by referees in all sports. And I have seen enough of them, that seeing a bad call overturned has become almost normal. But what happened on Friday night at Alumni Memorial Fieldhouse in Philadelphia was a travesty.

In case you were not aware, the Minutewomen lost in the first round of the A-10 tournament, ending their season, and sending everybody home with a sour taste in their mouths.

Sure, the Minutewomen missed a decent number of layups and easy shots that could have put them at least ten points ahead.

But with 1:38 remaining in the game, UMass had cut a seven-point deficit into just two points at 52-50, and clearly had the momentum down the stretch.

I can remember sitting courtside across from the UMass bench, telling some random A-10 marketing intern that Duquesne does not stand a chance to win the ballgame after sophomore Pam Rosanio hit two free throws to make it a two-point game. But if I had known that the officiating crew was about to make the worst call in sports history, I would have left after the first half to get a cheese steak at Geno's.

After Rosanio hit a pair of foul shots, Duquesne took the ball down into the UMass zone.

The Minutewomen were playing ferocious defense, and their bench was more active than any UMass cheerleader would have been. (And shame on them for no-showing, by the way.)

Duquesne was moving the ball around, but had nowhere to go with it. They were being stopped by some of the best defense I had seen all season from this Minutewomen squad.

With one second left on the shot clock, the ball was almost stolen by UMass and was going out-of-bounds. Sophomore Alisha Tatham made a great hustle play to swat the ball back in play as she was diving into the crowd.

As A. Tatham was saving the ball, the shot-clock buzzer went off and the referees blew their whistles. The officials made the call: shot-clock violation.

But as the Minutewomen were celebrating and running down the court to get ready for the inbound, Duquesne's Kristi Little shot the ball into the basket. One of the officials saw this from under the net, and called the other two referees to center court for a gathering that took about two minutes from my life that I will never get back.

What followed was a turn of events that still boggles my mind to this day.

The officiating crew called over both coaches to discuss the ruling. All you had to do was witness UMass coach Marnie Dacko's reaction to realize what had just happened.

The original call of a shot-clock violation was overturned with no evidence of a replay (not that a replay would have proven the refs right).

The new ruling on the court was that when A. Tatham swatted the ball back in play, the possession changed, causing the shot clock to reset. While it was clear that A. Tatham never had possession under the NCAA Rulebook, (Rule 4 Section 13).

That was not the part of the call that was most befuddling.

The officials actually awarded Duquesne with two points for the shot that was made by Little while most of UMass was on its way down the other end of the floor celebrating the change of possession that was made in the original call, making it a 54-50 game, and completely changing the momentum.

Little's shot, mind you, was taken at least two seconds after the buzzer went off and the referees all blew their whistles. The last time I checked, when an official blows his or her whistle and makes the patting on the top of the head motion, that means that play stops for a shot-clock violation.

It was a bad call. For one, Tatham never had possession. Secondly, even if she did, the whistles were blown and play stopped. Any shots after that, regardless of what happened, should not be allowed.

To make an analogy to a different sport, what happened with that call is like in hockey, if there was an off-sides call, but the player continued to come in and take an uncontested shot into the net, only to have the ruling overturned and counting the goal after the whistle.

It just doesn't make sense.

For that reason, Bonita Spence, Amy Bonner and Joe Vaszily should be ashamed of themselves. These three officials have cost the Minutewomen a chance to make a run in the postseason, and have failed in their duty to officiate a college basketball game at the highest level. To make a call like that, and award another team two crucial points with less than two minutes to play in a game with so much meaning, is pathetic.

It is just too bad that UMass' season had to end this way. It is too bad they had to come back to Amherst, knowing that they are better than most of the teams in the conference.

As I sit here writing this, I am watching the A-10 championship game between George Washington and Temple on ESPN2, and I can't help but remember the time that the Minutewomen knocked off No. 25 George Washington earlier this season, and thinking about how I could still be in Philadelphia, watching them take on the Colonials with an NCAA Tournament berth on the line.

What happened on Friday evening was a joke, nothing less. And that officiating crew should be punished for taking the result of the contest out of the players' hands, and turning a competitive playoff game into a circus.

Woods wins Doral, preps for the Masters

By Doug Ferguson
Associated Press

MIAMI – The road to the Masters usually starts with the Florida swing on the PGA Tour, although Tiger Woods already had a head start even before he arrived at Doral.

He began 2006 with a victory at Torrey Pines, making a birdie on the last hole and winning when Jose Maria Olazabal missed a 4-foot par putt in the playoff. He birdied his last two holes in Dubai to get into a playoff with Ernie Els, winning when the South African found the water.

But his victory on the Blue Monster might have been the best proof that Woods is getting closer to having full command of swing changes he has worked on with Hank Haney the last two years.

It was his 10th wire-to-wire victory among his 48 titles on the PGA Tour. And it was another case of Woods doing whatever was required – birdies early in his round to keep his two-stroke cushion, back-to-back birdies when David Toms closed within one stroke and a safe shot when a bogey was good enough to win.

After his third victory in five starts this year, Woods was asked about his confidence.

"Pretty high, considering I've put myself there in virtually every event," he said.

Monday's world ranking gave Woods more than double the points over Vijay Singh, the first time his lead has been that large in three years.

Beyond the trophies, however, are the opportunities. And that's where Woods has separated himself from the pack.

Dating to the U.S. Open last year at Pinehurst, Woods has either won or finished second in nine of his last 14 events on the PGA Tour. It is similar, although not quite as pronounced, as the streak he enjoyed at the start of the 2000 season when he won or was runner-up in 10 of 11 tournaments.

"Put it this way," Woods said. "If I hit a couple of bad shots, I feel like it's not the end of the world. I can fit it and I can move on and I can still post a really good number. Before, it would be damage control and somehow try and wheel around it and shoot somewhere around par or even under par. But that's not the case."

Some of his victories have been handed to him when his opponents blinked first. John Daly had a 15-foot birdie putt to win the American Express Championship last October, and three-putted to lose the playoff. Then came the mistakes of Olazabal in the Buick Invitational, and Els in Dubai.

Toms contributed to the cause by three-putting from 60 feet, a tough putt under any circumstance. That allowed Woods to aim away from the water and into a bunker, taking bogey to win by one shot.

But the wins keep piling up, and the mystique is slowly returning.

"You just kind of hope you catch him on an off-week somewhere," Rich Beem said Friday, when he went into the third round one shot out of a four-way tie for the lead that included Woods. "You're not going to beat him. He's like a heavyweight fighter."

Phil Mickelson felt it Saturday.

A year after engaging in a fantastic duel with Woods at Doral, they were in the final pairing Saturday. Neither paid much attention to it because it was only the third round, and because so many players were capable of making a move. But the look on Lefty's face spoke volumes when his 4-iron around the trees on the 18th hole – Woods called it the best shot he had seen that day – spun off the green into the water.

Mickelson said after the third round that he wasn't concerned about the pairing, then quickly added, "I should be now. I'm four back."

"He's a tough guy to overcome when he's got the lead," Mickelson said Sunday after putting two balls in the water on consecutive holes and shooting 73.

Woods not only is 34-3 when he has at least a share of the 54-hole lead, no one has ever beaten him when starting the final round more than two shots behind.

And while his bogey-bogey finish was sloppy, it wasn't the only time. Along with his bogey-bogey finish in regulation at the Masters last year, he bogeyed two of the last three holes in the 2002 U.S. Open to win by three shots, and he had to two-putt for bogey from 60 feet on the last hole at Firestone to win by one over Mickelson in 1999.

Asked how his victory at Doral will stand out among his other 47 tour victories, Woods talked about various shots he had worked on with Haney.

He found the perfect ball flight of a 4-iron that stopped a foot away on the par-3 fourth in the first round. The arc of his swing, he said, was perfect on two mammoth tee shots at the par-5 eighth.

"I thought one of the coolest shots I hit today – even though no one realizes this – is the shot I hit on 8," he said Sunday. "I had 103 yards and I hit a little 9-iron in there. I hit a draw in there, which is hard to do hitting it that soft, held it back up against the flag. That to me is where I'm trying to get to, the ability to hit shots like that on call."

That's where he is headed with the Masters only a month away.

Twins legend Kirby Puckett dies of stroke

By Dave Campbell
Associated Press

MINNEAPOLIS – Kirby Puckett died Monday, a day after the Hall of Fame outfielder had a stroke at his Arizona home. He was 45.

Puckett died at St. Joseph's Hospital and Medical Center in Phoenix. He had been in intensive care since having surgery at another hospital following his stroke Sunday morning.

The bubbly, barrel-shaped Puckett carried the Twins to World Series titles in 1987 and 1991 before his career was cut short by glaucoma. His family, friends and former teammates gathered at the hospital Monday.

Puckett was given last rites and died in the afternoon, hospital spokeswoman Kimberly Lodge said.

"On behalf of Major League Baseball, I am terribly saddened by the sudden passing of Kirby Puckett," commissioner Bud Selig said. "He was a Hall of Famer in every sense of the term.

"He played his entire career with the Twins and was an icon in Minnesota. But he was revered throughout the country and will be remembered wherever the game is played. Kirby was taken from us much too soon – and too quickly," he said.

Puckett broke into the majors in 1984 and had a career batting average of .318. Glaucoma left the six-time Gold Glove center fielder and 10-time All-Star with no choice but to retire after the 1995 season when he went blind in his right eye.

Out of the game, the 5-foot-8 Puckett put on a considerable amount of weight, which concerned those close to him.

"It's a tough thing to see a guy go through something like that and come to this extent," former teammate Kent Hrbek said Monday night.

"That's what really hurt him bad, when he was forced out of the game," he said. "I don't know if he ever recovered from it."

Asked what he would remember the most from their playing days, Hrbek quickly answered, "Just his smile, his laughter and his love for the game."

Puckett was elected to the Hall of Fame on his first try in 2001 and thrilled the crowd in Cooperstown when he said, "I'm telling you, anything is possible" during his induction speech.

His plaque praised his "ever-present smile and infectious exuberance."

"This is a sad day for the Minnesota Twins, Major League Baseball and baseball fans everywhere," Twins owner Carl Pohlad said.

Puckett's signature performance came in Game 6 of the 1991 World Series against Atlanta. After telling anyone who would listen before the game that he would lead the Twins to victory that night at the Metrodome, he made a leaping catch against the fence and then hit a game-ending homer in the 11th inning to force a seventh game.

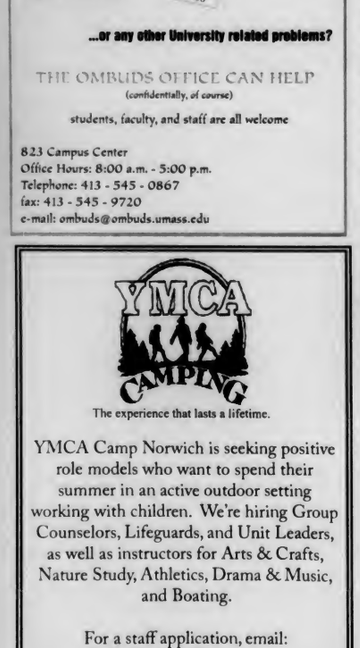
The next night, Minnesota's Jack Morris went all 10 innings to outlast John Smoltz and pitch the Twins to a 1-0 win for their second championship in five years.

"If we had to lose and if one person basically was the reason – you never want to lose – but you didn't mind it being Kirby Puckett. When he made the catch and when he hit the home run you could tell the whole thing had turned," Smoltz said Monday night.

"His name just seemed to be synonymous with being a superstar," the Braves' pitcher said. "It's not supposed to happen like this."

Hall of Fame catcher Carlton Fisk echoed Smoltz's sentiment.

"There was no player I enjoyed playing against more than Kirby. He brought such joy to the game. He elevated the play of everyone around him," Fisk said in a statement to the Hall.



Puckett's birth date was frequently listed as March 14, 1961, but recent research by the Hall of Fame indicated he was born a year earlier.

Perhaps the most popular athlete ever to play in Minnesota, Puckett was a guest coach at Twins spring training camp in 1996, but hadn't worked for the team since 2002.

He kept a low profile since being cleared of assault charges in 2003.

Tiger Woods is nearly $2 million ahead of the next competitor for the money title in 2006 as he prepares for the Masters in April.

Post-season awards flatter UMass

Lowe, Lasme and Freeman honored

By Dan Duggan
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Atlantic 10 announced the men's basketball All-Conference selections yesterday, and three members of the Massachusetts men's basketball team were recognized.

For the second year in a row, junior center Rashaun Freeman was named to the All-Conference first-team, while junior forward Stephane Lasme garnered A-10 Defensive Player of the Year honors and was named to the All-Defensive team, and freshman point guard Chris Lowe was an All-Rookie team selection.

Freeman, who was 16th in the A-10 with 13.9 points per game and second with 9.3 rebounds per game, is the first UMass player to be named to the first-team twice since Monty Mack in 2000-01.

Freeman was also named the A-10 Rookie of the Year after his freshman season in 2003-04 and said that was the only award that he ever set out to achieve, as his goals have become more team-oriented.

"The only award that I was really looking for was Freshman of the Year," Freeman said. "That was my goal because a lot of people I was surrounded by thought I wouldn't do as good as I did. I wanted to prove to myself that I could get that. Other than that I just wanted to win because I know that if you don't win all of the awards you get mean absolutely nothing."

Probably the only person surprised by Lasme's selection as the Defensive Player of the Year was the junior shot-blocking extraordinaire. Before the announcement was made Lasme predicted that Temple's Mardy Collins would win the award, but clearly the coaches around the league gave Lasme more credit than he gave himself.

Lasme led the conference and was third in the nation with 3.9 blocks per game and was a dominant force in the paint all season for the Minutemen, recording 105 blocks this year, the second best single-season total in school history.

Lowe's selection to the All-Rookie team was no surprise, as the freshman has been a major contributor in his first season in the A-10. Lowe averaged just 5.5 points per game, but was second in the conference with 4.8 assists per game and led UMass by averaging 30.7 minutes of playing time per game.

Junior captain Stephane Lasme finished the regular season averaging just over four blocks per game, good for third in the nation.

UMass coach Travis Ford was pleased to hear that the trio was acknowledged by the league, but felt that Lowe, who lost out in the Rookie of the Year voting to Tommie Liddell from Saint Louis, deserved more recognition due to his importance to the team.

"Those guys are extremely deserving, but I would like to find a freshman in the country that means more to their team than what ours does," Ford said of Lowe. "It's two different things. Are those guys individually talented and have higher stats this year? There's no question. But for what Chris Lowe means to our team, there's not a more valuable freshman in the country."

After making that statement, Ford jokingly conceded that he may have been exaggerating, as North Carolina's Tyler Hansbrough, an All-American candidate averaging 19.0 points per game for the No. 10 Tar Heels, would probably qualify as the most valuable freshman in the country.

Freeman was joined on the 10-player first-team by La Salle's Steven Smith, who was named the A-10 Player of the Year for the second year in a row. Smith led the conference in scoring, averaging 20.0 points per game.

Ian Vouyoukas of Saint Louis received the Chris Daniels Award as the league's most improved player, an award that Lasme certainly was in contention for.

George Washington's Maureece Rice was named Sixth Man of the Year and GW coach Karl Hobbs voted Coach of the Year. The Colonials (26-1, 16-0 A-10) are No. 6 in the country and enter the A-10 Tournament on the heels of a perfect regular season in league play.

Freshman guard Chris Lowe received the A-10 Rookie of the Year award for his stellar play in his first year as a Minuteman.

The team awards for the '06 Minutemen

With the regular season over, and UMass set to begin the Atlantic 10 Tournament tomorrow, it seemed like the right time to hand out some hardware to the Minutemen for the 2005-06 season.

Dan Duggan

ROOKIE OF THE YEAR

The easiest category to select goes to Chris Lowe. Granted, Lowe is the only freshman on the roster, but both James Life and Brandon Thomas qualify for the award in my book, as the junior transfers are first-year players at UMass. Regardless of the competition, it's a no-brainer for Lowe.

Lowe was expected to see plenty of playing time this season, but with the departure of junior guards Art Bowers and Maurice Maxwell early in the year, Lowe was thrust into a critical role as the team's only point guard. The freshman responded, logging a team-high 30.7 minutes per game. Even a sprained ankle in late January couldn't stop Lowe, as he did not miss a game while battling through the injury.

Lowe, who was named to the A-10 All-Rookie team yesterday, finished second in the A-10 with 4.8 assists per game for the season. But once A-10 play began, and Lowe's playing time increased dramatically, he led the conference with 5.9 assists per game.

SIXTH MAN

The Achilles' heel of this year's squad – aside from turnovers – was its lack of depth. With only eight scholarship players the bench was especially thin to begin with, and no one presented themselves as a reliable performer off the bench. With no legitimate candidates in this category, let's have a little fun and give this award to coach Travis Ford, for his performance as Danny O'Grady in the classic movie, "The Sixth Man."

MOST IMPROVED

I had trouble deciding on who deserves this award, and since it's my list I'm going to make my own rules. I'm breaking it down to the most improved player from last season and the player who improved the most during this season.

The player who improved the most from last year to this year is easily Stephane Lasme. Lasme has made strides in each of his three years at UMass, but this season he established himself as one of the best shot blockers in the country. Lasme, who was named the A-10 Defensive Player of the Year yesterday, was third in the nation with 3.9 blocks per game, and his 105 blocks this year is the second best single-season total in school history.

Lasme also developed his offensive game this season, averaging 10.1 points per game. If Lasme shows the same improvement this off-season, the sky is the limit next year.

The other recipient is James Life, who improved the most from Game 1 of the season to this point. Life came to UMass from Manatee Community College and was touted as a deadly outside shooter. While Life's shooting percentages (36 percent from the field, 30 percent from downtown) left something to be desired, he overcame a slow start to the season to become a vital contributor for the Minutemen.

While Life struggled to find consistency with his shooting touch, he was still able to become the scorer the team desperately needed, finishing with a 10.8 points per game average. Life was also a factor in the categories that don't show up in the box score, as he brought a swagger and toughness to the floor every night, and displayed a tireless work ethic, improving his defense as the year progressed.

MVP

Here comes the curveball: Rashaun Freeman had another solid season and was an All-Conference first-team selection for the second year in a row, but I feel that there were too many games that he didn't play at a high level to warrant this award. If the award was for best player, he'd win it hands down, but I'm more of a believer that the most valuable player should be the one guy who is completely indispensable to his team. And for those who watched this year's Minutemen, that guy was clearly Lowe.

I gave some consideration to Jeff Viggiano because of his steady play all year and the wealth of intangibles he brings to the table, but I just couldn't get past envisioning where this team would have been without Lowe.

Lowe was playing in crunch time in the first game of the season and showed remarkable poise for a freshman in tight situations throughout the year. Lowe became so critical to the team that it was jolting to see the Minutemen without their floor general on the court, as the team did not run nearly as smoothly with him on the bench.

One of the best sights this season for UMass fans was seeing Lowe take off in transition and emerge from the pack to set up a teammate with an easy lay-up. It's a sight that fans will likely see a lot of over the next three years.

And while Lowe still has room for improvement – namely developing a jump shot to complement his penetrating skills – it is unimaginable to think of where this team would have been this year without him, and that is why he gets my vote for MVP.

Minutewomen starting strong

By Eli Rosenswaike
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The Massachusetts tennis team is currently led by a junior and a sophomore, and that's what has UMass coach Judy Dixon concerned.

"Our seniors need to step up," Dixon said. "We need the seniors to lead this team. As they go, so does the rest of the team."

That has proved to be the case as they lost to Cornell when the seniors playing at three, four and six singles all lost.

After that match, Dixon held a seniors-only meeting and told them that they needed to play well, practice harder and understand that the team's success needs to rest on them, rather than junior Michele Spiess and sophomore Masha Pozar.

The next match against Dartmouth was more of the same, as all three seniors in the starting lineup lost. However, they won the match as they took the doubles point and one, two and five singles. The doubles point, which determined 90 percent of their 24 matches last season (17-7, second place in the Atlantic 10) proved to be key as it again decided the match in their favor.

The loss versus Army really frustrated Dixon, since their opponents were without two of their top players.

"That match should have been ours on paper," Dixon said. "We backed down all for except Michele. I wasn't pleased with how we played and especially with how the seniors played. The smoke was coming out of my ears after that match."

Playing Providence proved to be a breeze for the UMass tennis team, as it swept the Friars 7-0. The win against Binghamton was a special one in that both Spiess and Pozar beat players that they lost to a season ago when they squared off against the Bearcats. The Long Island University match proved to be another win, as the team played well for a 6-1 victory.

Sophomore Michele Spiess has been dominant in singles play, and has not lost in a dual match since March 15, 2005.

The Massachusetts tennis team, already seven games into its schedule, begins the season with a 4-3 record.

The tilt against Brown was a tough test as the Bears are a top-flight team from the powerful Ivy League. Despite the loss, Dixon felt they competed well against the quality competition.

The Minutewomen currently stand at 4-3 for the spring semester, which puts them in third place behind Xavier and Saint Louis, respectively. Prohibitive favorite Richmond currently stands in seventh place at 4-5.

Looking ahead to the rest of the season, Dixon has some concerns, but remains optimistic.

"This team needs terribly to find a number-three doubles team in order to win that crucial point in addition to the seniors stepping up," Dixon said. "If both places get fixed, and I think they can, then we will be very good and we can reach our goal of finishing first or second in the Atlantic 10."

If both of these issues don't get resolved then Dixon isn't so optimistic about the team's prospects for the remainder of the season.

"If one gets fixed and not the other then we're going to be middle of the road," Dixon said. "If neither gets fixed this is going to be a long season."

With senior starter Jana Bartoloni expected back soon from an ankle injury, and Spiess and Pozar playing so well at one and two singles, things are really looking up for the tennis team.

Spiess' individual success has been astounding. She hasn't lost in a dual match since March 15 of last year and the doubles duo of Spiess and Pozar are 12-0 in dual and tournament play thus far in the 2005-06 season.

In addition to the strong play of those two girls, freshman Stephanie Gimenez has been a bright spot, compiling a 7-3 in her dual matches this year.

Bartoloni has also been solid when she's been healthy with a 5-2 record in dual play.

Dixon has also been very pleased with the number-two doubles tandem featuring seniors Dorothy Iwanowicz and Susan Johnson.

Lasme arrested in scuffle at local bar

UMass forward and Atlantic 10 Defensive Player of the Year, Stephane Lasme, was arrested at 1:21 a.m. on Sunday for disorderly conduct and resisting arrest.

Lasme was found "yelling and cursing" in a bar, with a crowd of 50 people, after he had reportedly been slapped in the face, Amherst police said.

Police ordered him to calm down and took him out of the bar when he resisted, according to their report.

Lasme was escorted into an alleyway where he "harassed two unknown women and was subsequently placed under arrest."

Lasme began his UMass career three years ago. He came to the United States from Gahon, Africa, and has been playing basketball for the Minutemen since 2004.

The basketball consequences for Lasme are not yet known. The men's basketball team left yesterday for Cincinnati to play in the first round of the A-10 tournament against the Xavier Musketeers on Wednesday at U.S. Bank Arena, and it is uncertain whether Lasme will be allowed to play.

Lasme has had a breakout year for the Minutemen this season, averaging over four blocks per game, good for third in the nation.

He averaged just over 10 points a game during the regular season, a tremendous improvement from last season's average of just over four points per game.

With these new developments and the A-10 tournament around the corner, it would be a significant blow to UMass' postseason chances if Lasme sits out the remainder of the season.

New Web site causes controversy inside SGA

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

What had seemed to many veteran senators as a "quiet" year in terms of debate and controversy in the Student Government Association of the University of Massachusetts, has exploded within the last week due to the creation of a Web site that criticizes the lack of results within the current administration.

The sudden surge of aggression injected into the SGA can be attributed to the creation of the controversial Web site, changesga.com. The Web site, created by a UMass student and supported by a number of SGA senators, criticizes the current and past administration and accuses the government of failing on a majority of promises made in its 42-page platform created in the spring of 2005.

Jenn Kennedy, an SGA senator, compares the 'ChangeSGA' movement to the 'Take Back UMass' platform that many senators ran under two years ago after photographs emerged of nine student representatives drinking alcohol in the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy office and making references to the Ku Klux Klan.

"'Take Back UMass' was a great idea two years ago, they needed to change the SGA and they did. That's what we're trying to mimic," said Kennedy. "But after those elections, after they had taken back UMass and established some control, all the same senators kept referring to the name, making it seem as though 'Take Back UMass' was a political party. Senators used it as a fighting tool against the administration, and use it to work towards their own initiatives."

The 'ChangeSGA' supporters described some of what they called SGA officials' 'pet projects,' including the proposed $260,000 SCERA budget that was passed by the Ways and Means committee and will be voted on Wednesday night in Senate.

"The SGA leadership with 'Take Back' has gone as far as to stack the Ways and Means committee with SCERA members and propose an increase of $200,000 for an agency that had a budget of $60,000 last year," said Kennedy. "Student activity money, which will fund that increase, is supposed to go towards things that effect students on campus. With this agency increase, over 1/3 of the students fees students pay will be going to an off-campus initiative that will not affect the students who are paying for it."

Kennedy, along with a number of other senators, feels that the SGA has left the majority of its constituents behind.

"We want to put the emphasis back on helping students," said SGA senator Sean McNair. "The SGA isn't available to the students. Their office is understaffed and its priorities aren't to help all students, but a select few."

The Web site reports the SGA has failed to fulfill nearly all of their promises made in their platform in the spring of 2005, specifically the promise of reforming the SGA.

"This campaign promise went unfilled from the moment that this administration was elected," reads the Web site. "They have continued to act in a corrupt manner. The office practices leave students with

UMass murder trial date set back

The trial of a man accused of killing a University of Massachusetts student has been delayed for the second time.

Bryan Johnston's trial has been pushed back to March 27, according to the Hampshire Superior Court Clerk's Office.

Johnston is accused of shooting longtime friend and UMass student David L. Sullivan to death in his home at 105 Meadow St. in Amherst on Dec. 6, 2004.

The trial is expected to last at least 10 days and could involve over 90 witnesses.

One of the prosecution's key witnesses, Gareth Mello, is currently stationed with the United States Military in Iraq. Johnston allegedly phoned Mello immediately after the shooting to ask for a car ride home. Northwestern District Attorney Renee Steese asked the military to send Mello to the U.S. to testify at the trial, which will take place at the Hampshire Superior Court in Northampton.

SGA members tour dorm construction site

A group of senators from the Student Government Association at the University of Massachusetts recently toured the new housing construction near the Sylvan residential area and met with project officials to learn about the details of the housing plans.

The residential area, named North Residential Area, will have four identical buildings, each pair forming a courtyard. Each building will have meeting rooms, lounges and advanced laundry facilities on the first floor and each floor will have 12 apartments.

Two of the apartments will be handicapped accessible, which "will be a really nice addition to campus. It is good to know that students of all needs have been taken into account in the construction of these new buildings," said former Governor of Central Residential Area John Williams.

All suites will be fully furnished, have a large kitchen and common room along with a pantry storage area and high-speed wired Internet. There are four single bedrooms and two bathrooms in every suite.

There will be one apartment living advisor (ALA) per floor. They will have a single room

Education expert points out flaws

By Nicole Boonjakuakul

Evan Dobell, the president and CEO of the New England Board of Higher Education, spoke about the concerns for higher education in the United States on Tuesday afternoon at the University of Massachusetts.

The lecture, titled "Looming Dangers for Higher Education," covered issues of global competition, the economic impact of commercialization and privatization on higher education, and the loss of public and private funding.

Dobell started off the lecture by explaining the complications America faces today, from economic to political issues. One major issue with American education, according to Dobell, is the unwillingness of the government to fully fund higher education in grades K-12.

"It takes about $6 billion to fully fund the No Child Left Behind Act," explains Dobell. "But the funds aren't there because the government would rather spend $250 billion to pay for the war in Iraq."

The NCLB Act — which sets new standards for students, teachers and schools, and boosts funding to help meet the new requirements through standardized testing — is not the only major program facing this problem. Washington also announced a cut in funding for Pell Grants, a need-based form of financial aid that doesn't have to be repaid.

Dobell shared a New England statistic on high school students: for every 100 students that enter the ninth grade, 25 percent don't make it to graduation. The percentages double to 50 percent in certain rural and urban areas.

American peacemaker not seen in tape

By Sameer N. Yacoub
Associated Press

BAGHDAD — The American among four Christian Peacemakers activists kidnapped last year in Iraq was absent from a videotape broadcast Tuesday of the exhausted-looking men purportedly appealing to their governments to secure their release.

Al-Jazeera television, which aired the footage, could not explain why Tom Fox, 54, of Clear Brook, Va., was not shown.

In Toronto, the co-director of Christian Peacemaker Teams, Doug Pritchard, said he drew some comfort from seeing three of his colleagues on video again.

"The fact that they're still well after more than three months says that the kidnappers have been concerned for their well-being," Pritchard said. "The fact that there are no demands made or timelines set is also hopeful."

But Allan Slater, a Canadian member of the group, said he was disturbed not to see Fox.

"We certainly are hopeful when we see three of our friends alive, but also it's very distressing that we didn't see Tom Fox, and I wouldn't want to hide that because I'm sure it's very distressful for Tom's family and friends as well," Slater told The Canadian Press from Baghdad. The hostages seen in the brief video dated Feb. 28, were Canadians James Loney, 41, and Harmeet Singh Sooden, 32, and Briton Norman Kember, 74.

The news anchor said the men asked their governments and Persian Gulf countries to work for their release. Al-Jazeera's policy is to silence the audio on hostage tapes for broadcast.

The tape showed the three men sitting in chairs and speaking. One had white hair and a slight beard; the two others had dark hair and full beards.

The previously unknown Swords of Righteousness Brigades claimed responsibility for kidnapping the four workers, who disappeared Nov. 26.

The four had not been heard from since a videotape aired by Al-Jazeera on Jan. 28, dated from a week before. A statement reportedly accompanying that tape said the hostages would be killed

Center for Teaching recognized for efforts

By Chris Hynes
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts Center for Teaching was recently recognized by a national survey for having one of the top faculty development programs in the United States and Canada.

The survey was conducted with the help of Mary Deane Sorcinelli, the associate provost for faculty development and the director of the Center for Teaching at UMass. The CFT, established in 1989, has made its central goal to constantly improve its students' learning. In order to accomplish this, the CFT offers a variety of methods for its professors to improve their abilities, including University-wide orientations and workshops, intensive teaching fellowship programs, faculty grants for teaching and multiple resources easily accessible to teacher assistants.

The survey, which went out to all directors of teaching and learning centers in both the United States and Canada, will be included in a published study dealing with the evolution and future priorities for faculty development entitled "Creating the Future of Faculty Development: Learning from the Past, Understanding the Present."

One of the many reasons that the CFT was put on such a lofty pedestal was because of the focus it places on the needs and interests of the entire academic community, at both the teacher and student poles of the education spectrum. Not only do they offer programs that involve better techniques for teaching large classes, the CFT also provides ways to actively engage students in smaller classrooms. New faculty members also have a lot to gain by participating in the Center's programs. One of the most popular and helpful, new faculty orientations is the mid-term assessment program (MAP), during which a Center representative attends one of the profes-

Hugh Hefner organizes upcoming jazz event

LOS ANGELES — As a boy growing up in Chicago, Hugh Hefner says he fell in love early — and it wasn't with women.

Well, actually, it was with women. But the founding editor of Playboy magazine also fell in love early with jazz, and both affairs have lasted a lifetime.

"It's the music of my youth. It's the music I grew up with. It's the music of my dreams," Hefner, looking wistful, said as he stood in the backyard of his Los Angeles mansion as a swinging jazz combo played just a few feet away. The occasion was a recent news conference announcing plans for this June's 28th annual Playboy Jazz Festival.

Hefner did what he could to stay in the background while others announced a lineup of stars for the June 17-18 event at the Hollywood Bowl that is to include George Duke, Stanley Clarke, Chuck Mangione, Elvis Costello, Kevin Eubanks, Allen Toussaint, the Spanish Harlem Orchestra and numerous others. Then, after a brief photo op with some of the performers, he tried to slip hurriedly back into his lavish Playboy Mansion, the turreted stone edifice that visitors who arrive by car are advised to unless all Iraqi prisoners were released from U.S. and Iraqi prisons. No deadline was set.

Iraqi and Western security officials repeatedly warned the activists before their abduction that they were taking a grave risk by moving around Baghdad without bodyguards.

Christian Peacemaker Teams has been working in Iraq since October 2002, investigating allegations that U.S. and Iraqi forces abused Iraqi detainees. Its teams host human rights conferences in conflict zones, promoting peaceful solutions.

In a statement issued from its Chicago headquarters Tuesday, the Christian group said "we continue to pray for their safe and speedy release so that they may return to their families and carry on their peaceful work on behalf of all Iraqi detainees."

The group said 14,600 Iraqis "currently (are) detained illegally by the Multinational Forces in Iraq."

We believe that the root cause of the abduction of our colleagues is the U.S. and British-led invasion and occupation of Iraq," the statement said.

More than 250 foreigners have been taken hostage in Iraq since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion that toppled Saddam Hussein, and at least 39 have been killed.

Among those held is Jill Carroll, an American reporter who the Iraqi interior minister has said was abducted by the Islamic Army in Iraq, the insurgent group that freed two French journalists in 2004 after four months in captivity.

Bayan Jabr, who is in charge of Iraq's police, also said he believed the 28-year-old freelance reporter for The Christian Science Monitor was still alive, although the deadline set by her captors for the United States to meet their demands expired late last month.

Three videotapes provided by the kidnappers to Arab satellite television stations identified the group holding her as the previously unknown Revenge Brigades.

The kidnappers have publicly demanded the release of all women detainees in Iraq, but the owner of a Kuwaiti TV station that aired a videotape of Carroll last month said the group provided more specific conditions that he refused to reveal. She was seized Jan. 7 in Baghdad and her translator was killed.

On the eve of International Women's Day, Reporters Without Borders on Tuesday reiterated its calls for her release and that of Rim Zeid, another female journalist held in Iraq.

Also held are Thomas Nitzschke and Rene Braeunlich, German engineers kidnapped Jan. 24 from an Iraqi government-owned detergent plant in Beiji, 155 miles north of Baghdad. Kenyan engineers Moses Munyao and George Nobalto disappeared in Baghdad on Jan. 18 in an attack on a convoy of the mobile phone company Iraqna. Six security guards and three drivers were killed.

Local universities at risk, says speaker one out of every five families in New England has a child in school," expressed Dobell.

According to Dobell, a child's education isn't the only thing at risk, but also the business in New England brought through higher education.

"There are 270 colleges and universities in New England which employ 38,000 members of the faculty, and an additional 212,000 employees outside the faculty," he said. "The only thing left in New England is higher education! It's EDs and MEDs."

He says higher education is the business for New England, and people should do anything to keep that business alive. The under-funding is hurting the economy of the Commonwealth and New England as a whole.

Another issue of concern is the rise of national and global competition. He explains that states such as Michigan, North Carolina and North Virginia have raised the bar in terms of education, better jobs and affordable housing. He says that a recent survey showed 27 percent of the population saying, "there is nothing you could do to make me move to New England," and that New England was only good for its foliage and the Patriots.

Also, according to Dobell, the University of Hawaii alone has a $400 million budget for research on higher education, a budget that is four times that of UMass's.

"We're now facing a rise on global competition," he said. "China's president has said that within the next nine years, there will be over 300 million Chinese students, under the age of 32, who have bachelor's degrees and speak fluent English."

He continued, "And Australia has raised higher education to its 4th highest economy driver." He also added that two major textbook publishers in England have monopolies on textbooks in the United States — which adds to the high prices students are paying for their education.

He believes that America is too consumed with their loyalty to corporations that make educational institutions a brand, rather than gearing towards the needs of students. Dobell believes it is everybody's responsibility to take action in order to solve the problem. People are only placing the blame on others — politicians blaming school officials, school officials blaming parents, and so on. But nobody is taking any real action to stop it. Dobell suggested, "Vote against those who don't support school funding! Don't be fearful or too scared to take on political leaders."

Before becoming CEO and president of the NEBHE in January 2005, Dobell led higher education systems at Middlesex Community College, City College of San Francisco, Trinity College in Connecticut and the University of Hawaii. He holds degrees in public administration from both UMass and Harvard University.

SGA comments on new dorms in an apartment just like all the other students. According to project officials, it will most likely work out that the students who request an apartment for only a group of three students will have an ALA living with them. Similar policies enforced in the dormitories will also be enforced in the apartments due to underage residents and general safety.

The cost of living in one of the apartments is $750 a month (per person), $6,750 a year, while living in the dorms costs $4,575 a year for a single and $3,705 for a shared room. Housing services said this cost is comparable to living off campus, keeping in mind the prime location and the inclusion of heat, electricity, water, Internet and furniture.
